> "'That is good for horses, and, I see, for asses, but might not suit Oxon,' was the ready retort."

Or, again:—

> "When he was driving with Lady Burdett-Coutts towards Columbia Market, something was said which brought up the word 'drysalter.'
> "'Does your lordship know what a drysalter is?' asked the baroness.
> "'Certainly—Tate and Brady, a veritable dry-Psalter,' immediately replied the Bishop."

It is not bad. People who like puns may conceivably rather enjoy it. But schoolboys would have pinched the Bishop black and blue if he had been forty years younger, and we attribute the immortality of his witticisms entirely to his ecclesiastical dignity. That is a peculiar thing: a poem is not immortal because a bishop wrote it; a bishop's sermon does not become a chestnut; but a bishop's joke invariably does—an evergreen chestnut. Poor mankind feels it such a comfort to know that a holy man can laugh—that a saint, whose profession it is to reprove the world of sin, should be capable of causing laughter in others. That is why the parson's jest is treasured. It is like laughing in church—and we all know how irresistible that is. Well, this volume is one long laugh in church.

FAMILY LETTERS OF CHRISTINA ROSSETTI.*

It is singular how phrase after phrase in the letters making up this volume recalls the precise poise of the head, the precise, clear enunciation of the voice, the slowness of the diction during which the thinker pursued in her mind the exact words in which to express her meaning. But I wonder, though in the letters so often the characteristic turn of phrase of Christina Rossetti is preserved, how much of her vivid, delicate, and charming personality will filter through to the general reader. I am utterly unable to say. Thus I must leave any definite estimate of the value of the book to other writers.

Essentially it is the story of two unhappy love-affairs. I do not mean to say that the actual life of Christina Rossetti was a life of two love-affairs; it was a life of affection, of self-sacrifice—to her mother, to her brother, to her faith, and to her Redeemer. I have written elsewhere with some fullness of Miss Rossetti's psychology, but I may perhaps be permitted to recapitulate briefly here what, without corroborating details for which I have no space, may appear startling and outrageous statements. Miss Rossetti in essence was a pagan, a pagan as full-blooded as was her brother Gabriel. She was of those pagans who have produced from among their ranks great eremites, great ascetics, and great saints. You have only to read such poems of hers as "My heart is like a singing bird," to discover how true this is. You have only to read such poems as "If he would come to-day, to-day, to-day!" to discover how much she longed for a riot of emotion. But it must be a riot of emotion fitted to not her own but an ingrafted social canon of ethics. This tragedy was caused in all probability by the fact that she was an Italian in England. The English rules of manners are of a singular, of a freezing contagiousness. Not only do they enjoin a rigid suppression of the emotions, but in the end they cause to arise in us who at times feel so very foreign, a positive fear of any expression of our own emotions.

In essence there is the tragedy of Christina Rossetti's life. I do not mean to say that had Christina Rossetti lived in Italy she would not have refused to marry Collinson, who changed his religion as often as another man changes the fashion of parting his hair, or that she would not have refused with the same tender and touching reluctance to marry Cayley, the atheist. She would certainly have done both, but in Italy she would have gone into a nunnery, and in exercising herself with trivial, hard, and menial tasks to the honor of a celestial Spouse, she would have found that bodily weariness, that spiritual calm, which here in England there was no means of providing for her. She would have found, if not happiness, at least the waters of oblivion.

As it was, hers was a life of agony, a life of regrets for thwarted loves, of spiritual fears she found no one to allay, of physical agony so acute that assuredly in the flesh of this mortal world she suffered more than one could imagine would be enjoined her by an august and vengeful destiny in any imaginable world to come. In return for her sufferings, the world has the poems which, as far as I am concerned, I am ready calmly and deliberately to state represent for me the highest artistic achievement in English literature, and the most poignant pleasure that I could obtain from any of the Arts, or indeed from life itself. And her sufferings gave to those with whom she came in contact the precise, restrained, observant, and humorous figure that in phrase after phrase is recalled to me by this book. This trend of humor and quaintness runs through the whole Rossetti family. The precision alone was lacking in the most known of them all. Here is a letter which seems to unite the three of them, other than Gabriel:—

To William Rossetti.

> "[The reference to a 'head and hand,' followed by Maria's quaint idea about the mummy-room, has to do with a mummified relic presented to me by Mr. Peter Lascaridi, who had recently returned from a visit to Egypt. I did not quite know how best to dispose of this abnormal gift, and had offered it to Christina. Ultimately, it was accepted with pleasure by our medical adviser and friend, Mr. William Gill.]
> "August 21st, 1878.
> "My Dear William,—
> "Had I an oratory, I might willingly accept the loan of 'head and hand' as a memento mori; but, as it is, I could not feel easy at keeping bits of fellow-human-creature as curiosities; my preference would be to give them reverent burial. Long ago Maria suggested how awful it would be to be in the Museum Mummy-Room on the day of the resurrection. . . . ."

Or who, again, would receive such love letters as this from the most erudite and absent-minded of all modern lovers:—

"From C. B. Cayley.

> "January 2nd, 1877.
> " . . There is another thing I am more diffident about presenting: it is called in Sussex a seamouse, but by naturalists more politely Aphrodita aculeata, or needly Venus; and might be received by you as a compatriot of your "demons in shrouds"; it has bright, many-hued scales. On the other hand, I did not see my way to dry it; so I put it in spirits of wine—not without fears for my carpet-bag's contents; this may seem a drawback."

This love-token accompanied Christina Rossetti throughout her life. And so the pressure of life and fate hardened Christina Rossetti until she became as undeviating in her rules of life and in her censure of conduct as she was remorselessly intent upon expressing herself in precise phrases. And indeed my most vivid recollections of the poetess is that of a little black-robed figure, sitting, her hands folded, at the end of a horse-hair sofa—a figure much resembling that of the late Queen Victoria—her head a little on one side, her lips clearly and precisely sending out words of a remorseless, a Dantesque, cruelty. It is true that the offender had sinned against her religion and against what she considered to be decency, and she treated him with remorselessness only equalled by the indefatigable cruelty of her treatment of herself. This perhaps is my most salient recollection, but how many acts of benevolence, of tenderness, and of affection within my own knowledge could I not chronicle?

An extraordinary sense of actuality invades the reader with the turning of every page of "Our Daily Bread." Casting about for the secret of Clara Viebig's power, one concludes that she has one of those emotionally fruitful natures on which the bodily and spiritual phenomena of the stream of human life impress themselves as on a sensitive plate. Much as chemical substances, brought into contact, show varying degrees of affinity, so does the artist's consciousness react to life according to its innate quality. At one end of the scale we see highly subjective natures, such as Blake's or Shelley's, stimulated into what one may style the personal autobiography of mood; at the other end we find natures such as Miss Austen's, giving us mental photographs, sharply outlined, of the world immediately surrounding them. The power of the artist to project himself into the souls of others, seems, like the actor's, often to rest in the degree of nervous susceptibility he possesses to human personality. And in Frau Viebig's art, almost startling in the breadth of its realism, her own feelings seem to act as an emotional conductor, transmitting infallibly the whole stream of sensations that life produces in others.

We feel this in the first chapter, which describes how the sturdy peasant girl, Mina Heinze, leaves her native village to find a servant's place in Berlin. She cries bitterly at parting with her family, but she has six brothers and sisters, too many mouths to feed from Bartel Heinze's bit of land, and "the figures of the town-dressed girls flash through Mina's mind. Many a one came home with a savings' bank book, married well, or made a good match in Berlin." In a few pages the author has summed up the country people's shrewd outlook, and the healthy drudgery of Mina's life, and her stunned and homesick confusion at the city's roar and bustle when she arrives in Berlin. Mina is going to lodge with Aunt Reschke, who keeps a greengrocer's shop and registry office in the Göbenstrasse, and she brings with her the dainty and pretty Bertha Fidler, from Golmütz village, who is also seeking a situation. In the story of these country girls' experiences in the great town, we have a page of social history, extraordinarily faithful and extraordinarily living. Although the scene is Berlin, and the household habits described as characteristically German, so typical is the whole picture of lower middle and working-class life generally, that the author might have been engaged by Mr. Charles Booth to clothe with the flesh of realistic art in "Our Daily Bread" the skeleton abstractions of the facts and figures presented in his "Life and Labor in London." And universality of appeal is a notable testimony to the author's powers, since it shows that she pierces to the marrow of human nature. There is no English novelist living, indeed we have never had a novelist, capable of drawing wih such justness, human warmth, and mental freedom, yet with such entire absence of caricature or sentimentality, so intimate a picture of lower class life as the Reschkes' Dickens could have reproduced the humours of it, but in the justness of its social lights and shades and in the flexibility and diversity of the emotional relations between the characters, it is as far superior to Dickens as it is to the French naturalists. The art, indeed, is too photographic, too lacking in the beauty of form, to be ranked as great art, but, in its realistic class, for breadth and living accuracy, it is an astonishing performance.

To indicate here the course of the story would be futile, since it is developed by the author in an infinite number of impressionistic scenes, each producing the ever varying but cumulative effect that events and circumstances exercise on our conduct. Mina's relations with Arthur Reschke, the spoiled, consumptive and weakly son of the old couple, form the pivot of the novel. The characters of both Mina and Arthur, and, indeed, of all the Reschkes—Gertrude, the lady-like shop-girl, with her passion for finery, who eventually goes to the bad; the hysterical and anæmic Maggie, who joins the Salvation Army; and the sharp-witted child, Ella—are drawn with such extraordinary sureness as to pass perfectly for Londoners of their class. We say "characters," but the truth is that Frau Viebig catches with such accuracy the "types," that the reader feels like a naturalist who is hailing a fauna long familiar to him, in a new habitat. Thus old Reschke and his energetic wife, clearly peasants in their old-world shrewdness, might hail from the Midlands, but their restless and weakly children are typical town products. Again, the emotional states and moods painted by the authoress have a staggering actuality. The attitude of Mina's friends and neighbors to her before and after her illegitimate child is born, the moral, self-interested reproof of her employers, the kindness of a chance acquaintance, the angry callousness of her peasant father when she brings little Frida back to Golmütz, all these and hundreds of other emotional states are presented with such living mastery that the critic has not a word to utter. Admirable is the scene where Mina, repulsed from her native village, gathers her force and energy and insists in the face of the excited Reschke household that Arthur shall acknowledge her child and marry her. True, the scene is no better executed than are the majority, but we cite it as an instance of Frau Viebig's genius for precipitating the psychological moment upon us when it is the natural fruit of the whole train of circumstances. We quote a passage from the conclusion of this scene:—

> Mina sat down. Frida looked longingly at the apples in the basket. Arthur gave her an apple, and looked on while she turned it wonderingly in her little hands, and then nibbled at it with the tiny white teeth, like a squirrel! The young father smiled.
> "Arthur," cried Mrs. Reschke sharply.
> "What?" At that moment he had quite forgotten her.
> "Wot's the meaning of all this?"
> He made no answer, but Mina said, glancing at the child, "It's his lass. He must marry me!"
> Mother Reshke's indignation knew no bounds. She was not only furious with Mina, but with her son too. The booby!
> "Arthur," she shrieked in her terror, "don't stand there like a dummy! She only wants to frighten you! But don't yer be made a fool of. That's all they want, all o' 'em. Proofs!" She drummed on the table. "Come 'ere with your proofs!" And then she laughed mockingly: "I don't believe till I 'ave the proofs."
> Mina looked across at the young man. There was an appeal, an entreaty to remember, in the tone. "Arthur!"
> Mrs. Reshke watched her son closely; he had gone dark red. the perspiration came out on his forehead.
> "I don't want proofs," said Mina proudly. "I can swear it. An' Mr. Miller says if I can do that Frida'll get her rights. An' if he don't marry me, he must pay. Miller knows all about it; he's summat very high in court. An' if Arthur has nothing to pay, his parents 'll have to. Yes," she concluded triumphantly, as she saw Mrs. Reschke's fright, "An' I'll not give in. Not if I have to go to law."
> This was not the stupid Mina of former times. She had got up from her stool and stood there drawn up to her full height; to make her speech more impressive she stamped on the floor at every sentence.
> Mrs. Reschke was quite cowed; that would be a nice thing, to have to pay. And the disgrace! "Arthur," she timidly whispered to her son, "wot d'ye think, after all yer'll 'ave to acknowledge the child."
> "Yes, I'll have to." The lines of his young face suddenly sharpened; a deep furrow was graven on his features.
> "I think so, too," said Mina quietly. She gave Arthur her hand. "Well, then, Arthur!" and handed him Frida to kiss.
> Reschke now appeared in the glass door, and Mrs. Reschke burst out once more. She could not take it in—her Arthur was really going to marry Mina. The innocent and guilty were overwhelmed with reproaches; she screamed and lamented, tore her hair, reproached God and the world. At last she called her utterly confused husband to her assistance.
> But he was altogether in a maze to-day. He had not recognised Mina at first; when he had blinked at her long enough, holding his hand before his eyes as a screen, he was pleased to see his niece again. He seemed to have quite forgotten what separated them. "'Ave ye 'eard, Mina," he said, and pulled her sleeve confidentially, "our Gertie's gone?"

As in "Absolution," there is not a line of moral bias in the telling of the story. Every action is presented as the outcome of the inevitable forces of character, temperament and circumstances. Mina's struggles as wife and mother to keep a roof over the Reschke family, illustrate admirably the vital strength of the practical philosophy of working-class life. Questions of art apart, "Our Daily Bread" should live, if only for its documentary truth to life and its absorbing human interest.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

The "history" ranges from the Roman invasion of Britain to the General Election of 1906, with many varied visions of battle violence and emotion in the centuries between. Vividness is the first quality demanded of such peepholes into the past; vividness, and a firm outline as of things seen in a clear air rather than (as in the majority of records) in misty or wavering form. And this vividness Mr. Belloc always possesses; so that the scene rises before the reader in a series of bold strokes, like the world as revealed in a miniature of very deliberate workmanship. Beyond such determined effort there is also required a power of suggestion, which sets the picture as seen in a background; looking at a field of vision artificially limited, the "eye witness" should be able to apprehend the large panorama of which this is a tiny section only. And in the best of these sketches this quality is exhibited. Many of them, lacking this power of magic, merely reveal themselves as graphic narrative of the outward scene of great events. The field of Crecy, the fireships drifting upon the Armada, the confusion in the woods of Saratoga, are thus described, just as have been described in our own day by eye-witnesses the slaughter at Omdurman or the confusion at Colenso. Such writings occupy the position of the vigorous narrative with which Mr. Collier and other philanthropists in their "Sketches of English History" endeavored to lighten the burden of childhood to whom history was a maze of dates and discontented facts and unmeaning affirmations; and many of them deserve incorporation in some future selection of scenes which may make the school boy realise that the past was once alive.

If this volume contained nothing but such material, it would be a disappointment. There are other chapters, however, which rise to a higher level; in which the revelation of personality in a Committee or over the Council Board suddenly lights up the past as with a beacon fire, or in which some trivial incident of the immemorial life of a dead civilisation can excite the apprehension of the poetry which clings to the changes of time. As examples of the first of these may be selected "The Familiar" and "Thermidor"; of the second "The Christian" and "The Pagan." "The Familiar" is a scene at the Council Chamber of Philip II. before the sailing of the Armada. It is the scene also of the prophets of Israel before Ramoth-gilead; of the British Cabinet before the South African war. All the high admirals and captains promise Philip an easy victory; only one voice, like that of Micaiah the son of Imleh—and he without reason, and merely as prophecy—can anticipate disaster. But lo, the words of the Council are more agreeable—words as of the popular press of the summer of 1899—with a substitution merely of one nation's name for another. "England," said the Cardinal, "is past praying for. They have attempted here and there to rule the heathen, which is the test of a people, and they have failed; they can nowhere fix their power upon land outside their own boundaries; they have lost all tradition and respect; the whole thing is a welter; it is a sort of ulcer to be cut out of Europe. Dangerous only as a poison, not as an armed enemy." In "Thermidor," the Committee of Public Safety, after an all-night sitting, with Carnot studying his big maps on the floor, is disturbed by the intrusion of Robespierre, whom they have already condemned to destruction. He pleads for mercy for two obscure condemned, which is refused; and departs, "shutting the door behind him with a curious little bourgeois precision, as of a well-bred provincial who knows how a gentleman should leave a drawing-room." In such illuminating flashes Mr. Belloc can show the secular changes of the world: the rise and fall of Empires and religions, which "like cliffs washed down by water, change and pass": or the cities which "stand in time's eye, almost as long as flowers." A bitter rebellious account of the hypocrisies and elaborate falsities of a modern election campaign sets a dead present also in the atmosphere of the living past.

The fact that the manufacture of porcelain in China was "a matter of custom, almost of religion," explains its importance, if not the fascination that real Chinese china has for the average collector. As Mr. J. F. Blacker says in his "Chats on Oriental China" (Unwin, 5s. net), the gift of a piece of porcelain marked every solemn ceremony from the birthday celebration to the marriage. In approaching the subject, the first point to be remembered is that in China there is no difference between porcelain and "pottery," such as exists in Europe and even in Japan; the two things belong to the same grade of workmanship, and should be referred to under the generic heading of china. The origin of the Chinese manufacture cannot be traced, but there can be no doubt that it existed long before the date of its first authentic records, which relate to two potteries established during the Wie Dynasty about A.D. 220; after which, and until the fourteenth century, the principal landmark in the history of its progress would appear to have been the establishment by the Emperor Chin-tsung (954-1007) of the Royal manufactory at King-te-chin. The industry developed its world-wide importance during (1) the Ming Dynasty (1368-1644), and (2) the Tsing Dynasty which succeeded the Ming, and has lasted to the present day, being known as the Manchu. Mr. Blacker's book, which is put together almost in the manner of an encyclopædia, contains a vast amount of information, and should prove to be a valuable introduction to the study of Chinese and Japanese porcelain; and, since China in this matter set the fashion to the world, and has never ceased to influence Western manufactures, the portion that relates thereto has a wide application for all students of the craft. The section dealing with Japanese porcelain is much the shorter. Japan was a stranger to the craft until the beginning of the sixteenth century. She closely followed the Chinese example, the chief differences being her closer imitation of natural objects, greater correctness in design, and another method of firing. In pottery, however, the Japanese developed on rather more original lines. A third section of the book, devoted to the sale prices of the famous Louis Neath collection, gives one an insight into the financial possibilities of the successful collector, and, altogether, the volume, with its many fine illustrations, including several pages of date marks and symbolical marks and ornaments, accomplishes its purpose admirably.

"The Iliad of the East" (Lane, 7s. 6d. net), consisting of selected episodes from the "Ramayana," which is one of the two great poems that are to India what the Iliad and Odyssey are to Greece, is not a new book. As its author, Mrs. Frederika Macdonald, mentions in her introduction, the work was published thirty-eight years ago—before Sir Edwin Arnold's "Light of Asia" had popularised the study of the ancient Indian religious systems. In its new form, however, and embellished by the sympathetically sculptural illustrations of Mr. J. Lockwood Kipling, the volume is interesting and opportune at this moment when the nationalist movement in India is drawing attention to the psychology, not less than the outward manifestations, of a race long held in subjection by ourselves. Mrs. Macdonald contends that familiarity with the old Indian poetry is the only way to a just understanding of Indian thought and feeling; while it is absolutely indispensable to the study of the Brahman and Buddhist religious systems. In her introduction she writes very interestingly anent the difficulties encountered by the modern European mind over the "imaginative interpretations of life" belonging to Indian poetry, and suggests some reasons why, with all its fantastic superstructure, such poetry should be taken seriously; and her scholarly argument should do something to clarify the mental vision of the many who persist in regarding Buddhism as a poor imitation of Christianity. The "Ramayana," translated from the Sanscrit of Valmitri—the devout Brahman who received the gift of poesy from the gods—has the same fascination as the "Rig Veda," and the story of Rama's quest of his stolen wife the same dramatic interest as its famous counterpart in Homeric mythology.

An entertaining little work is Mr. J. R. Chitty's "Things Seen in China" (Seeley, 2s. net). A new venture in Celestial journalism, seeking the favor of its public, advertised itself as follows: "The chief object of the 'Gazette' is the enlightenment of the people, therefore nothing political or trifling will be permitted to appear"; similarly Mr. Chitty excludes politics rigorously from these pages, and the trifles he introduces are only trifling to those who cannot pierce their significance. He gives us a good deal of chatty information about the family life, the commercial life, the religious, literary, and artistic constituents of social

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

The LIST or SUBSCRIPTIONS in London will be CLOSED on or before 5th January, 1909.

89½ per cent. =	£184 3 1 per Bond of £205 15s. 2d.

The Bonds are being offered simultaneously in New York by Messrs. Speyer and Co., and in Amsterdam by Messrs. Teixeira de Mattos Brothers.

Payment in full may be made on Allotment, or on 27th January, 1909, under discount at the rate of 2½ per cent. per annum.

The instalments carry interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from their respective due dates till 1st May, 1909 (interest on the full face value of the Bond being allowed from 23rd February, 1909), and upon payment of the instalments due on allotment, Script Certificates to Bearer, carrying a Coupon of £2 10s. (due 1st May, 1909) for each £205 15s. 2d. nominal value, will be issued in exchange for the allotment letter. The Script, when fully paid, will be exchanged in due course for Definitive Bonds, carrying 5 per cent. interest from 1st May, 1909.

Full particulars of the Mortgage and Deed of Trust securing these Bonds, as well as of the financial position and prospects of the St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad Company, will be found in the letter of Mr. B. F. Yoakum, Chairman of the Executive Committee, enclosed in the prospectus, extracts from which will be found below.

In default of payment of any instalment, the amount previously paid will be subject to forfeiture, and the allotment to cancellation.

A copy of the above-mentioned Mortgage and Deed of Trust may be inspected by intending subscribers before the list is closed at the Office of Messrs. Bircham and Co., 50, Old Broad Street, London, E.C.

Copies of the full prospectus may be obtained from Messrs. Speyer Brothers.

Application may be made on the annexed form.

7, Lothbury, London, E.C., 30th December, 1908.

EXTRACTS from the above-mentioned letter.

ST. LOUIS and SAN FRANCISCO RAILROAD COMPANY.

115, Broadway, New York, 24th December, 1908.

Messrs. Speyer and Co., New York City.

Dear Sirs,—Referring to the $30,000,000 St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad Company General Lien 15-20 Year Five per Cent. Gold Bonds which this Company has sold to you, I beg to state the following:—

These Bonds are a direct obligation of the St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad Company, and are secured by a Mortgage and Deed of Trust covering all the Company's property as described in said Mortgage, and any property hereafter acquired with the proceeds of General Lien Bonds.

The $30,000,000 Bonds purchased by you are Bonds issuable under the Mortgage for the following purposes:—

$10,000,000 for reimbursement of Capital Expenditures (including payment of floating debt incurred for improvements, &c.).
$15,530,000 for refunding like amount of St. Louis, Memphis, and South Eastern Railroad Company Four and a-Half per Cent. Bonds (out of a total of $16,000,000 provided in Mortgage), maturing June 1st, 1909.
$3,470,000, being part of $6,500,000 for refunding like amount of St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad Company 2½-Year Five per Cent. Gold Notes.
$1,000,000 to aid in refunding, under Section 3, Article 2 of the Mortgage.

Total $30,000,000.

On or before June 1st, 1909, the General Lien Bonds will become upon redemption of the St. Louis, Memphis, and South Eastern Railroad Company Four and a-Half per Cent. Bonds, a First Mortgage on 665·20 miles, subject to only $489,125 existing Bonds, for the redemption of which General Lien Bonds are reserved.

The Main Line of the St. Louis, Memphis, and South Eastern Railroad extends from St. Louis, Mo., to Memphis, Tenn., and is rapidly becoming one of the most important and profitable of the Frisco Lines, owing to its density of traffic and economy of operation.

In addition to the above General Lien Bonds, issuable to the amount of $30,000,000, the Mortgage provides for the issue of General Lien Bonds as follows:—

Refunding Outstanding Bonds and Notes (all but $1,065,500 maturing on or before 1st October, 1913)	$26,070,400
Refunding outstanding Equipment Notes	$11,539,000
To aid in refunding outstanding Bonds and Notes above mentioned (Section 3, Article 2)	$4,000,000
Refunding after 1st June, 1909, future issues of Equipment Notes at 60 per cent. of their face value (remaining 40 per cent. to be paid out of Income)	$5,000,000
Additions and Improvements subsequent to 1st July, 1909 ($2,500,000 per annum until 30th June, 1911, $5,000,000 per annum thereafter)	$28,241,000
New mileage after 1st June, 1909 (at not exceeding $1,000,000 per annum)	$5,000,000
Total issue limited to	$109,850,400

On or before 1st October, 1913, this Mortgage will practically become a first lien on	1,526.45 miles
The General Lien Mortgage is also a lien (subject to $85,000,000 refunding 4 per Cent. Bonds) on additional	2,604.42 miles
Total	4,130.87 miles
It is further a lien on the stock of and leasehold interest of the Company in the Kansas City, Fort Scott, and Memphis Railway, and Kansas City, Memphis, and Birmingham Railroad Company, aggregating	1,199.62 miles
Grand Total	5,330.49 miles

The general Lien Bonds are further secured (subject to $11,539,000 of serial Equipment Notes) on equipment costing originally $18,911,907, and comprising 311 locomotives, 84 passenger, and 14,051 freight and other cars, which equipment, as provided in the Mortgage, the Company agrees to keep in good repair and replace when destroyed.

The surplus of the St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad Company (exclusive of the Chicago and Eastern Illinois Railroad) for the year ended June 30th, 1908 (a period of universal depression), after providing for all fixed charges, taxes, rentals, &c., amounted to	$459,068
Its surplus for the year ended 30th June, 1907, after providing for all fixed charges, taxes, rentals, &c., amounted to	$4,158,583
Its average surplus for the four fiscal years, 1908, 1907, 1906, and 1905, after providing for all fixed charges, taxes, rentals, &c., amounted to	$1,987,728

At the present time business is showing a steady improvement, the estimated gross earnings for the first three weeks of December being $230,490 in excess of the same period of last year.

There is every reason to believe that this will continue, and the totals for this fiscal year, both gross and net, should be in excess of those of last year. It will be seen that even in a year of the most adverse conditions the earning power of the Company was safely in excess of all its fixed charges, while in years of normal activities it has always shown a large surplus. This will grow larger as the country develops, and each succeeding year no doubt should show an increased surplus. There can be no question as to the future of the territory served by the Company's lines. It is in this section of the country that the growth of immigration and of agricultural development is most marked. The growth of manufacturing interests is also notable, and the number of new industries located each year is proof of this. The policy of the Company has been and will be to foster every development of this kind, and every successful enterprise that is established must add to the revenues of the Railroad Company. It should also be borne in mind that a portion of the new mileage is only now coming into full operation.

The Bankers' Trust Company of New York and N. A. McMillan are Trustees.

Application will be made to list these Bonds on the New York Stock Exchange and in Europe.

Yours very truly,
(Signed) B. F. YOAKUM,
Chairman, Executive Committee.

China, illustrated by anecdotes that are often amusing and never dull. We are much more alive than we were to the fact that the seeming topsy-turviness of the Chinese habit of mind is only the shell of a wisdom equal, if not superior, to that of the West. But there are still some queer notions obtaining as to this remarkable country, and a sympathetic volume such as Mr. Chitty's should help to remove them.

There is a charm about the prose of many true poets. Cowper and Byron, Shelley and Matthew Arnold, were all very different as poets, but alike in the gift of writing exquisite prose. Even inferior poets will often write prose well, perhaps from the mere practice of the art of verse. So Mr. William Yeats, one of the finest of living poets, has also the fine mastery of prose, as anyone can judge for himself by reading the fifth and sixth volumes of his Collected Works, which have just appeared (Shakespeare Head Press, Stratford). They contain the beautiful Irish essays called "The Celtic Twilight," first published when the poet was quite young, and abounding in the humor that great lyric poets so rarely have possessed. The "Stories of Red Hanrahan" are in the same volume, though they appeared first in the collection called "The Secret Rose." The sixth volume of this new edition is given up entirely to the "Ideas of Good and Evil"—literary and symbolic essays which contain the poet's finest critical work.

"It is really remarkable," writes Mr. C. W. Hattersley in "The Baganda at Home" (Religious Tract Society, 5s. net), "how in this enlightened age there can still be so many people whose one idea of a missionary in Africa is that of a man with a white topee and white umbrella, clad in a white suit, and wearing blue spectacles; whose sole duty is to go from village to village, gathering the people under a tree and preaching to them." It is, indeed, a fact that this conception of the missionary still exists; but it is also remarkable how many books written by missionaries help to perpetuate the conception by their insistence on the "preaching" topics to the exclusion of all others. Mr. Hattersley, however, is free from this reproach. His book is a pleasantly written description of Uganda in its geographical, social, and economic aspects. As an important official of the Church Missionary Society in this, our latest Protectorate, he has had ample opportunity for studying the Baganda at home, and his work is an informative tribute to the country's possibilities. In regard to the natives he is enthusiastic; finding in them an intelligence that compares favorably with that of many Europeans. There is much description of their customs; an interesting chapter on the experiments made by Dr. Koch and others for the removal of the scourge of sleeping sickness; a clear-sighted exposition of the civilising work rendered possible by the Uganda railway; and a glance at the superstitions that must needs be reckoned with in a still semi-pagan land. There are a hundred admirable photographic illustrations.

The end of the year leaves City men in a surprisingly cheerful and confident frame of mind, considering how many political and financial clouds obscure the outlook and darken the horizon. The Italian earthquake alone is a portentous disaster, and is certain to have serious economic and financial consequences. Then the danger of war in the Balkans is by no means averted, to judge from accounts of Austrian preparations on the frontiers of Servia and Montenegro. Even if peace is preserved, Turkey and Russia are both in a semi-bankrupt condition, and the latter will soon be floating her big loan. Yet the City Editor of the "Pall Mall Gazette" says: "On the whole, prospects are cheering," and intimates that Home Securities, Americans, and Kaffirs are likely to advance, and that the modest recovery of 1908 "will make much headway in 1909." I cannot share his optimism as regards Stock Exchange prices, though there seems to be (which is much more important) a fair prospect of a business recovery if only peace can be maintained. The improvement is already beginning in India, where a splendid harvest is already assured. The Argentine crops are also satisfactory, and Australia will have a considerable surplus of wheat for exportation. Even our own revenue returns look more satisfactory.

The Italian Earthquake.

This heartrending catastrophe has not caused much change in stocks, because it it not likely that the heavy realisations of Consols which followed the San Francisco earthquake will be repeated now. At San Francisco, British fire insurance companies were the chief losers, or, at any rate, the chief payers. In Italy it seems fire insurance is chiefly provided by local, Austrian, and French companies. It is to be hoped that these have reinsured themselves in Germany rather than England! There is a difficulty in insuring against earthquakes, though it can be done at Lloyds even against risks in a country like Japan, where tremors of the earth occur almost daily. But even if your house has been shaken down you can generally make out that it was destroyed by the fire following the earthquake. Then, of course, the insurance company may appeal to an earthquake clause. But earthquake clauses are not popular with the clients of insurance companies, and are not much favored by foreign Courts of Law.

New Loans.

A Five per cent. Chilian loan at the issue price of 96½ is expected next week. Chili used to be considered the best and stablest of South American Republics, but it has had a bad earthquake and a severe financial crisis, as well as political mismanagement, in the last three or four years. Now it is in rather low water, and its paper currency has been much depreciated. Glowing reports are being telegraphed from Canada about the harvest, &c., which indicate that the new loan is about to be floated. Part of it may be subscribed in Paris, where there seems to be any quantity of money for investment. It is a pity that the French bankers who are so powerful don't insist on financial reforms in Russia, Portugal, and other shaky countries in which they have embarked so much capital. Apropos of this, one may mention the great accumulations of gold in Paris, for which no one has yet been able to give an adequate explanation. Political motives may have been at work; for the French have a notion that a big store of gold is a valuable background to diplomacy—more useful perhaps than a covey of Dreadnoughts.

Armament Shares.

The reported conversion of Mr. McKenna into a naval spendthrift may account for the attempts of speculators to hoist the prices of some armament firms, especially Vickers Maxim. Its dividend last year was fifteen per cent., but this year is said to have been less satisfactory, so that at forty shillings the shares are probably high enough. How Brazil is paying for its battleships is still a mystery, but these are being built by Armstrongs. Argentina is now beginning to order ships bp way of reform, and the next move of British armament firms will probably be to get hold of the Young Turks, who are really young in matters of finance, and will doubtless sit at the feet of Admiral Gamble

Diary of the Week.

A revised estimate of the deaths from the Italian earthquake gives the loss in the chief towns at 156,000, but this calculation excludes many of the smaller centres. The Mansion House Fund exceeds £70,000, a disappointing result considering the great wealth of this country, its feeling for Italy, and the magnitude and dramatic character of the catastrophe. We cannot help hoping that the private fund will be supplemented by a Government grant, especially as the United States Congress has voted £160,000. Meanwhile, the work of recuperation goes very slowly on, and even the burial of the bodies, which are being interred at the rate of a thousand a day, will take many months. Messina and Reggio are to be rebuilt, a decision owing, it is said, in some degree, to vigorous pressure from the King, who has shown his grandfather's genius for expressing and quickening the national sentiment. But a committee of experts will examine the problem.

It is a curious fact that the seismograph at Messina, which was found to be quite undamaged by the earthquake, had actually recorded the duration and character of the shocks. The first was very slight, then the tremors increased for ten seconds, and diminished for another ten seconds. After an interval of ten minutes came the great and destructive shock, which was accompanied by loud subterranean rumblings. Then followed a succession of vibrations gradually diminishing in intensity. It appears that the Pope was personally anxious to go to Messina, but the authorities decided that his rôle as prisoner of the Vatican did not permit him to pass its walls—a sadly ironic comment on human policy. It is interesting to know that the houses in Messina which were built of reinforced concrete were undamaged by the earthquake, the most useful and consoling bit of knowledge that the disaster has brought with it.

By far the most thrilling story of the catastrophe is that contributed to "Lloyd's News" by Mr. Doresa, with the special interest for Englishmen that it contains a tale of pure heroism on the part of the captain and crew of the Welsh coaling steamer "Afonwen." The captain of the steamer saw two little children crouched on the top balcony of a building eighty feet high, which had been wrenched from its supports and threatened to collapse at any moment. He got the children to lower a string to the first balcony, fixed a ladder to it, and then turned to one of his seamen with the words, "Now then, Smith!" Smith "turned his quid in his mouth," ran up the ladder, hoisted a rope by the string, induced the children, or probably one of the older inmates, to fasten it to the top balcony, swarmed up the face of the tottering ruin, and shouted when he reached it that "there were a ton of them" on the balcony, and that he could not "get them all down" by himself. The captain turned to his second mate, Read. "Now, Read," he said, and in a few seconds Read stood by Smith's side, and together the men lowered twelve cowering creatures by the rope. When their task was over, says Mr. Doresa, "they quite resented our congratulations." Apparently all the warship crews did well, and the British organisation and discipline seem to have been a chief factor in the work of rescue and restoration. At the town of Villa San Giovanni, the departure of our warships was hailed with cries of "Long live our saviours," and the Admiral received a frantic ovation.

The danger of the situation in the Near East was evidenced on Saturday when a speech by M. Milovanovitch, the Servian Foreign Minister, provoked something like an Austrian ultimatum. M. Milovanovitch declared that Austria must cease to be a Balkan Power, and that Bosnia should be given autonomy under the Sultan's suzerainty. What Austria most objected to was a phrase to the effect that she "had made slaves of two Serb lands." She demanded an explanation, and seems to be satisfied with the assurance that "subjects" was the word used, not "slaves." The occasion for so much excitement is small, but it indicates all the plainer the charged state of the atmosphere. The feeling in Austria is one of confused bitterness. The Austrians do not understand why the annexation of Bosnia should be followed by such prolonged and involved complications, and they search for some remoter cause. They are generally inclined to put the blame on this country.

On Tuesday, therefore, the "Neue Freie Presse," the "Vaterland," and other organs joined in violent attacks on England, charging the Balkan Committee "under Lord Buxton" with stirring up the Balkan peoples against Austria, and later on Sir Edward Grey was absurdly and falsely declared to have incited Servia to war. Austria should blame her own statesmen, not ours, for consequences that all men could foresee, but the indiscretion of part of our Press, and the pronounced anti-German flavor of our foreign policy render the Austrian point of view intelligible. As if the confusion were not bad enough already, there is some probability of Greece making it still more confounded by raising the question of Crete. The one lifting of the clouds is the approaching resumption of negotiations between Turkey and Bulgaria.

Riots on a rather serious scale have broken out between Hindus and Mohammedans at Titaghur on the banks of the Hooghly, near Calcutta. The Hindus appear to have been the aggressors, and, for the first time in the history of these riots, attacked a mosque, and later on desecrated it by leaving a dead pig within its walls. A mob of Mohammedans, who were working in the neighboring jute mills, then marched on Titaghur, and were with difficulty kept back by the soldiers, who fired on them. The Indian Government will, of course, act, as always, impartially between the two nationalities, for it is only one phase of Lord Curzon's policy that ever suggested that the Government should lean more strongly on the Mohammedan minority than on the Hindu majority.

The Board of Trade Returns for December are a further proof that the trade depression has reached its lowest point, and that a recovery has already begun. The imports of food and raw materials are actually above those of December, 1908, which constituted a record; and if allowance were made for the fall in prices this new record would be far more remarkable. Upon the whole, compared with other countries, we have come through the year remarkably well. Home railway traffics, which are the best index of the home trade, are only about two per cent. below last year's record, and the fall in foreign trade (due to the crisis in the United States and the failure of the Indian harvest) has been far more in value than volume. Looking back to the year 1903, when Mr. Chamberlain prophesied a fall of exports, we find an actual increase of nearly 86½ millions. The recovery from the present depression may be slow and irregular; but before the end of the year, when we hope to see a reduced American tariff in operation, we shall look for general prosperity if only peace can be preserved and the waste of public money upon armaments checked.

The Sultan's banquet to the deputies on Thursday week seems to have been an agreeable affair, bubbling over with amiable protestations. The Sultan in a speech put the Parliament next to God as guardian of the nation's welfare, and declared himself the greatest enemy of the enemies of the Constitution. Many of the deputies responded with compliments to the Sovereign in the same strain, distinctly over-done, in the judgment of the Press and of critics who kept their heads cool by keeping away from the banquet. Whether or not individual deputies hitherto bitter enemies of Abdul Hamid have compromised their dignity by excessive adulation, the wisdom of treating a Constitutional Sultan with full formal respect is sound enough. The serious business of the week has been preparation for the great debate next Monday on the Government's policy. The Cabinet is more in sympathy with Prince Sabah-ed-Din's Liberal Union, which favors decentralisation and is opposed to extreme Turkish Nationalism, than with the Committee of Union and Progress. The Committee was at first inclined to overthrow the Cabinet, but apparently has now changed its mind. Such a course would be dangerous, because the Cabinet is pretty sure of Arab, Greek, Bulgarian, and Albanian support, and the Committee in overthrowing it would be in the unpleasant position of having pitted the Turkish majority against the non-Turkish minority and raised the nationality issue at this very early stage. It is significant that important decisions of this kind rest with the Salonika Committee, which retains complete control of the Young Turkey movement and still maintains the closest secrecy as to the personality of its directing membership.

Our Paris correspondent writes:—"The triennial elections for the renewal of a third of the Senate took place on Sunday in thirty Departments (including the Seine), returning 98 Senators. There were also by-elections to fill vacancies caused by death in Ain, Bouches-du-Rhône, Corsica (2), and Lot, making the total number of Senators to be elected 103. The successful candidates are thus classified: 30 Radicals, 30 Socialist-Radicals, 27 Republicans of the Left, 2 Independent Socialists, 9 Progressists (Republicans of the Centre), and 5 Nationalists or Clericals. The contest was entirely between Republicans of various shades, the Nationalists and Clericals being almost a negligible quantity, and turned chiefly on the social question. The extinction of Clericalism is complete. The Clericals gained one seat in Seine-Inférieure, but only by an arrangement with the Progressists, who could not retain their own seats without Clerical support. They also retained one of the three seats in Orme by a similar arrangement, though even in that stronghold of Conservatism the vote of the Left has increased since 1900 from 178 to 348, the Conservative vote being proportionately reduced. The only Clerical stronghold in the thirty Departments is the Vendée, where they retained all three seats by reduced majorities. In the great majority of the Departments there were no Clerical candidates, and, where there were any, their polls were usually slight. In Vaucluse, for example, MM. Léon Daudet and Maussas, representatives of the 'New Royalism' and lieutenants of M. Jules Lemaître, polled 15 votes each out of a total of 442."

"The extinction of Clericalism is, however, an old story. The really striking characteristic of Sunday's elections was the annihilation of the Centre, which lost eighteen seats to the Left and gained none. At the same time, the most moderate group of the Left only maintained its position, without gain or loss, so that the gains were to the advantage of the Radicals and Socialist-Radicals. The restricted electorate of the Senate, which is mainly bourgeois, usually follows—at a certain distance—the decisions of universal suffrage, and this was the case on Sunday. The strength of the Centre was reduced by exactly the same proportion—two-thirds—as that by which it was reduced in the chamber at the General Election of 1906. On the whole, the Senate has advanced in the same direction as the Chamber, but it lags a little behind, as is presumably the duty of a Second Chamber, which exists in order to act as a break."

"But Sunday was, above all, a personal triumph for M. Clemenceau. In the Var he ousted his two former colleagues, MM. Méric and Sigallas, who are 'Combistes,' and carried in with him a converted Socialist workman and an ex-Boulangist, whom unkind people accuse of having changed his label rather than his opinions. Here, as in the Seine, where the 'Clemenciste' list also triumphed, the Ministerial majority was swollen by the votes of the Conservative parties. It is noteworthy, however, that M. Clemenceau pledged himself to amnesty the Draveil prisoners, who, in the ordinary course, would be tried on January 11th, so a measure for that purpose may be expected as soon as Parliament meets. It is difficult, after Sunday's results, to credit the rumor of M. Clemenceau's impending resignation which is current in political circles. M. Clemenceau is nothing if not a fighter, and there seems to be no particular reason why he should resign at this moment." Since our correspondent wrote, the difference between M. Clemenceau and M. Briand on capital punishment has been settled, and the guillotine is to be retained.

Have the British and Russian Governments abandoned the policy of non-intervention in Persia? Certainly there have been prolonged Cabinet Councils at St. Petersburg to arrange a new policy. According to the "Times," a programme of financial and administrative reforms is to be drawn up and forced upon the Shah. No hint is given in this intimation of constitutional reforms having any part in the programme, an omission which confirms the grave apprehensions felt among the Persian Nationalists at this latest form of Anglo-Russian action. What Persian Nationalists insist is that their country needs not more but less intervention, and that Russia should simply withdraw her military and financial support from the Shah, and let him settle his quarrel face to face with his people. The revolt against the Shah and the evidence of the collapse of his power grow every day. The important town of Ispahan has openly thrown off his authority. The Shah's soldiers commenced to loot the city. Whereupon some Bakhtiari tribesmen came to the help of the city, drove out the soldiers, and are now holding Ispahan, with the son of their chief as governor in place of the Shah's representative.

On Saturday an edict informed Yuan-Shih-Kai that he was suffering from an "affection of the foot," and ordered him to resign all his offices and retire to his home in Honan. Yuan-Shih-Kai is the foremost personality in China and the brain of the reform movement. As governor of Shantung in 1900 he did more than any other man to save China from dissolution. It was he who secured the famous edict abolishing literary examinations for the Civil Service, introduced modern education, directed the anti-opium movement, trained an army on Western lines, extracted the promise of a Constitution, and in his province of Chili demonstrated the capacity of the Chinese for self-government. His downfall therefore is a very grave event, especially if it means the reversal of the policy which he stood for and the dismissal of all who were associated with him in the gigantic work of rejuvenating China. He owes his dismissal to a Manchu cabal led by Tieh-Liang and Prince Chun the regent; the Manchus, of course, detest a movement which aims at abolishing all their privileges and putting the Chinese on a full equality with them. Yuan-Shih-Kai has been dismissed before, notably in 1906, but on each occasion quickly returned to power. If this time his fall is final, we may look forward to trouble in China and between China and the Powers.

The public, both Liberal and Conservative, will be interested in the frank account of the working of the Committee of Protectionists who are known as the Confederacy, written by "A Confederate" to the "National Review." The article is an avowed attempt to stampede the Free Trade minority into the Protectionist camp. The Confederacy, it tells us, was formed at a dinner party of three. Its policy is directed by a council of twelve, to whose decrees every member must bow. It has plenty of money. It comprises, says the "National Review," "many men whose pockets are as deep as their political convictions, and just as full." In any case, they are prepared to empty them now—with the possible chance of filling them later from the overflow of the new tariff. The method of working is as follows:—

> "Once a month, or oftener if necessary, the governing body meet together; reports from constituencies where the Confederacy Agents are at work, are considered; instructions in reply are issued, and any additional Free Food Unionists that may be brought to light, are 'marked down.' It sometimes happens that information is received that in a certain constituency a Free Food Candidate is likely to be adopted. In such instances the Confederacy agent in the county is communicated with, he is put on his guard, and told that the Confederacy is prepared to assist any opposition movement with funds, even to the extent of running a candidate off its own bat, if invited to do so. More than once such tactics have had the desired effect."

The immediate object of this amiable body is the destruction of the career of the fifteen Free Food Unionists in Parliament. The Confederacy do not expect that the Unionist majority will exceed between thirty and fifty, and fifteen Free Traders could easily smash a party with so exiguous a base. Every effort will therefore be made to exclude them from the next Parliament, and, if necessary, their seats will be given over to the Liberals. With this object, says "A Confederate," the Confederacy has decided to "stay its hand no longer, and before the new year is many months old it will strike."

On Saturday the well-known Russian priest, mystic, and wonder-worker, Father John of Cronstadt, died in his eightieth year, and on Tuesday he was buried amid remarkable demonstrations of personal devotion and religious fanaticism. Born of peasant stock, in the province of Archangel, he was convinced from his early years of his powers as a seer and a worker of miracles. His first and only cure was at Cronstadt, and that he made a place of pilgrimage famous throughout Russia. He was a man absolutely free from self-seeking and devoted to his flock. His disinterestedness cemented the authority and the reverence which the superstitious extended to the priest, whose prayer was believed to control the power of life and death. Men and women, but chiefly women, of every class, from prince to peasant, came under his sway, and the late Tsar specially called him in as he lay on his death-bed. Father John's mysticism was of the emotions, not of the intellect, and his sympathies and his influences were always on the side of reaction. He denounced Tolstoy almost as bitterly as did the notorious Bishop Hermogenes, and he found pogroms holy work. He was the spiritual patron of the Black Hundreds, and the Government used his prestige to the full against the revolution. In religion, as in politics, his influence was bad. He encouraged the grosser superstition of his followers, and in his later years their aberrations and vices made his name the centre of many scandals. Even so early after death he has become responsible for numerous miracles, and the Russian Church is expected to act up to its reputation by canonising him.

Politics and Affairs.

THE INFLUENCE OF KINGSHIP.

It is not surprising that the world should admire the moral devotion and physical courage of a King and a Queen, exhibited on the stricken field of the world's greatest physical catastrophe; it is a rather more astonishing fact that they should fully deserve its homage. Unreality surrounds monarchs, and it is customary to treat the most ordinary events in their lives as leaders of fashion—a King's shooting party, a Queen's visit to a bazaar—as if they indicated a life of severe mental activity. This is the penalty of constitutional rule. Such serious work as its representative does is more or less humdrum and altogether hidden from the eye, while his pleasure-taking is made to assume the severe lines of public duty. Great ability is not required of him; if he possessed it he might obtain an authority for which a democratic country has no use, and which we adjudged dangerous even when it was exercised by a Prince Consort of the character and trained powers of Prince Albert. But now and then a monarch with limited powers has an opportunity of giving his contemporaries an example of the value of such a function; and this chance has twice occurred to the head of the House of Savoy. It was not for small or merely ceremonial service that nearly as many Italian streets are called after Victor Emmanuel the First as after Garibaldi. United Italy could not have been made without his character or his position, and his grandson, schooled like the Re Galantuomo in adversity, or at least in difficulty, has almost repeated his success. He plucked his country out of the anarchy into which it was sinking as the result of an ill-judged, ill-conducted, conflict between the forces of reaction and those of revolution, and now on the heels of this political success he has achieved a moral triumph into which it is certain that no element of calculation has entered. And it is probable, the world being what it is, that no other Italian official could have achieved it—not even a President of the Italian Republic, had he been Mazzini himself. For there is something necessarily non-human about the divinity with which tradition and the half-penny newspapers hedge a king. He cannot possibly be, in fact, the "most gracious" being of the Court Circulars. When therefore a nation finds that these conventional attributes drop away, and reveal a warm heart, a brave temper, joined to a keen and sympathetic intellect, he is able to produce a moral effect, an actual healing and soothing influence in presence of a great social wound like the Calabrian earthquake, which reconciles even the philosopher to the many drawbacks of monarchy. People doubtless think, "Do the King and the Queen risk their lives? Is noblesse oblige not a mere courtier's fable? Then what they can do, a nation can do," and we imagine that Victor Emmanuel's impulsive decision that the ruined cities are to be rebuilt will put no little energy and hopefulness into the task of recuperation.

This faculty of inspiration does not, of course, reside especially in kings, unless, like Napoleon, they place the crown on their own heads. But it associates itself readily with them, even in a democratic society like our own. The modern world is plentifully provided with men who think for it, and its statesmen, if they have character, are rightly more popular than its sovereigns. But it is not so rich in figures that can act dramatically for a whole community, that, in moments of despair, can restore the broken march of humanity by sight of the flowing panache of its chieftain. This is what the King of Italy has done for his people, or for all of them to whom Royalty is still an emblem, a type of any significance whatever. Even if he had achieved less of his own initiative, his unaffected zeal and personal daring would have found a rallying point for the courage and resourcefulness of the nation. A great part of such an influence depends no doubt both on individual character and on the history of a Royal House. The House of Savoy rose to fame within living memory out of a revolution which its ablest head helped to plan, and to which it contributed personal leadership in the field. With us the public life of the monarchy, with a similar but much more remote origin, tends to concentrate itself in social and merely pleasurable functions. It is no longer possible to think of it as yielding a fully-tried soldier or sailor; constitutional as well as practical reasons prevailed against the Duke of Cambridge's leadership of the Army, and forbade a Royal successor. The Prince of Wales could not be encouraged to join a rescue party in a burning mine—the risk to the succession would be deemed to be too great—and even the Duke of Connaught has, we understand, always been refused his wish for a dangerous command on the field of battle. Sympathy can be yielded, not, save by minor members of the Royal Family, personal service. Yet we imagine that the death of a prince near to the throne on such a mission as might have deprived Italy of an able King would give the Monarchy a hold on the imaginations of the mass of British people such as, in spite of its undoubted popularity, it does not possess to-day.

What, therefore, can an English monarch do which can realise a life of use and honor for himself and yet infuse some warmth into the popular conception of kingship? One thing he cannot do, though many foolish people speak and even act as if he could. He cannot formulate or execute policy, either at home or abroad. The moment he does this, the constitutional veil falls; the King must struggle for his life and popularity with the statesman and the partisan. He is forbidden to do it by the well-cemented practice of the Constitution; he is equally debarred, as Bagehot showed long ago, by the character of affairs and the hardness and steepness of the road to mastery of them. "A King, to be the equal of his Ministers in discussion, must work as they work; he must be a man of business as they are men of business." But English society, organised as it is for pleasure, will not let the King be a "man of business." It insists on his being a master of its endless revels; it fixes, and even coarsens, his pursuits. No man thus preoccupied can order or maintain policies, as, for instance, Philip II. of Spain ordered and maintained them, any more than he can direct the prosecutions that are made in his name. But he has a function of advice, of supervising judgment, which is particularly useful, and may be not ungrateful or uninteresting to a man of good sense and of a wide experience both of politics and of the personalities who control it from the inside and the outside of Courts and Chancelleries. Such a King can always instruct a new statesman, can warn him of the foibles of Count A—— or the perilous strength of the Marquis B——; while in internal politics he can watch and even guide the decisions of Ministers, just as a permanent official influences the will of his newly-arrived chief. But the condition of such public usefulness is that the monarch who exercises it should be willing—as, for instance, Queen Victoria, with all her prejudices, personal and political, was willing—to act behind the scenes and deny himself the smallest share in his Ministers' laurels. This may seem to take the gold off a Crown. But, as the Kaiser has just realised, there is no other way of preserving its attraction. The King of Italy did not lead the forces that made for the revival of Italian Liberalism; he made the way easy for them. This is a Kingly function; its very privacy is the return a Constitutional King can yield for the flattery that must make an honest monarch despise half the men and a still greater proportion of the women who form a Court.

THE CAREER OF M. CLEMENCEAU.

The administration of which M. Clemenceau is at once the brain, the tongue, and the sword, is accustomed to describe itself as a government of combat. It is, indeed, quite unthinkable that M. Clemenceau should preside over any organisation which was not combative. To him politics are a perpetual strife, and life would lose its savor only in one possible situation—if all his opponents were to become extinct. Mere silence would be tolerable, for one can always accuse a silent enemy of conspiring in the darkness. No modern French politician, not even Gambetta, has succeeded in reproducing so faithfully the moods and poses of 1793. To the principles of the Revolution it would be flattery to suggest that he has been faithful. But its temperament he reincarnates with an almost atavistic fidelity. The conviction that all work is a sort of fighting entered in those great years into the French blood. Success is secondary, achievement a philistine test; the one essential is to fight. The builder who carries a trowel must also wield a sword, and it is the sword which he holds in his right hand. As with Robespierre, it is M. Clemenceau's affectation to consider himself a man of almost Aristotelian moderation He is invariably fighting the reaction on the Right and the "exaggeration" on the Left, and his strategy is usually that of the Revolution—to suggest that the two extremes are in secret league for the ruin of France in general and himself in particular. His idea of moderation is to destroy both the extremes. To such a temperament politics are always interesting, even when barren sessions succeed each other with an almost calculated monotony. The prosaic English Liberal is apt to ask what M. Clemenceau has done; or, in other words, what reforms has he carried? There is no satisfactory answer to that question. But, on the other hand, he has provoked the Right to physical violence and driven the Socialists into a daily anger which threatens to become monomania. And still he survives. That is his achievement, and a most exciting achievement it is. Nor is it by the duller arts that he has thriven. It is not given to the average party politician to expel Papal legates, to imprison editors, to fire on half-a-dozen crowds with ball cartridge, and when the dangers came thickest, to owe his preservation to an extempore mot, hurled at a majority which is dissolving under his eyes. Even his fall, when it comes, will be "thrilling," to use the phrase which Hilda Wangel employed when the Master-Builder fell from his steeple.

It is characteristic of M. Clemenceau that just at a moment when his influence seemed at last to be waning, he has contrived to organise a most impressive demonstration in his own favor. And certainly his power was reaching its term. The Socialists, whom he damaged severely by his success in holding them responsible for the anti-patriotism of the Hervé section, were more than recovering ground, and had just won two unexpected triumphs in bye-elections for the Chamber. The Radical section of his own party, whose moral leader is rather M. Combes than M. Clemenceau, was at last in almost open revolt over the Government's indifference to such reforms as old age pensions and the income-tax. His action in keeping in prison for eight months without a trial the Labor leaders whom he made accountable for the fusillade at Draveil, was at last too much even for a Chamber which is rarely very sensitive about civil liberty. At Christmas his position seemed shaken. But the New Year has brought him a sweeping triumph in the periodical elections for the partial renewal of the Senate. He has carried his own seat in the Var by a sweeping majority, and all over France it is his own section of the Radical-Socialists which has been elected. The reactionaries and the "Progressists" (usually numerous in the Upper House) have been largely weeded out, the disaffected Combists have done badly, and once more the Senate, always free from the taint of Socialism, has succeeded in excluding the proletariat. It would be a mistake to take this triumph very seriously, but it is none the less an efficiently organised demonstration. It serves at least to show that M. Clemenceau retains control of the governing machine.

The Senatorial elections are a test of a somewhat limited opinion. They are indirect, and allow to the rural communes a marked predominance over the towns. The constituency which votes is in each district the few local politicians who all have something to gain from the Government in power—the men who desire for their clients places as postmen or tax-collectors, or for their commune a new bridge or a waterworks. Local administration is so rigidly centralised in France that a vote of this kind means little more on the part of those who bestow it, than a conviction that the Radical-Socialists are likely to remain for some time in power. The floating opinion, the vote of the odd, uncommitted elector who shifts his allegiance and so makes and unmakes parties, is nowhere tested in a senatorial contest. But this at least is gained—that M. Clemenceau is now as clearly master of the Senate as he was of the Chamber. If reforms still linger, it will not be because a somewhat hostile Senate obstructs them. For the rest it seems to us improbable, as the gossips predict, that the Clemenceau Ministry should really collapse over an internal dissension on a point so relatively secondary as capital punishment. That might lead to reconstruction. But M. Clemenceau, after his merciless use of the rifle to repress strikes, is hardly likely to abandon power from a sensitive scruple about using the guillotine on the necks of convicted murderers. The reaction in middle-class opinion led by the "Matin," which has once more made the guillotine popular, is, moreover, precisely the trend of opinion which has welcomed M. Clemenceau's short way with strikers, as a proof that France is once more safe in the hands of a really strong man. The guillotine has long been an obsolete institution in France. M. Briand's failure to induce a timid Chamber to consent to its formal abolition does not really commit him to its revival.

The career of the present Chamber, which is now entering its last year of legislative life, has not been an encouraging spectacle to those who believed that Liberalism, atrophied and moribund everywhere else on the Continent, retained in France its full vitality. It carried on its warfare with Clericalism, until that enemy too manifestly lacked the spirit and resources to continue the fight. But of its three main points of constructive reform, Radical-Socialism has contrived to carry only the least important. The grant of old age pensions, the imposition of a graduated income-tax, and the nationalisation of the Western Railway, all challenged in some degree the interests of the middle-class. The first two would have affected that class as a whole, the last only touched a small section, and that only to an inconsiderable extent. It is the last which alone has been carried. The Pensions Bill was not, in comparison with our own, a costly measure, for it imposed contributions alike on the employer and the workman. It was dangled before the country at the General Election of 1906, a palpable bait, for it had been passed by the Chamber on the eve of the Dissolution, but not yet presented to the Senate. The Senate has quietly obstructed it, and the Government as quietly acquiesced. To-day prominent Radical-Socialists preach the advantages of a scheme based on thrift and insurance. But no costly reforms can be carried without creating new resources of taxation, for, though a vote can always be secured for the income tax, and M. Caillaux, the Minister of Finance, appears to be sincere in his advocacy, the campaign of the "Matin" seems to have paralysed the will of the party. The one tendency which really has emerged, resolute and well-organised, is the resistance to Socialism. The concrete thing which was more often present to its mind was probably that French Socialism stands for such unpopular novelties in legislation as the weekly day of rest. If the coming year should repeat the history of the three which preceded it, it is hardly likely that Radical-Socialism can remain the dominant party in France. The future seems to lie with an alliance between Combists and Socialists. The test to-day of sincerity in social reform in every European country is the readiness of any given Liberal group to co-operate with Labor. That was never possible under M. Clemenceau. He began his Ministerial career by a sensational attempt to suppress the May Day demonstration of 1906, on the plea of a Royalist plot. The Socialists, on their side, were in an impracticable mood. They have learned wisdom at length. The wiser counsels of M. Jaurès have prevailed over the ruinous tactics of the quasi-anarchist group. We are not yet at the end of the Clemenceau adventure, which has meant little but social strife at home and a risky failure in Morocco. But the gathering of other forces is already evident.

FROM PENSIONS TO INSURANCE.

A STATESMAN may count himself fortunate if, by any act of his, he can add, visibly and conspicuously, to the happiness of mankind. Mr. Asquith can realise this pleasure as he reads the newspaper accounts of the first payments of Old Age Pensions on New Year's Day. They confirm, so far as they go, all that has been urged for the Pensions Act on the ground both of humanity and of social justice. The pensioners struck all the observers as honest, decent folk, pathetically and tremulously grateful for this unexpected descent of the State to shed a little light on the end of their days, and accepting the relief both on their account and on that of their children's households. Those who have had experience of the life of the poor will realise what an immense subtraction from the bare living wage of the worker—especially of domestic servants—the struggle to keep an aged parent out of the workhouse has involved. A part at least of this great "self-denial fund" will now be restored to its proper economic uses, and the health of the workers and their general spending capacity will be proportionately enhanced. Nor, as man does not live by bread alone, need we make light of the sentiment which marks the historic hatred of the aged poor to the workhouse, and the moral defeat that retirement to it means for them. Many accounts testify to their relief at finding a way of escape from the poor man's Waterloo. "Owing to my son's work being slack, I saw the workhouse in front of me," said a Salford pensioner. "Now I can live on my 5s." At Kingston the pensioners included a man who for years had had his coffin placed in his house, so that "the parish" might not bury him when he died. "I spent my life in earning this. I wouldn't go to the guardians for a cent. I'd rather throw myself in the Cut," said a Manchester workman, and we are glad to see that more than one postmaster encouraged applicants to think that they had "earned" their pension. Thus, the Pensions Act implies not only a great material relief to households that thoroughly deserve it, but a sensible addition to the self-respect of the poor, and a spur to their self-dependence.

We have thus advanced some way towards a system of national insurance against the recurring disasters of the workman's life. Old age has been partially covered; accident is almost provided for. There remain sickness, invalidity, and unemployment. In all these departments a certain amount of preparatory and educational work has been done. For unemployment a new sifting and organising machinery has been set up apart from the Poor Law, and, as Mr. Harold Spender points out in the "Contemporary Review," the leading trade unions are rapidly adding to the volume of their "unemployed" benefits. Sickness, again, is the object of a huge voluntary organisation, to which 14,000,000 people contribute. In Germany the three cases of superannuation, sickness, and accidents are dealt with by separate organisations, of varying merit and success, with the State as a superintending and contributing agency. The machinery is a costly one, and German opinion seems agreed that its working should be unified. How are we likely to attack the whole problem? Not, of course, without consulting the trade unions and the friendly societies, or, we imagine, without obtaining their consent to a certain State superintendence of their funds, and not, we think, by a process of regimenting individual workers. For such super-organisation we are not prepared, and it may never suit the character of our people. The question is whether trade unions and friendly societies are willing to take a State subsidy or guarantee of their sick funds as satisfaction for a measure of State control, and whether employers are willing to contribute. Until there has been an exchange of views upon this vital question, our statesmen cannot advance much further.

The question of unemployment is more complicated. The Government, we gather, are preparing a scheme of Labor Exchanges in which they will be wise to give careful heed to the German experience. The German Labor Registries are built up on a plan of co-operation between the trade unions and the municipalities, which work together with much cordiality. If we are to add to labor registries, which are at once the intelligence and the distributing departments of an industrial State, a system of insurance for unemployment, we come at once to the grand difficulty of the problem. So far as we confine ourselves to the trade union area, it is not difficult to conceive a system of insurance for unemployment, supervised by the State and the municipalities, maintained by contributions from employers and employed, and managed by joint bodies such as those which administer the German sick insurance funds. For this the foundation exists, and the intelligence and experience of the great trade union officials, and the dying down of the old blind fighting spirit, are favorable to a solution. But what of the unregimented masses of unskilled labor? From them come the bulk of the recruits for the army of unemployed, half-employed, and unemployables, at which a hundred ineffectual devices of law and ill-conceived charity are aimed. The old starvation test of the Poor Law will satisfy no modern community that we can think of; and its enlightened sense will revolt equally against "doss-house" philanthropy and any State or municipal machinery which creates a "recidivist" class of unemployed, perpetually dawdling on the banks of the stream of regular industry, and never thoroughly absorbed by it. And insurance, we are afraid, is out of the question. An insurance scheme can hardly permeate a class divorced both from the factory system and from trade unionism. What then is to be done? No immediately satisfactory plan can be devised, and no single bit of social machinery is likely to work a cure by itself for an evil which reveals the worst sore in modern industrialism. Probably some indirect remedy, like the abolition of the child street-trader, would remove a great source of infection in character, which prepares the way for the shiftless weakness that drifts into unemployment. But when we have unemployment at our doors, we cannot dispense with immediate curative work. A multiplication of agencies and resources is required; and, for our part, we should like to see the report and evidence of the Poor Law Commission supplemented by a conference of Guardians, Chairmen of Distress Committees, and Superintendents of Labor Colonies. Such a body might, at least, give Government its marching orders.

NATURE'S WAR WITH MAN.

The note of awe-struck hesitancy in last Sunday's pulpit utterances well indicates the difficulty felt by most religious and reflective minds in adjusting themselves to the calamity of Calabria. Some seek or feign shelter from the avalanche of horror by reminding their hearers of what is indeed true, that, after all, the mass of suffering endured by the slain and the survivors in Messina and Reggio cannot outweigh in size or intensity that which is endured every day by humanity at large, and that this premature destruction of so many thousands at a single stroke really adds little or nothing to the sum of human misery. But such well-meant extenuation does not really serve to restore equanimity. How should it? For though the whole intellectual problem of human pain is as well contained in the single slip which breaks a leg as in this multitudinous catastrophe, the size and circumstances of this case have an emotional significance of their own which seem to lift it above the ordinary level of soft-eyed sympathy, stunning the feelings as well as the imagination of beholders. Perhaps it stirs some dim survival of the savage terror with which primitive man must have viewed eclipses, thunderstorms, or any of the smaller deviations in the path of Nature, a terror which has been suppressed by growing knowledge and confidence in natural laws. Nor can we fail emotionally to distinguish the pain and suffering in which human fault or folly enters so largely as a cause from this abrupt insurrection of the dumb, peaceful giant whom we have always found so submissive underneath our feet.

Christian people still continue to use the expression "act of God" to designate such natural calamities. But the part assigned by most religious men and women to-day to such events, in their conception of the divine government of the world, differs from that in vogue even a couple of generations ago. The change may possibly be indicated by saying that such acts are now regarded as acts of divine permission rather than of commission. The modern conception of the divine power as operative through natural laws, unbroken in their regularity, has had the effect of weakening the older "realising sense" of "the hand of God" which our fathers saw in special interpositions and interferences. The vivid realisation of direct personal intervention in the affairs of Nature has come to most readers of the Book of Job to have a merely poetic value. "Which removeth the mountains and they know not; which overthroweth them in His anger. Which shaketh the earth out of her place and the pillars thereof tremble." The reign of law in Nature is now so generally accepted that few theologians would read in this convulsion a particular decree of the Almighty, while the once familiar interpretation of such terrible events as judgments, warnings, or acts of retribution, is absent to-day from the thoughts and lips of all men. How significant a change has passed in the last century and a-half is brought home to us by the powerful and direct lines in which Voltaire set out the terrible searchings into causes occasioned by the Lisbon earthquake:—

"Comment concevoir un Dieu, la bonté même,
Qui prodigue ses biens à ses enfans qu'il aime,
Et qui versa sur eux les maux à pleines mains?
Quel œil peut pénétrer dans ses profondes desseins?
De l'être tout parfait le mal ne pouvait naître!
Il ne vient point d'autrui puisque Dieu seul est maître:
Il existe pourtant. O tristes vérités!
O mélange étonnant de contrariétés!
Un Dieu vint consoler notre race affligée;
Il visita la terre et ne l'a point changée!
Un sophiste arrogant nous dit qu'il ne l'a pu;
Il le pouvait, dit l'autre, et ne l'a point voulu;
Il le voudra, sans doute; et tandis qu'on raisonne,
Des foudres souterraines engloutissent Lisbonne,
Et de trente cités dispersent les débris,
Des bords sanglants du Tage à la mer de Cadix."

It was, indeed, little marvel that the affair of Lisbon well served, in the hands of the Christian apologists of the day, to break the optimistic Deism which sought to place the powers of the Most High in commission, sharing them out among the benevolent laws of Nature. Such misdeeds of Nature drove Voltaire himself in his later days to a virtual abandonment of his Deism, leaving him with—What?

Though, thus, after nineteen long centuries, the plain teaching of Jesus on the incident of Siloam has at length been so far assimilated by the Christian Churches that they are not disposed to consider this earthquake as a punishment calling for a formal act of humiliation, it cannot be said that any clear attitude has been substituted. For the withdrawal of such direct specific purpose only renders the divine "permission" more terribly inexplicable to those who seek to reconcile omnipotence with benevolence. There are, of course, those who recognise in this mystery the supreme act of faith, and are content to cry "Behind the Veil!" But the reason of man, God-given equally with faith, has at all times been restive under this demand, and has often driven him to take refuge in some conception of a power of evil independent of and not yet vanquished by divinity. However much repudiated in the accepted creed, this dualism, with its implication of limited deity, has ever been a practical, or—shall we say a dramatic?—necessity, for man, who has always invented evil spirits endowed with some harmful liberty in order to render the physical and moral calamities of life somehow intelligible. What more natural than that these live volcanic spots upon the earth shall be the particular habitations of gigantic beings, liable to break from their subterranean prisons and to spread sudden havoc and destruction among the race of men? Such have always been the shapes taken by the fears of men living in the near presence of the terrible powers of Nature. Can we wonder that they survive to-day among the dwellers of Southern Italy, or among the Breton fishermen?

But for those who, at least in their reflective moments, seek to image the universe as a single orderly government, embodying one continuous purpose, there is no easy foothold. For comparatively few in the modern Western world can satisfy themselves with the stoicism of a Marcus Aurelius or a Tolstoy, content to direct their individual life along a simple line of moral duty and to leave "environment" alone to work its separate will unheeded. "Security is not yours: it is not part of the plan; it would be bad for mankind if it were. But duty—life for others—is, and there lies your true happiness." But complete divorcement between Nature and Man, between science and religion, is alien from modern thought, which is ever enforcing, by new evidence, the unity of Nature with Man, of spirit with matter, and extending the analogy of their laws towards absolute identity. The new theology, with its firm assertion of this identity and its doctrine of "divine immanence," is hard put to it to furnish such an account of natural calamities as is emotionally satisfactory. For the more liberal doctrine is loath to shelter itself prematurely behind the shield of mystery, and to tell us that we must be content, without understanding, to recognise, with Mr. Sylvester Horne, that "behind even the worst that can happen to our humanity is the working of God." So long as we contrive to represent the divine responsibility in terms analogous to the human, so long as we cling, as do most even of our more liberal theologians still, to an anthropocentric attitude which implicitly regards the universe as made for man, it seems hardly possible to do aught else than banish the fearful spectacle of Sicilian suffering from the focus of reflection, and to let our sorrow flow simply and unchecked along its natural channel. "Sunt lacrymae rerum et mentem mortalia tangunt." Can anyone say more?

And yet, perhaps, if we can bring ourselves in thought to depose human life from the place of supreme dominion it has arrogated to itself, a more philosophic conception of universal order may exercise some healing influence. For if one spirit, one purpose, be really immanent throughout the order of the universe, the magnitude and various natures of this working must be such as to dwarf almost to insignificance the largest of merely human events. It was a great Italian philosopher who four centuries ago attained so clear a conception of the truth, that life and consciousness are not forces confined to detached and scattered organisms, but extend throughout the cosmic order, giving spirit to the whole, as to speak of this earth on which we dwell as "this great animal of ours." Is it an entirely barren speculation to suppose that, as in the natural and normal economy of our bodies, great clusters of cells, each endowed with a life and probably some consciousness of its own, are continually doomed to extinction sometimes catastrophic, to serve some larger welfare of the human organism, so it may be with the lives of human beings in the cosmic organism? How merely wasteful to the cell, how utterly lamentable and unmeaning, must seem the operations of that wider purpose which, from its particular place, it can neither recognise nor comprehend, and which it can only "realise" emotionally and intellectually as wanton cruelty! Only by some such extension of the organic idea, if it be legitimate, to convey the unity of purpose working on a larger cosmic plan than is represented by the pleasures and pains, or even the success and failure of humanity, can we dimly perceive the outline of some general scheme to which man's "greatness" and sorrow can contribute its little part.

Life and Letters.

SHOP LIFE AND CITIZENSHIP.

"Truck," "fines," "deductions," "living in," are words which offer to the general reader an apparatus of special and technical discussion. He is very content to leave that discussion to specialists. As a matter of fact, however, they are merely terms for problems easy of comprehension and of profound human interest. Their treatment is of immediate concern to hundreds of thousands of men and women—especially women and young girls—who are working, generally for scanty wages, in the least organised of the skilled and unskilled trades. "Truck" may be roughly defined as payment of wages in "kind" instead of in cash. "Fines" are impositions and penalties which mulct the weekly wages of certain sums, for alleged offences against order, punctuality, or discipline. "Deductions" are sums withdrawn from the wages for bad work, injury to material, for materials or tools supplied by the employers, for sick benefits, hospitals, or medical attendance. "Living in" may be interpreted as a form of "truck," mainly now confined to the shop assistants, in which board and lodging is provided by the employer as part wages for the men and women he employs. A series of enactments, extending over nearly a century, have attempted to protect the worker against various methods of withholding part of his wage: have attempted to ensure that if he be offered thirty shillings or five shillings a week for a week's labor, he shall receive at the conclusion of the contract thirty shillings or five shillings in coin of the realm. The latest—the Act of 1896—has now been in force for more than a decade. Some rather remarkable legal decisions have here—as in most recent Acts of Parliament—upset the plain intention of its framers. Nearly three years ago a Departmental Committee, under the able Chairmanship of the Lord Advocate, was appointed to consider the necessity of further legislation. That Committee, after hearing a mass of evidence, has just issued a majority and minority report.

The work is that of exploration in the underside and remote recesses of England's industrial civilisation, very largely away from the strong protections of skilled adult men's organised labor, but amongst the life of women, of girls, and of badly paid outworkers and sweated industries. It is exploration in a region where the fierceness of the competitive struggle can sweep away the elaborate protection by which men have attempted to check and control the wolf that is in men. Here factory law is evaded, because it is no man's interest to place it in operation: here Fear—the fear of poverty and unemployment—becomes a perpetual obsession. No evidence can be obtained of violation of the law, because the giving of evidence entails the risk of dismissal. All kinds of small indignities and punishments can be imposed in caprice or tyranny, because it is never worth while to complain. Here, also, as in the experience of the Sweating Committee, the workers themselves will come forward to testify to the excellence of their condition. This is especially the case amongst the shop assistants, where the efforts of the weak and struggling unions towards converting the shop employee into a citizen are countered by those who explain how much more desirable it is not to be a citizen at all—what trouble it saves in the abandonment of necessity for forethought, independence, or the exercise of any moral choice between good and evil! Again and again in the Report the statement is emphasised that where the trade unions are strong, the workers can protect themselves. The killing of the practice, "which seems to prevail to a considerable extent in the less highly paid trades," of spreading the payment of a fine over many weeks, so that "fines of £2, £5, or even £10, are imposed, and paid off by instalments of a shilling a week," and "the worker could not possibly get out of debt to the employer for years," would seem to be worth the abandonment of some of that "freedom" which the individual worker is supposed to enjoy. One of the Home Office inspectors gives examples of the offences for which girls are fined. "Wearing hair curlers in the hair" is a very frequent source of fines; "there are a great many fines in one or two factories for sneezing"; a girl is fined sixpence "because she picked a spider off the wall of the factory and put it down by another girl"; a West End dressmaker "fines her girls if they come downstairs in couples"; fetching hot water from one floor to another, making tea, eating bread-and-butter, are other offences under this pleasant system: punishable by impositions of sixpence or a shilling. And yet the working women—or a section of them—still have the audacity to demand a vote! Meantime, the best employers—such as Messrs. Cadbury or Mr. Fevens, of "Reckitt's Blue"—testify that they have altogether abolished the system of fines, with nothing but beneficial results. The minority report—signed by Mrs. Tennant and Mr. Walsh—advocate boldly the complete prohibition of the system. The majority—more timid—would limit the fines to five per cent. of the weekly wages, abolish the system of "carrying over" from week to week, and forbid fines altogether for children under sixteen years.

They are bolder in dealing with "deductions," which, in all their various disguises, they practically recommend should be altogether swept away. If material is supplied, or a "rent" for the factory demanded, that, they declare, should be taken into account in fixing the wages; but the fixed wage should be paid, apart from such charges which often reduce it to nearly vanishing dimensions. They mention many cases of abuses. There is, for example, the pen trade: the wages, from 1s. 9d. to 3s. 6d. per 100 gross. "A worker might be charged 6d. for each gross of waste, so that it is not uncommon to find a woman who would be earning 2s. 3d. for 90 gross, being fined 6s. or 7s. for waste. This would not be deducted in a lump sum; it would be impossible, because the wage would not allow it, but the employer would take off 1s. a week until the whole amount had been deducted. Meantime if the worker made any other waste it would be added to her general debt." So that the worker is in perpetual debt to her employer, and lucky (it would seem) to be permitted to labor at all, for a minus wage in this respectable and up-to-date version of the seizing of the clothes of the apprentices, which was the cruder method of a hundred years ago. Then there is the profit made by the firms who sell cotton or nails or stitching materials to their employees—above cost price. There are the deductions made by employers, often animated by a benevolent feudal intention—for sick clubs, for a system of medical insurance, for the rent of houses which they themselves own. All these find justification, and all these—in the hands of best employers—are often beneficial. But they all carry with them some elements of compulsion, and loss of freedom, which in certain cases give rise to the gravest abuses. In theory there may be little apparent difference between the workman receiving thirty shillings a week and giving back 6d. to a sick fund, and the workman receiving twenty-nine and sixpence and the employer contributing sixpence to the fund. In practice they stand as far as the poles asunder; between a system at best paternal, at worst tyrannical, on the one side, and a system which involves free choice and citizenship on the other.

It is this demand for freedom also, rather than emphasis upon particular abuses and disabilities, which is behind the agitation of the more active shop assistants, organised in their Union, for the abolition of "living-in." Here the recommendation of the Majority Report is timid and disappointing. It is not only disappointing; it seems also to run contrary to the texture of the Report itself. After drawing up a remarkable indictment of the "living-in system," with rather sensational excerpts from the evidence of abuses connected with it, the first conclusion is for regulation and inspection rather than for abolition. They elaborate the heads of the accusation; that "living-in" is generally made a condition of employment either express or implied; that the board and lodging accommodation are often inferior and inadequate; that sleeping and other accommodation was frequently bad; that on the moral side the system has not only no advantage but is actually harmful. The daily rush from counter to dining-room and back, the unappetising food, the wearying sameness of the menu, the insufficiency of the food, often supplemented by "extras" sold by the firm, like the "tuck shop" system of the English public school, are all described by actual sufferers in experience which seems to have stepped clean out of the pages of "Kipps" or "Vivian." Five beds "invested with bugs in one room," an attic in which three men sleep, that in the heat of summer smelt like a fowl-house, beds with four clean sheets in six months, rooms with rats plentiful, bedrooms which open into corridors, the light being obtainable through a pane of glass in the wooden partitions—these and other similar experiences testify to the price which often has to be paid for the "moral supervision" which the young shop-man or shop-girl enjoys. One cannot resist the conviction that in the majority of cases this claim of moral supervision is cant—the old cant of cheapness; the cant in its revived form of the "moral supervision" of the workhouse children which were bought in batches for the factories eighty years ago. An employer "would place no obstacle in the way of his male assistants marrying" is the confession of one, "though," he adds, "he certainly does not like his assistants to marry on an inadequate wage." "Male and female created he them," says Mr. Lewisham's friend in a well-known novel, "which was d—d rough luck on assistant masters." It would seem to be rough luck also on shop assistants who have the bad taste to prefer matrimony to moral supervision.

Such well-known employers as Mr. Debenham and Mr. Derry, who have changed from the living in to the natural system, brush all this cant and vapor away with a healthy breath of fresh air. "The character of some employers," says the latter, "I would not trust from their own housekeepers. I do not think that drapers are worse than any other commercial men, but all commercial men are the same." He sees "no difficulty in finding proper apartments outside" with people "in whom we should have every confidence to put our own children." "I am quite out of touch with excuses which have been made by employers at conferences I have been at, with regard to the moral side of the question. I think it is sheer nonsense." It is difficult to escape the conclusion of the minority, who advocate, after three years or some reasonable period of grace, the abolition of the system altogether. If shop assistants, specially gregarious, desire to live together and only with shop assistants, suitable hostels could be equipped for them with ease in that time. One would rather hope that they might be found, as in Scotland and many of England's great towns, to prefer to be merged in the general body of citizens. "It is unnecessary further to examine," is their summary, "the claim that a custom which has disclosed so heavy and such grave abuses has been a moral protection. Nor is it necessary to add condemnation to a system so condemned.

"NOW THEN, SMITH!"

In thirty seconds—just as long as you can hold your breath without discomfort—the thing was over and man was reduced from civilisation to savagery. There stood the modern city with its palaces and churches, its theatres and hotels, its private houses, shops, brothels, factories, lodgings, workmen's dwellings, railways, tramlines, lavatories, water pipes, gas pipes, drains, telegraph wires, stores of food, casks of drink, and all the other appliances by which people try to make their lives endurable and to conquer the uncomfortable forces of nature. There the city stood, asleep in the hour before dawn, when security is most profound, and the brains of its inhabitants, from the bishop to the scavengers, were hardly stirred with the insane dreams that vanish on waking. Then the shell of the earth warped a little, as is but natural in slowly cooling bodies, and before the dream had gone, life had gone from every two out of three among the sleepers. A crash of ruin, a roar of water, a glare of flame, and all was over. Columns of dust alone told where the civilised city had been.

Far thinner than the shell of the earth is the shell of civilisation. For thirty seconds it shook, it fell in ruins, and man became a primitive being—a poor, bare, forked animal, only the feebler for his generations of history. With hardly a shift to their nakedness, men and women stood unaccommodated, drenched by torrential rains and uttering wild screams amid the dust of falling customs. They were left as bare of progress as of clothes. Their lights were out, their fires scattered; all their careful contrivances against cold and wet were gone; stones lay on their bedding; their water pipes were split in half; their food was mashed with slime and rubbish; their gold and jewels mingled again with earth; wealth and distinctions alike were wiped away; the judge stood on a level with the man he had sent to the gallows; bishop and scavenger were united in a common brotherhood at last, as one wolf is brother to the next.

Their civilisation had vanished like their morning dreams. The curtains and partitions of life were stript away, and mankind was left unadorned and unsheltered before the stress of crude reality. "All things," said the eye-witness, "seemed to be returning to savagery and chaos." Again the world was seen to be the creature of the Power which hung it upon nothing—"which shaketh the earth out of her place so that the pillars thereof tremble." Again hell was naked and destruction had no covering. As by a glimpse into some deep abyss of the past, whence no sound can ever now be heard but the beating of time's wings, we see again the semblance of the world in her hot and uncertain youth. Upon its unstable surface, still haunted by dragons and plashing monsters, the beings which we can almost call men and women are moving about in perpetual danger and the stress of necessity, seeking their food and defending their lives with scrapings of pebbles wedged into the clefts of sticks, hiding from cold and sun in the holes of the rocks, unknowing from day to day whether the fiery world will scorch them with flames or boil them with geysers or fling them high among the snows or swallow them in a roaring chasm of slime and sea. But the people in the Sicilian town were worse off even than those primeval things who, bred among the throes of creation, protected themselves to some extent against the madness of the earth. Here in Messina man was revealed in his feeblest simplicity, unsophisticated even by a flint chip or the fell of a slaughtered bear. Here he stood, his smooth and tender skin quivering with cold and wet and pain, his body crying out for the punctual warmth of the morning meal, and his soul maddened by the unaccustomed terror of death at any second.

Fear is the strongest leveller among mankind; it reduces all to an equal brutality. More surely even than poverty it wipes out the distinctions of rank, of wealth, education, fastidiousness, and even of sex. Priest and harlot stand side by side under the all-absorbing emotion of impending death, and of the many forms of fear there is none so terrifying as the earthquake. Madness comes always very close to fear, and even a soldier under heavy fire is hardly sane. Reason no longer keeps her control, and when the fighting is long over he will duck his head if a bumble bee whizzes past. But when the foundations of the world are shaken, an instinctive madness seizes the mind. The unconscious memory of primeval disasters is aroused, and man becomes a defenceless lunatic in the presence of the destructive and irresistible powers compared to which all the artillery of "Dreadnoughts" and the hail of magazine rifles and the flash of charging cavalry are but toys. So the people of Messina stood crazed in the face of a terror which strikes the wisest with insanity.

And as the grey light of morning peered at last through the rain upon the ruins, many turned from insanity to crime. The newspaper accounts have attributed the crimes to prisoners who had stepped into freedom from their shattered gaols; but there is no reason for such a limitation. Shake the confines of convention, make detection almost impossible, and nearly everyone will turn thief. Reduce society to the grip of need, and there is hardly a man or woman who would hesitate at robbery or worse. In revolutions, in the sack of cities, in times of plague, it has been proved time out of mind, and in all three the present writer has seen it to be true. Even in Athens, when mankind had just reached the noblest flower of his civilisation, the historian, who was present, tells us that under the disaster of plague all the existence of the city was corrupted, and the people, seeing that death awaited the good and evil alike, took no account of honor, life, or property, but turned only to the enjoyment of the interval between the moment and destruction. Much more then in a city which was no better and no worse than others, after a sudden and overwhelming disaster which left the hoarded treasures open to the hand, and cowering men and women helpless and naked to the strongest arm. It does not need the habitual criminal bursting from his cell to take advantage of such a scene. So thin is the coating of virtue in which the harmless citizen wraps himself for daily use.

Almost concealed in a fog of dust and smoke and rain, Messina lay that morning in a ruin of crumbled or toppling stones, littered with dead, haunted by terror and madness, infested by crime, tortured already by thirst and hunger—a city sunk in such horror and gloom that prehistoric savagery would have seemed like cheerfulness and daylight comfort in comparison.

"Now then, Smith!" said the second mate of the "Afonwen," and the sound of his voice strikes across the scene like the cockcrow after a hideous night. Mr. Doresa, who was there, tells the story, and it is simple enough—only the rescue of some children from the fifth floor of an eighty-foot house which had toppled down and left them stranded on a ledge. Read, the second mate, planted a ladder to the first balcony, the children pulled up a rope by a string and made it firm. "Now then, Smith," said Read, and up went Smith to the tottering height. "Why, there's a ton of 'em up here," he shouted down. "I can't manage all by myself." "Now, Read," said the captain, and up went Read, and down came the children, ten of them in turn, and at last a fat woman and a man. Then the two sailors came down themselves, and that is the whole story—a simple enough thing, that anyone would love to do, if only he were able and had the chance.

But how it shines like a gleam of reason in a madhouse, and purges the air as of pestilence! It was the first sign of the returning spirit of man. Matchboard as the partition between man and beast is seen to be—rapid as is man's degeneration to the primeval savage when fear or need possesses him, yet, say the worst of him that we can, here is at least a point that he has reached beyond the conception of the beast or that prehistoric thing. Here is something which nature outside man's spirit cannot do—something of the quality which gave the great thinker the same sense of awe as he found in the starlit firmament, and nowhere else in the universe besides. It is that kind of "morality," as Matthew Arnold called it, which nature saw only when she lay upon the breast of God—a morality not of rules and laws but of the instinctive soul—a way of duty that, in spite of storm and death and earthquake, may yet almost be said to preserve the stars from wrong. After all his inconceivable generations of struggle and anguish to have won so much as that is something to the credit of mankind.

We will not make light of the services of others—not of those dim, grey monsters from our Navy which loomed up through the rain of the following morning; still less of the Russian sailors, so characteristic in the almost womanly tenderness of their race. It is good to belong to a species which can produce such beings as sailors so frequently are—chiefly, we suppose, because they habitually follow Nietzsche's counsel and "live dangerously," exposed to death and reality from day to day. It is good to think that our coasts still produce many thousands of the type, so brief in word, so ready in action ("Now then, Smith!" "Now, Read!" and the thing is done). But on this occasion the best honor lies with the crew of the "Afonwen," for they brought the first glimmer of returning light after the darkest catastrophe of the world. Afonwen is but a bare village at the top of Cardigan Bay. A fortnight ago it was unknown except as a little junction where one changed for the few miles of railway to Pwllheli. But now, whenever the story of earthquake is told, the people of Afonwen will sun themselves in a reflected glory, because an insignificant steamer carrying coal to Sicily was called after its name.

THE WORD AND THE DICTIONARY.

We dip into a great author, and wonder how he does it. Too seldom do we remember how much goes to the literary art, how many different kinds of effort are concerned in it, how necessary each is to the other if some degree of perfection is the conscious or sub-conscious end. Words, though but a part, are a goodly part, of the stock-in-trade. Without an ample and various equipment of words no writer could ever win a place among the classics, and the mere gathering and storing of words in sufficing quantity is a task terminable only with life itself.

We contemplate Shakespeare's vocabulary in the Cowden-Clarke Concordance, and think of Sancho's exclamation to his master: "You are a devil at everything, and there is no kind of thing in the 'versal world but what you can turn your hand to!" For Shakespeare has a full and teeming vocabulary on all manner of subjects. Consider his wealth in the vocabularies of the terms assigned to strength, to the sublime, to death, to the concrete world, to the whole range of the feelings between pleasure and pain. It profits nothing to ask how Shakespeare amassed these treasures; there are riddles deeper than the Sphinx's.

Shakespeare's case is single and unmatched; but we view with pride and a just envy any writer whose power over words lifts him far above the general. It is a distinguishing possession of all writers of the first order. In the nineteenth century the three whose range is greatest are, probably, De Quincey, Macaulay, and Carlyle. From out the long roll of English writers of genius, Lord Acton's chosen pair are Burke and Macaulay; and to the second (in a letter to Miss Gladstone, was it not?) he allots the higher place. Ruskin's choice of words was a very large one; and Cardinal Newman, who ranges as freely over the garnered wealth of the language, uses it, on the whole, with a more consistent art. Lord Morley, at present perhaps our best and purest writer of prose, spoke of Newman's some years ago as an illustration of the perfect style.

No man's vocabulary is equally serviceable on all subjects. "A writer naturally accumulates words in the line of his strongest interest." De Quincey, whose use of Latinised terms has been pronounced excessive, has an abundant stock of metaphysical words, and seldom thinks slang beneath his dignity. Macaulay's vocabulary presents very few peculiarities; he astonishes rather by what Mark Pattison calls the "glittering masque and cosmoramic revel" of his pages. Carlyle, who cultivates the eccentric as studiously as Macaulay eschews it, dazzles by an array of words which, says Minto, gives him a very high place among the few that stand next to Shakespeare. The language of mathematics is very familiar to him, that of natural philosophy not less so; he has a mastery of the terms of several trades; his hyperbole is unsurpassed; and as a coiner of humorous, grotesque, and derisive epithets he has no rival save Rabelais. "Reading maketh a full man," says Bacon; and we may take it as generally true that the men of all-embracing vocabularies have been large and multifarious readers. It is beyond our knowledge whether Shakespeare conformed or was an exception to the rule. De Quincey at Oxford is a very shadowy figure, but somewhere in the "Autobiography" he informs us that this was the period at which he began to be intimately acquainted with English literature. R. L. Stevenson tells us, in the autobiographical essay, "A College Magazine," that as a youth he "lived with words"; he dwells humorously on the "monkey tricks" and "ventriloquial efforts" through which in happy time he learned the essential note and the right, inevitable term. Lord Morley, in his noble essay on Machiavelli, remarks on the Italian's power of throwing "pregnant vigor into a single concentrated word"—one of the greatest of all achievements in writing. Ruskin, in the beautiful lecture, "Of Kings' Treasuries," offers to beginners in the art this counsel of perfection, that—> "you must get into the habit of looking intensely at words, and assuring yourself of their meaning, syllable by syllable—nay, letter by letter."

Ruskin practised to excellent purpose his own severe preaching; his employment of words is oftener than not of an unexceptionable rightness. For this kind of study, however, if we are to get far with it, we must have ready access to a complete and veracious historical dictionary.

In glancing through the ninety-two pages of the new section of the "Oxford English Dictionary" (Frowde), we found ourselves wondering how many young writers of this day put aside an occasional half-crown for the periodical instalments of this mighty work. It is, indeed, as nearly an *al*mighty work as any we have ever beheld. "This stupendous mass of paper," cries Macaulay, in derision of the bulk of Nares's "Memoirs of Burghley," which, he goes on, weighs sixty pounds avoirdupois, and might, before the deluge, have been considered as light reading by Hilpa and Shalum. Sir James Murray, the editor in chief, could possibly tell us the weight of the first six volumes of the Dictionary (the part before us, "Movement—Myz," completes the sixth), but we cannot be far wrong in saying that a word-book which is not "a stupendous mass of paper" is nothing at all.

We mean, of course, that the better it is the bigger it must necessarily be. For the perfect dictionary (and this is the only perfect one in the world) will give us everything that is contained in the language it expounds. It will give us all the words that the language acknowledges; the good words and the bad ones, the slang words as well as the literary ones. It will give us their origins, their development from original roots or stems, their meaning and changes of meaning, their history, their right uses and their false uses. Synonyms and homonyms should find their place, together with words of opposite signification, and words obsolete along with the most recent comers. In Volume VI. of our new "Murray," for instance, the article on the verb make fills eleven pages of three closely-printed columns.

Take, from the latest part, the curious little word Mrs. In function, Mr. and Mrs. have ceased to be mere abbreviations; they have come, as Dr. Bradbury says, "to be the sole recognised modes of writing the titles which they represent, and are therefore here treated as independent words." Mrs., as we know, was originally written Mistress; and in the 17th century it was often written for Mistress in all uses. "Pray, Mrs., what did that Minister say to you concerning Mr. Oates?" "A man of Mrs. Turner's was sent . . . to meet his Mrs. at Ware," and so forth. In the latter half of the 17th century, says Dr. Bradbury—

> "there was a general tendency to confine the use of written abbreviations to words of inferior syntactical importance, such as prefixed titles. The term Mrs. for Mistress therefore fell into disuse, except when prefixed to a name; and in this position the writing of the full form gradually became unusual."

Originally pointing to gentlewomen—

> "the use of the prefix has gradually extended downwards; at the present time, every married woman who has no superior title is styled 'Mrs,' even though her husband is of so humble a position as not ordinarily to be referred to as 'Mr.'"

This is a very tiny example, but it helps to show what a living and lively thing the monumental Dictionary is. Better pieces could be given, had we space to notice the articles on murder, much, mystery, &c. Not only is the information more detailed and accurate than in any other English dictionary; the manner in which it is given invites attention and interest. Voltaire declared that a dictionary without quotations was little better than a skeleton. How would he have applauded Sir James Murray and his colleagues! In this one instalment, extending only from "Movement" to "Myzostomous," the number of illustrative quotations is 10,072.

Now, is not this a work to recommend to the literary student anxious on the score of his vocabulary? We may be reminded that there are such phrases as "inkhorn terms" and "dictionary words." We do not forget them, nor do we forget that they are phrases of reproach. But at whom, pray, are such reproaches levelled? They are levelled, not at the artist, but at the pedant. The "inkhorn terms," with which the pedant bemuses his readers and himself, are life and strength to the artist. When Lyly publishes a tract in the Marprelate controversy, called "Pappe with an hatchet, alias a figge for my Godsonne," we smell the oil afar. When Stevenson writes, with absolute accuracy, of "plangent" wars, we are braced, stimulated, and delighted:—

> "The shadows and the generations, the shrill doctors and the plangent wars, go by into ultimate silence and emptiness."

This is no blurred effect, but the most vivid color. It is easy enough to go astray in dictionaries, but the artist does not do so. A man who loved dictionaries heart and soul was that coruscating genius Théophile Gautier. As Huckleberry Finn, with an eye to profit, "wollered" in Sunday schools, so did Gautier, for the pure literary pleasure of it, wallow in word-books. M. Emile Faguet, in the "Literary History of France," is our authority.

> "Among his favorite books were dictionaries, whether of ordinary language or of old French or of technical words. He, too, like Nodier and Courier, conferred the greatest services on the French language, enriching it by the revival of forgotten words, by the introduction, certainly too indiscriminate . . . of terms borrowed from arts and crafts."

Here is prospect of a double reward for the nice student of dictionaries. Adding continually to his treasury of words, he may, while so doing, make language itself more affluent, by the judicious placing of apt, graphic, and stable words—from the Saxon especially, let us say—that are now as foreign to the newspaper as to the breakfast-table. With such a world of terms as Sir James Murray lays open to us, the opportunity is one to find account in; for the "Oxford Dictionary" is no less a work than Archbishop Trench's ideal "inventory of the language"; exhaustive, we may almost say, from every point of view. For the genuine word-lover and word-hunter, it is his book of the revelation, making him privy to all the seven seals of etymology and the rest of it.

Dictionaries, said Dr. Johnson, in an hour of unwonted contrition (though Macaulay rightly says that the Doctor's own Dictionary was "the first which could be read with pleasure"),

> "are like watches; the worst is better than none, and the best cannot be expected to go quite true."

Sir James Murray's will go true enough for a century or so of English wearers.

FRESHENING BY FROST.

On a certain Tuesday that every reader may recall we came to the river on pike-fishing bent. There had been a little frost the day before—just enough to make the fish hungry—and it was in that evening that the fishing expedition had been planned. And now the world was clad in deep, silent white, over which a freezing wind drove a storm of snow that stung like ice-needles. The metal of our fishing gear, which, we afterwards were to learn, would stick to the bare skin and almost drag the skin off, now chilled through the gloves and made the fingers as though the veins had turned to ice. When we turned into the Angler's Rest to thaw out, the process inflicted indescribable agony. Then out again into the white world to the deep, black river, the only thing untamed into winter livery.

But even the liberty of the river had in a measure succumbed to that sharp frost, short as it was. It was caked across with a greenish-grey mixture of snow and water, a nap of slush sustained by the first open weaving of the frost loom. The bait and lead could break their way through, and then the float sat on the ice, and proceeded to freeze there. When the run came, the float went, not under water, but under ice, and if the fish released it, it bumped somewhere against the ceiling, possibly making a dim glow of red if the ice was at its thinnest just there. The pike we struck came shorewards with difficulty, just giving us an idea of his length by a sweep of his tail through the crust, and then escaping without the frozen dinner he had planned for. When the flow over the weir strengthened a little, clear water came at the head of the pool, but a bait cast there never received attention. The fish kept under the ice, as though it had been warmer there than in the open water.

In the farmyard close by, the fowls had fed and retired in a cluster to their perches. The sparrows that would have come for the remains had been dispossessed by a cloud of starlings, not a whistle in them to-day, as they sat on the edge of an apparently empty trough. It had contained food, and, after the manner of the fields that constantly present a new supply of worms, it might sprout a fresh supply of barley-meal at any moment. At any rate, the chance was better there than in the endless white of the water meadows. A robin, out of pure friendliness for man, came and sat, as though for a Christmas card portrait, on a twig of last year's water plantain sticking out of the ice near our bank. A wagtail that feasted all the summer at the waterfall perched on a little iceberg that went floating round the pool as the Mayflies used to float. He flirted his wings in summer manner, and made a peck at the barren ice, as though it had swarmed with fat grubs good to eat. Lastly, a mournful little long-billed bird, a jack snipe, came flying round the open water, passed just below the tip of the rod, and, alighting, surely by mischance, in a square yard of open water, swam to the bank, and sat there, too glum to look for food in the most likely place within a two-mile radius.

Less than two days later the river was free again, the snow sheet sank through the grass, the plastered ice came off the trees, the snipe went back to its normal quarters, the starlings chattered again and walked, sun-glancing, after grubs, the weather was as mild as in the pre-glacial period. We cannot find that any damage has been done to anything by the late frost. Cold does not often, if ever, kill our birds, and the spell was not long enough to starve them. It merely made them tame, either out of desperation at the loss of their food supply or, as it made us, listless, and vaguely desirous of going to sleep till the hard time was over. Here was the opportunity of their enemies, especially the four-footed animals who do not often get on terms of such equality. But fox and weasel find a sudden snatch of cold even more soporific than the birds. Our fox does not seem to have moved while the snow was on the ground, and, except for a blackbird that a cat has caught or found dead, the supply of birds is as it was.

The lake is still thinly and rottenly coated with ice. The moor-hens sit hunchbacked high in the alders, as though they were afraid that the fox might stalk them across the ice. Their period of foodlessness is probably longer than that of the other birds. On the other hand, it is always a matter for complete wonder what the moor-hens eat, even in an open winter. Some of the ducks have departed for a better foraging ground. On the same errand came a woodcock to the soft place in the wood that usually attracts the bird when other haunts are frozen. Though we have often had evidence that the feeding there is far from indifferent, it is a place held strictly in reserve, for as soon as the thaw begins there is no more hope of finding a woodcock within a mile of it. Wherever our late visitor may be, if he were shot to-day he would be found to be perfectly fat.

The tender, defenceless flowers have escaped no less safely than the birds and animals. Who would believe that those fragile blossoms which were lately the wonder of our record autumn could withstand that cracking frost and the drive of the ice-storm? We saw them yield point by point to the obliterating snowflakes, and expected to see them no more. In the blizzard they became fleurs glacées, but when the thaw unprisoned them, the tears merely rolled off them, and they smiled again as confidently as before. In their glasshouses the cold, half of which would have wilted them had they been bare, could not harm them. The ice-needles that were hurled against them, even if they had entered their tissues, would not have torn them as would drops of water forced in, then expanded on freezing. So the late frost has not torn the alder catkins on which the tits wait, or the fir cones whose seeds the greenfinches would gladly see; nor has it cut flakes from the wall nor burst the little branches of the ash, nor even spoilt the progress of the veronica and pimpernel that have covered the ploughing with plants on which you can still find blossoms.

It is a truism that a fall of snow keeps the earth warm. There is also a mechanical perfection about melting snow not so frequently remarked but none the less true. We must see the spring flowers coming up under the snow itself in the Alps to understand how they relish this, the softest of all irrigations. The snowdrop shoots have grown perceptibly under the snow. When the sheet of white vanished from the fields, the white spots of newly-opened daisies remained. The blossoms are in thousands, for we must not allow the daisy's glory to be dimmed by the fact that it groups every hundred florets or so into a separate head. We can follow the daisy chain everywhere through the fields, standing at one flower and finding the next before we move on. The new honeysuckle leaves are as fresh as before the frost. The hazel catkins are still within a sunny week of flinging their dust to the winds and to the little red fingers that sleep in the big buds beneath them. The earth is just freshened up after the snow, as by the dash of a cold sponge. But if the tightening of the air this evening means black frost on a world unprovided with blankets, there may soon be another tale to tell.

Short Story.

THE DEAN'S DILEMMA.

Francis Royle Cope, D.D., Dean of Morechester, stared at the manuscript incredulously. Although his own composition, it shocked, not to say affrighted, him. It seemed impossible that a man of his dignity and position could have written such a revolutionary thing. Only a short hour before he had sat down with the full and benevolent intention of preparing a conventional homily, which no one would heed, but which everyone would be pleased to hear, on the Christian Duty of Loving One's Enemies—with this bewildering and heterodox result! He had ended by being himself unable to distinguish friend from foe in the whole length and breadth of creation. True, he had always known that the world was round; but he had never suspected that its rotundity was so general and complete as this. He drew his hand across his forehead like a man awaking from a nightmare; then, moving to the window, as if to throw additional light on the matter, re-read the strange exegesis.

The impression which this second perusal induced was less one of alarm than of amazement at his own cleverness. Like Dean Swift, on another memorable occasion, he suddenly realised what a genius he was. An Archimedean impulse to rush out and proclaim his discovery to the world seized him. But the Church, he timely reflected, and least of all that section of it known and respected as Morechester Cathedral, had no place or use for so very disturbing and vulgar an element as genius. It were unwelcome as a thunderbolt. Even laymen, notwithstanding growing and avowed indifference, drew the line at anarchists.

No, it would never do to preach such a full gospel, he reflected sadly. The effect would be too sensational. It might paralyse instead of save. Not even the flattering presumption, to which his own wife bore witness, that no one listened to sermons nowadays, would persuade him to take the risk. Some stray and ambitious reporter might be present whose trained instinct would tell him, or ever the Dean opened his lips, that he was about to listen to the most stupendous revelation of modern times. The preacher's exalted manner and consciousness would be enough to betray him. By the space of half an hour the worthy man allowed himself to luxuriate in that dramatic scene; then, with heroic resignation, locked the explosive secret in his desk.

He would keep the divine knowledge to himself. Not for worlds would he expose society to such awful danger. People were still childish and unreasonable. They only cut themselves with two-edged swords. He himself doubted it; but the wise and prudent thought otherwise. True, God made everything; but if a man were to write a Defence of Poison he would be regarded as an iconoclast. Well, perhaps, the world would find out for themselves in time, with marked increase to their freedom and happiness. They could not go on for ever in blindness and ignorance. They would take to themselves teachers who held back nothing for their own professional ends. Meantime, it was none of his business to enlighten them. But—inspired thought!—a domestic experiment might be made even if the public were to be spared. And since the theologian, unlike the scientist, is limited to the human species, what better subject than his own wife could be had or desired? Being his third, she was less likely to lose her head than if she had been born a generation or so earlier. It might even raise him in her estimation.

With this vivisectionary idea and resolve, the Dean opened his study window and let himself out on to the large and beautiful garden, which a grateful Church allotted him in part-payment for his services. He cleared his throat as he went, either from clerical habit, or with the view of preparing his spouse. That unsuspecting and accomplished lady was reclining, more easily than gracefully, in a hammock, one hand absently caressing her schipperke, while with the other she held a novel whose title and reputation stamped her as a woman of the world. Perhaps because of her literary absorption she made no sign of recognition notwithstanding that the Dean coughed thrice within a couple of yards of her; but the dog growled with just that degree of irritation which a privileged lover might allow himself at sight of the lawful husband. It suddenly flashed upon him that Woman, spite of every appearance and belief to the contrary, was the coolest and completest creature on God's earth. It would not be her fault if the world came to an end. Compared with her, man was hysterical and fickle. The thought was like a dash of cold water to his enthusiasm.

"Well, my love," he began, nervously, "how do you like your new book?"

"Have you finished your sermon already?" she asked, without lifting her eyes from the interesting volume in question. "It hasn't taken you long," she added, either in compliment or reproof.

"Long enough to go to hell and back," the Dean replied, stung by her indifference at such a great moment. He did not grudge the recoil provided he hit her effectually.

Georgina Cope half raised herself on her elbow and surveyed the speaker as though he were an interesting stranger. The dog, scenting domestic disturbance, barked indignantly.

"Whatever has happened, Francis?" she exclaimed, as though he had a black eye at least.

"You don't think me cracked, Georgina?" he postulated rather than inquired.

"Poor dear!" she replied, evasively, stretching out her hand and three-parts of a lovely bare arm to him. "Let me examine its clever head. You have been working too hard," she diagnosed, making a hieroglyphic on his scalp with her forefinger in sign that he was to rest from his labors.

"I don't know," he confessed, mollified by this treatment; "but I have written the most awful sermon. Now, it's farewell to the Church if I preach it—or not, perhaps. The cat's out of the bag with a vengeance."

"I don't understand," she admitted, glancing at her schipperke as though considering the effect which this feline escape might have on his future; "but if it is as dreadful as all that, why don't you burn it and write another?"

"There are some things one can't destroy," he replied, profoundly. "It's really serious, Georgina."

"Well, that's all right in a sermon, isn't it?" was the cheerful return.

"Oh, you don't understand!" he rejoined, in evident distress. "You have simply no idea what a—a crisis it is. There's a great difference between a poor sermon and one which is too awful to utter. This touches the very core of civilisation."

"Then I should preach it if I were you," was the wifely advice. "They might make you a bishop."

The poor man groaned at the episcopal prospect. He envied his gardener.

"What's your text?" she catechised, with unexpected suddenness.

"'Love your enemies,'" he answered, almost like a schoolboy.

"Well, that's all right," was her lively comment. "One can't go very far wrong there." She yawned elegantly. "It's not usual to love one's enemies; but, as Mr. Kipling says, that's another story. You must make some allowance for people who go to church."

"But it's not that, Georgina," he returned, more hurt and disappointed than he cared to own. "It's the treatment."

"Quite so. All depends on how people treat one." She yawned again, and at greater length. "But why don't you fetch this wonderful sermon of yours? I don't mind being horrified in the least. Indeed, I had begun to think that there wasn't a single surprise left anywhere."

The Dean flushed. It was the weakness of his profession that everyone knew from Sunday to Sunday, from year to year, what he would preach. The Church was stationary and impotent. It was a mere grandmotherly institution. It had nothing in common with the radical Christ. Instead of being ahead of the world, leading it o'er moor and fen, it was immeasurably behind it. Men were crying for strong meat, and she still offered them pap. No, it wasn't a man's work—not yet. His back stiffened, his face grew stern.

"What's your point?" his wife continued, with a sudden suspicion. "You surely don't approve of murder and things?"

"Murder happens, my dear," he answered simply. "The Mosaic Law, backed by the executioner, hasn't put a stop to it in several thousand years."

"But it's wicked, all the same," she replied, sitting up in her hammock and watching him narrowly.

"But yesterday," he said, with more exultation than fear, "the God who made earth, sea, and sky swept away tens of thousands of men, women, and children. Society is horrified at the very act which sets them free! Well, the world will begin to love its enemies when it has become deadly sick of its friends. The revolt has begun. Plainly, these things are done and allowed, and the kingdom of God which is built on any other foundation is artificial. It does not take into account all the circumstances of existence. Its pietism and exclusiveness are enough to drive the poor and outcast mad. The society which depends on any human decalogue alienates half the world, insults the Almighty, and is always living on the brink of a volcano. It isn't Life!"

The Dean's face was transfigured. His wife rolled off the hammock, ignoring her dog and her novel, and took his arm with a strange, new affection. All the vanity and listlessness dropped from her. Her eyes shone brightly and earnestly. The divine mystery enfolded her. Her whole nature was quickened. In the presence of death she felt alive.

"The theologian," continued the Dean, pressing her arm absently, "has to deal with facts, not with human prejudice and opinions. He is not an idealist, but a seer; not a pedagogue, but a cicerone; an analyst, not a judge; a mirror, not a sweeping-brush. His not to question Life, but to approve and justify it to his fellows. His not to condemn men, but to give them absolution in the Name of Christ. So will all vice and hate die a natural death. The world is always safe in God's hands, dear. Instead of simply preaching this gospel, which almost goes without saying, the Church has been guilty of gross impertinence to God and man alike. She has laid on men burdens grievous to be borne. The result is widespread hypocrisy and unbelief. To narrow human choice and action is to breed a class of Pharisees and hypocrites on the one hand, and of rebels on the other. But a good time is coming."

"You'll preach it, then?" she whispered, breathlessly.

"That or Nothing!" he answered, determinedly.

The Drama.

DE JUVENTUTE.

Yes, yes, I am growing old; there is no doubt about it. If by nothing else, I can measure the lapse of time since I was young at criticism by the change—for the better: oh, yes, certainly for the better—in editorial ethics. In my young days, an editor would suffer no one to question the infallibility of his critic. If an exasperated author wrote to the paper (except, perhaps, on the plainest matter of fact) his letter was either quietly wastepaper-basketed, or forwarded to the critic, that he might store it up and "have his knife in" the audacious dramatist at the next opportunity. Quite seriously, this was a barbarous state of things; and again and again, in those far-off days, I urged its reformation. There is no reason why critics should affect to be infallible; and there is every reason why an injured, or merely irritated, author should be suffered to have his say—if his friends cannot keep writing materials out of his reach. So far, I applaud the humane impartiality of the modern editor. But I do not quite see what dictate of humanity or maxim of policy compels an editor to inform the world, on the authority of an anonymous "Old Playgoer," that his critic is a doddering reactionary, blind to the abounding merits of "our latest drama." When I noted in the contents of last week's Nation a letter on "Mr. Archer's Criticism," by an Old Playgoer, "Aha!" thought I, "here has some generous champion come forward to defend me from the merciless onslaught of Mr. St. John Hankin. Now for some balm to my wounded spirit!" But when I turned to the page—oh, dire disappointment! oh, cruel deception!—the Old Playgoer merely rubbed brine into my sores. He thought, indeed, that Mr. Hankin had gone a little too far in calling me a rat: rather because "our latest drama" is by no means a sinking ship, than on account of any fundamental inaptness in the simile. But otherwise he vowed that I richly deserved every stroke of my castigation. To the Young Playwright's whip, in fact, the Old Playgoer did his best to add scorpions.

I had intended to take no notice of Mr. Hankin's letter. He was very naturally irritated by my low opinion of his play, and he is not a man who consumes his own smoke. He is not built that way. His letter was signed "Hankin, iratus," just as plainly as another famous letter is signed "Johnson, impransus." No one pays much attention to a little effervescence of temper, and I was perfectly willing to let the reader take the document at its face value. It advanced no argument, set up no defence. It merely declared—what the world might perhaps have been willing to take for granted—that Mr. Hankin thought very much better of his play than I did. But now comes our Old Playgoer and takes up the tale in cold blood. He has presumably—one could judge better if he had signed his name—no personal reason for irritation. It is sheer disinterested enthusiasm for "The Last of the De Mullins" that impels him to countersign Mr. Hankin's certificate of my critical decrepitude. Now, this is serious. Even intelligent people like the readers of The Nation are apt to take things for true which they see constantly asserted without contradiction. After a few more communications from "Wiseacre" and "Scholastikos" and "Hankin for Ever," and "Another Hankinite," I should begin to believe them myself, and send in my application to the Editor for an old-age pension. Therefore, just by way of reassuring readers who may wonder why the theatrical criticism of The Nation has been confided to a dotard, I think it may be worth while to show that when Mr. Hankin and his admirer accuse me of having no sympathy for "our latest drama," they talk preposterous nonsense.

Mr. Hankin's indictment is the more detailed of the two. He charges me with "entire failure to appreciate or to understand Mr. Galsworthy's 'Silver Box,' Mr. Barker's 'Weather Hen,' 'The Marrying of Anne Leete,' or 'The Voysey Inheritance,' or any of the later work of Mr. Shaw." Well, I have had the curiosity to look up my notice of Mr. Galsworthy's play, and I find that this is the gist of it:—

> "'The Silver Box' is an indictment of society all the more telling because it is studiously unemphatic and unrhetorical. . . . . Mr. Galsworthy is here telling the truth, and telling it with a great deal of artistic originality. . . . . He has certainly produced a play which would do no discredit to the German master [Hauptmann]."

I defended his technique against the old-fashioned objector, but said that he ought not to take his audience quite by surprise in the dropping of his curtain. This was the one word of—I will not say censure, but advice—in the whole article. Perhaps I may have mispraised the play, but assuredly I did not dispraise it. As for "The Weather Hen," I forget what I said of it; but I know that Mr. Barker, instead of writing to the papers to prove me an imbecile, retorted in the only effective fashion—by setting to work and producing immeasurably better plays. "The Marrying of Anne Leete" I never saw, and consequently did not criticise. "The Voysey Inheritance" I think one of the most remarkable plays of our time, and have never tired of saying so, in and out of season. Again it may be held that I mispraised it; but if I had mispraised "The Last of the De Mullins" to the same tune, I do not think we should have heard any complaint from Mr. Hankin. Of "Waste" I need not speak, for even the Old Playgoer admits that there I rose to the occasion. As for Mr. Shaw's late plays, it is possible I did some injustice to "Major Barbara"; but "John Bull's Other Island" and "The Doctor's Dilemma" I praised with all my might; while my opinion of "Getting Married," produced while I was abroad, remains locked in my own bosom, whence even wild Hankins shall not extract it. In investigating my disreputable past, Mr. Hankin omitted to note what I am told is a sad blot on it; my treatment of "The Campden Wonder," by Mr.

John Masefield. Certainly I did not like the play; but if I had been in England when "Nan" was produced, I hope and believe that I should have made Mr. Masefield amends. By the way, Mr. Hankin might in justice have given me credit for the lucid interval in which I praised without stint—and without even alluding to its one rather serious fault—that clever little comedy "The Charity that Began at Home." On the morrow of that pleasant production, I fancy I was rather a great critic from the Hankin point of view.

Now let me turn for a moment to the Old Playgoer. (I wish, by the way, he would send me a certified specimen of his snowy locks. His style is very like that of some Young Playgoers I could mention.) He assures me that Mr. Hankin is "trying to walk in Ibsen's paths," and reproaches me with admiring the "frank brutality of Hedda Gabler," yet being "scandalised by the brave outspokenness of Janet de Mullins." To tell the truth, I do not remember any frank brutality in Hedda Gabler; I never thought frankness one of her vices. But, in any case, Hedda Gabler is not held up to admiration, as (whatever the Old Playgoer may say) Janet most assuredly is. If Mr. Hankin intended her portraiture to be "impersonal" and impartial, then he is a much greater blunderer than I take him to be. In case the Old Playgoer may wish to know more definitely what I mean by Mr. Hankin's tactlessness, I will give him an instance, not from the part of Janet, but from that of her ex-lover. This gentleman meets Janet casually in a wood, and learns, to his great surprise (the incident always takes people utterly by surprise on the stage) that she has had a child by him. He is now engaged to another lady—I forget her name—say Doris. He stands looking at Janet's boy playing about in the wood, and then, turning to Janet, he says, "I wonder if Doris and I will have a boy like that?" I forget whether Janet pursues the interesting speculation; but the speech, by itself, is one of the most amazing I ever heard on the stage. Tactless is scarcely the word for it: indeed, no single epithet quite meets the case: one wants a "portmanteau word" compounded of silly, clumsy, boorish, bounderish, unpardonable, incredible, and idiotic. Not on the paths of Ibsen did Mr. Hankin cull this flower—not even on the paths of Shaw. On the whole, I would counsel Mr. Hankin to try other paths, if he conceives that those of Ibsen lead to "The Last of the De Mullins." He will doubtless remember the fable of the cricket who took it into his head that he ought to roar like a lion; but the sound he emitted was so harsh and unendurable that Mr. Man, who had formerly loved the merry little chirrupper, one day lifted up his boot and squelched him.

Now, seriously, as to "our latest drama" and my attitude towards it. The plain truth is that I have consistently fostered it and fought for it, even at the cost, sometimes, of my sense of proportion. I have several times been guilty of praising plays, not, indeed, insincerely, but with a careful suppression of the final, essential truth, which was that, tried by any exacting standard, they were very small beer indeed. I have, for instance, been laboriously civil to the thin, shrill, clevernesses of Mr. Hankin, and have done my best to dissemble the fact that, whatever their little merits and defects, they were really very insignificant productions. I will now emulate the "brave outspokenness" of Janet, and confess that, so far as one can judge from present appearances, the hopes we founded on the Court Theatre movement were in great measure fallacious. Mr. Shaw apart, of course, the one assured gain the movement has brought us is Mr. Granville Barker himself. What he may yet do, no one can say; but even if he were to do nothing more, "The Voysey Inheritance" and "Waste" have secured him a permanent place in our theatrical history. Mr. Galsworthy remains something of a "dark horse"; so does Mr. Masefield. For the rest, the reputation of the dramatists of this school seems to be founded rather on the plays they intend to write than on those they have written. There are several young men who take themselves with portentous seriousness as playwrights, on no tangible evidence whatever. I cannot but suspect Mr. Granville Barker of unwisely fostering this frame of mind; but even his sanguine good-nature did not go the length of producing their plays—if indeed, they exist. Youth will be youth, however, and its solemn absurdities are not inconsistent with real talent. I decline to despair of these young men. When their dramatic works materialise, if I am above ground at all, they will find me young enough to appreciate and welcome whatever is good in them. But they will never find me so tied to their party (or to any other) as to abjure my right and duty of discriminating between good work and bad, and cry "Well done our side!" even over a "De Mullins." Nor will they ever convince me of their high calling and election by the simple process of reviling Mr. Pinero. That Mr. Pinero has serious limitations no one has ever denied; but he has more talent in his little finger than some of his critics in their little skulls.

I began this article by a confession of age; but now, my dear Messrs. Hankin & Co., I feel decidedly younger, thank you.

THE REVIVAL OF WILL IN GERMAN LITERATURE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Our era is an era of revivals. In every domain of thought and action progress means the accentuation of some new principle from which others recede, or even fall into temporary oblivion. The revival of these old mental habits does not necessarily mean a relapse, and there will never be an absolute return. People, and sometimes whole generations, are apt to fall under the influence of some great achievement to such a degree that they lose sight of the rest of their intellectual treasures, a kind of mental intoxication to be cured only by a period of reaction.

Thus we had in Germany in philosophy the period of the idealistic delirium, carried to its extremes by the orthodox schools of Fichte, Hegel, and Schelling, and followed by a period of colorless eclecticism and shallow materialism until the cry "Back to Kant!" inaugurated a new era of creative philosophy. It was so little of a falling back that the same Friedrich Albert Lange, who stands as the first notable representative of Neo-Kantianism, was at the same time an ardent advocate of the then new teachings of Darwin, and gave materialism a prominent place in science. Lange would also recognise a good deal of Marx's historic materialism, this revolutionary off-shoot of Hegel's dialectical method, and went a long way towards Socialism.

Now, theoretic Kantianism, Materialism, Darwinism, and the theory of Socialism as derived from Hegel and the Materialists, are all detractors from individual will. They do indeed recognise some force in man which acts under the form of will. But it is a determined will, not a free will of the individual. It is not otherwise in the system of Schopenhauer. This mystic of will reduces the will in man practically to the power of acting under impulse or impulses, and so it is in the system of Edward von Hartmann. The more philosophy is subordinated to natural science, the more human will, as an independent active force, seems to be doomed.

As in philosophy so also in sociological science and in art in its different branches. The last quarter of the nineteenth century has seen naturalism conquering position after position in all these domains. It is the objective factor alone that tells: the individual as a deciding agent shrinks into insignificance. In the domain of fiction Zola and the Russians, in the drama Ibsen, and later on Hauptmann, take the lead. Individuals whose power of will is either destroyed or distracted—man not as a creator but as a poor creature, no con-querer but a bankrupt—form the centre of the masterpieces of the two last decades of the century.

Few would deny the pioneer representatives of this movement the merit of having contributed to the discernment of things, the exhibition of life. New views, new possibilities of expression, have been added to the armory of science and arts; the store-house of psychological achievement has been greatly enriched. But it is no less true that an uninterrupted march in the same direction must lead us into a desert of vaguenesses, of indistinct, dissolving, and effeminate imaginations. The dissection in detail of the forces and influences that act upon our minds will never result in a true picture of mind and its power. The total is here quite different from the sum of its composing parts. The majority of men are neither mentally diseased nor weaklings.

Thus, apart from conservative and directly reactionary resistance, and the opposition of mere traditionalism, a counter-movement of progressive tendencies would thus become inevitable. In practical philosophy Nietzsche may be regarded as its herald. But he was too much of a borderer to be its philosophical exponent. Especially in regard to human Will he is too much of its deifier to be its real restorer. He was a good assailant, but a doubtful defender.

Much more systematic has been the work of the investigator of scientific or experimental psychology, the physico-psychologists, represented, in the first instance, by the renowned Professor at the University of Leipzig, Wilhelm Wundt. It is a remarkable coincidence that a man like Wundt, who has perhaps done more than any other man to exhibit, by experiment, the work of determining influences, says, finally, much that weakens the belief in absolute determinism. He calls the soul of man a "knot-junction" in the world's activity—that is to say, a point at which all sorts of threads join, and new threads start in different directions. By this, determinism is obviously in a degree given away. The consistent determinist could not assign to the soul more than the rôle of a mechanical instrument, where no new principle influences the direction of the currents. For the so-called moral or psychical determinism does not contradict Will as a relatively free agent.

This theory is very ingeniously demonstrated in a book that has just appeared, bearing the provoking title "Der Freie Wille, Eine Entwicklung in Gespraechen."* Its author, Dr. Karl Joël, Lecturer at the University of Basle, says of it himself that it presents "a doctrine rejected to-day in a form rejected to-day." And, indeed, 724 pages of philosophical dialogue between two unnamed persons would appear an incredibly daring adventure. But it looks as if the book will fare better. It is lively, remarkably fresh—nay, dramatic—in style, and bristles with clever dialectics. A naïve believer in free will is first driven to absolute surrender. Modern philosophers, modern scientists, modern legalists, and modern criminologists, modern divines, and modern statisticians destroy his arguments unmercifully, until he declares himself beaten and convinced. But then the "conversion" sets in. The "inner voice" and the "seducer" start with suggestions of opposition. Determinism is subjected to a higher criticism. Causality is analysed anew (i.e., with references to Hume and Mill, of course). The dialogues where the modern belief in the endless chain of causality is dealt with are the finest of the book, which ends in the reconquest of the soul, the proclamation of the superiority of the organic over the mechanical principle, of the possibilities of variation, and with them of a relatively free will. The final chapter takes a poetical turn towards theism.

The book would be a remarkable publication even if its author stood alone. But this is not the case. Dr. Joël, who shows himself extraordinarily at home in modern literature, brings voices from the most different camps to support his argument. Of particular interest are the many objections of renowned scientists to supposed causalities in nature.

In one passage Joël makes his philosopher say: "The other day I read a clever essay, where in modern poetry the same weakness of will was laid bare that characterised the post-classical (German) dramas based on fatalism." This refers to a book, "Die Bilanz der Moderne," by a known German critic, Herr Samuel Lublinsky. The latter, a writer of philosophical training, there strikes the balance of the modern literary school. Almost simultaneously with Dr. Joël's book a new book of his has appeared dealing again with modern science, art, and literature under the title, "Der Ausgang der Moderne"—the close of modernism. If the first book shows the weakness of naturalistic drama and novel, the present book is a downright declaration of war on naturalistic art altogether, and this just from the point of view of will or strength of mind. Naturalism, it complains, has destroyed the sense of things great in men. It has belittled great impulses, it has given undue prominence to "sick" tendencies and trivialities. It has made mood—Stimmung—the supreme influence. Stimmungs-malerei—"mood painting"—is met everywhere. But the sense of healthy individualism, of creative activity, and with it the capacity for great historical plays, have gone astray. Therefore—back to the best traditions of the classicists and work their threads to a modern web, the conflicts of strong personalities set by themselves.

It is a very interesting book, not always just, but always very readable—perhaps the best comprehensive representation of modern German art and philosophy. Its author was one of the supporters of the naturalistic school when it fought for recognition. That he now, in spite of personal friendship, should tear himself away from this school and cry out for strong-minded individualism, is another sign of the desire for a revival of Will.—Yours, &c.,

Letters to the Editor.

WHY?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The appalling disaster that has overtaken the southern part of Italy has surely set minds working as few things in this world could have done. To those who, like myself, profess a rational faith and claim the right to let the reason with which we have been endowed have full play, one question must necessarily stand out before all others, and that is, Why? Why this awful event; why this torture, slow and indescribable for thousands and tens of thousands; why this death, only merciful if sudden, of thousands more; why these accumulated horrors, this holocaust of human lives? Why? For what reason; to what end?

We read of thousands of little children, helpless, innocent, starving and freezing to death; we read of men and women slowly expiring in the most awful agony the human mind can conceive of; we read of the smouldering ruins of a great city and countless villages, with untold thousands of human creatures lying dead or maimed beneath piles of brick and stone; we read, but can only dimly form a conception of misery that no human help can succour, of grief that no human heart can soothe, and I ask, Why? I ask this in no irreverent spirit. I have considered my faith in God to be impregnable, my chief possession in life. I have questioned nothing, doubted nothing, but now I feel the bonds of faith snapping, and I turn to the teachers of the Christian religion and implore them to give me an explanation, an answer.

I shall be held that it is sinful and blasphemous to question or to doubt; it may be so, but I cannot help it; my reason tells me that this waste of human life, this gigantic sacrifice, in an unspeakably cruel form, of hard working, innocent men, women and little children is—— unnecessary. I will leave aside the epithets of unjust, unmerciful, and simply say, unnecessary. What purpose had it all?

We are told that it leads to deeds of heroism among those who go to the work of rescue; that it awakens the spirit of sympathy and compassion among the nations of the world; that it serves as a useful reminder to us that life is fleeting, and that we must keep ourselves prepared for the hereafter. This may bring comfort and satisfaction to us who, thousands of miles away from the scene of horror, read about it in our easy chairs; but go and tell it to those who have survived. Go and tell it to the orphans and the widows, to those who have lost their all, and whose lives are ruined for ever; tell it to the maimed and crushed and dying, and see what their answer will be. Is it not the case rather that we know nothing of God or of Nature, that we do not even know the meaning of these words; that our teachers of religion have erected a gigantic structure of words and symbols for our benefit, which, however beautiful, is meaningless and misleading, and which crumbles away in the havoc wrought by this earthquake? Are there not in what men call Nature, uncontrolled and uncontrollable forces, of which we can never know anything, and in face of which both man and his Creator are powerless?

These are the thoughts that will come and torture the soul, and there is no answer—none. Though I ask these questions, I know full well that there is no answer. "Why?" That is the question now with me constantly—in the daytime, when I am among my fellow beings, and in the silent watches of the night, when I used to stretch out my hands to God and loved to think that I could feel His touch. Why? why?—Yours, &c., FIAT LUX.

EDUCATION AND RELIGION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Preston's letter is, in two points, a little puzzling. First, he speaks of "excluding theological teaching from the compulsory subjects," and "minimising the temptation to the teacher to suppress or disguise his true opinions." Do I understand from this that Mr. Preston would allow the teaching of the Bible in the schools if the teachers desired to use it as a means of "expressing their true opinions"? If so, his point of view is different from that of those champions of secular education who complain that the rates are used to pay for teaching of which they disapprove; for that complaint would logically point to the compulsory suppression of such teaching altogether. I confess that I should deeply regret any exclusion of the Bible from the ordinary curriculum of the school; amongst other reasons because the language of the English translation of the Bible has been the one representative of a common culture between rich and poor; but, if a "conscience clause" permitting head teachers to exclude such teaching or under-teachers to abstain from using it, would suit Mr. Preston and others, it might be worth while to try the working of such a plan. But, secondly, I cannot the least see why the teaching of the Bible should imply a less "civic" education than the teaching course which excludes it. Surely Mr. Preston does not want to exclude all readers of the Bible from the rights of citizenship? or does he at least wish to accuse them of "incivism," a word, thank God, not easily translatable in its full revolutionary sense?

As to Dr. Temple, I doubt if the interferences which he indirectly deprecated referred only to religious questions; but, at all events, they implied positive hindrance to what he did teach, and not merely the enforcement of some new teaching which he omitted.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Four Education Bills have been brought in and withdrawn from the present Parliament. I am fully sensible of the good qualities of the members of the Government, yet not deeming them infallible, think it right to inquire how these failures have come about.

Mr. Birrell, in introducing his Bill, made the following remarks: "It will surprise no one that it is proposed that a school shall not be recognised as a public elementary school and shall not receive a penny of public money from rates or taxes, unless it becomes a provided school within the meaning of the Education Act.—The Bill of 1902 held the Bill of 1906 within its arms." I understood, and still regard these words, as in justification of an extreme measure. Essentially, it was a Bill for the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the voluntary schools, mitigated by "facilities" and "extended facilities" for the escape of a limited number of them from that fate. This Bill was so transformed by the House of Lords as to compel its withdrawal by its framers. Mr. McKenna's Bills were framed on the same principle and withdrawn in expectation of the same treatment. For Mr. Runciman's Bill, as an avowed compromise, the Government is not solely responsible.

What, now, is the attitude of the Church of England to these demands? It is a counter demand for "religious equality." All sections, High, Low, and Broad, unite in this. Here comes in the irony of the case. For several decades, "religious equality" has been the war-cry of Nonconformists. It is not now heard from them, but the "whirligig of time" has brought it into the conflict over the schools from our opponents. With Nonconformists, it is a brief phrase standing for the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church of England. That its adoption by Churchmen consciously means this, cannot be affirmed. Probably they see "men as trees walking." But that, if admitted for her schools, there is any good reason it should not include all that makes up the Establishment would be difficult of proof.

We seem to be at this moment, politically and argumentatively, in a state of equilibrium. What is the duty of the Liberal Party in these circumstances? It is, I think, to recognise the change, the advance of our opponents, however brought about, and to put forward a scheme based on "religious equality," thus doing no harm to true Liberalism, whilst yielding to the call for justice by Churchmen.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Those of us who hoped much from a Liberal Government for national education have, as Mr. Mundella points out, been terribly disappointed by the experience of the last three years. Our complaint is not that the Government have been unable to legislate. We know quite well the difficulty of passing laws to break down privilege while we have a House of Lords. The trouble is in the field of administration. A President of the Board of Education has enormous power, if he will only exercise it. But our Liberal Presidents have not stopped long enough in the office to grip the situation for themselves. Three Presidents and three Parliamentary Secretaries in three years has meant that the real things which matter in education have all been settled by the bureaucracy, and Mr. Mundella's list of things which are going wrong could be largely supplemented. Effective criticism of the Board's work has been strangled, because of the changed form of statistics and reports. The information now available is just what the bureaucracy thinks the public should know, and no more. It is presented with beautifully written prefatory memoranda, which have the double advantage of concealing the things that matter and of making good readable copy for the newspapers.

What we really want is a Minister of Education, who will stop long enough in Whitehall to be the real, as well as the nominal head of his Department. The Liberal Government has not given us that yet, and until they do, things will continue to go wrong.

I enclose my card, and remain,—Yours, &c.,

ALLOTMENTS AND SMALL HOLDINGS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR.—Will you allow me, as travelling lecturer to this Association, which exists to help the applicants for small holdings and allotments in fourteen counties, to support, to a very great extent, Mr. Morrell's recent article in THE NATION, on the administration of the Small Holdings and Allotments Act? We stand now close to the commencement of what will be the most fateful year for the Act, for, up till now, the innate conservatism of our governing departments has certainly not made the best of the opportunities the Act gives. It is no good crying over milk that is lost, however. Let us see what can be done in 1909.

We must increase our explanatory work amongst the applicants, and organise more closely and thoroughly the demand. Assume for a moment that the Board of Agriculture was the most progressive of departments; assume that each County Council was sitting up at nights in their anxiety to administer the Act, I say that, even then, the work could not be done satisfactorily if the applicants are not organised.

It is the right of each district to have an increased number of small holders on its land, and if each district will only make up its mind how its reasonable requirements can best be satisfied, and will communicate its suggestions to the County Council and to the Board of Agriculture, with a request for immediate attention, we shall soon drive all the authorities into doing something.

I know from my experience in Lancashire, Shropshire, Warwickshire, Gloucestershire and Herefordshire, how necessary it is for applicants to be organised. They are entitled to take their share in administering the Act, and until they do so thoroughly, the entire success of the Act will not be assured.

I have spoken only of five counties; I wish that I could speak so thoroughly of our other nine; but from our daily correspondence, I know that in those nine, and in many others, there is that same disposition to sit down and wait until the Board of Agriculture or the County Council procure some land.

There are benefits to be obtained under the Act, but they will not come to the applicants half as quickly as the applicants can get to them.

If in each county we had a Central Committee of a Small Holders' Union, the pace would be much quicker. Shall we see those bodies constituted in 1909?

There is one matter of complaint I have against the London Authorities. There is a Committee—a composite Committee—representing the co-operative organisations. This Committee is to administer a Government grant when it gets it. Has that Committee had a sitting? Has it decided to do anything to teach applicants to co-operate in getting the land? I ask these questions in great seriousness.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE STREETLY,
Organising Lecturer of the Allotments and Small Holdings Association.

THE CHARACTER OF THE CHURCH COUNCIL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It seems curious that the letter of the Dean of Ripon has not stirred the members of the Church of England, if not into action, at least into recognition of the actual situation.

Either by internal reform or by disestablishment, some measure of autonomy will be acquired by the Church in the immediate future. When it comes, the Representative Church Council will naturally claim the right to be the Parliament of the Church, on the ground that it is what it claims to be. If that claim be tacitly granted, now that the Representative Church Council is harmless because without power, it will be difficult to repudiate the claim on the eve of its being given legislative and executive functions. Quiet possession is often considered a good title.—Yours, &c.,

MORE MESSAGES FROM MYERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In brief and final reply to Mr. Graham, may I say how welcome he is to any solace derivable from his assumption of "something psychical" (misprinted "physical" in his letter) "superadded to man," which points to his immortality. But comparative psychology lends no warrant thereto. The serious attack which Mr. Graham says has not yet been opened on the "facts"—of spiritualism?—makes a vigorous start in Professor Simon Newcomb's article on "Modern Occultism" in the current "Nineteenth Century." Sir Oliver Lodge's reply to the Professor's explanation of "telepathy" should make interesting reading.—Yours, &c.,

PRIMARY EDUCATION IN IRISH CONVENT SCHOOLS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I trust I shall not appeal in vain to your sense of justice, when I ask you to publish this refutation of a letter that appeared in THE NATION on December 26th, over the signature "J. W. Southern, Beechwood, Marple, Cheshire." This writer alleges that the teachers in our convent schools in Ireland impart little or no secular knowledge to their pupils. As these schools are all in connection with the National Board of Education, this accusation means that those teachers receive public money on false pretences, and that the Board's Inspectors, Catholic and Protestant, who examine those schools, at stated intervals and at uncertain times, connive at the fraud. The solitary scrap of evidence that he produces in support of his statement is an anecdote. Let me just prove to your readers, by the testimony of an expert, the high efficiency of the convent schools. Four years ago Mr. F. H. Dale, an English Inspector, was sent by the Government to report on the state of Education in Irish primary schools. Here is a passage from his Report (published as a Blue-Book, and to be had for a few shillings): "The order and tone of the convent schools is excellent. Instruction as a whole superior to that of ordinary National schools, and in various subjects compares very favorably with that given in large English schools." To "compare very favorably" with English schools means, I presume, to be superior to them. On our ordinary "National schools," which he declared inferior to the convent schools, the following are Mr. Dale's remarks in the body of his Report, pp. 65 et seqq. "The reading is quite as correct and fluent as in the English schools, though frequently more monotonous and indistinct." "The handwriting in the top classes struck me as better than in the English schools, and the spelling is more accurate." "In arithmetic the children are much quicker than the English at working sums." It is no small tribute to the convent schools to say that they are superior to schools thus favorably described by an impartial expert.

Now for the anecdote. Its dramatis personæ are certainly not to be found in Irish life—a little country boy who uses irreligious language fit for a Parisian gamin, and a Catholic clergyman who drives about "not dressed in the uniform of his calling." Here is the anecdote: "My companion, forgetting the absence of his clerical garb, said, 'Phelim, how old are you?' 'Ten, yer honor.' 'What school do you go to?' 'The Convent school, but I don't lose much by not being there, for they teach you nothing but Masses and prayers.'"

Unfortunately for the story, the boy who appeared to your correspondent to be "ten or eleven years," could not be a pupil of the Convent school, or of any "Girls' school"; he could not be admitted to such schools except as an "infant," and should leave soon after the age of eight, according to a well-known rule of the Board of Education. If we get over the difficulty of the boy's telling a falsehood without a motive, there is the further difficulty that the falsehood would be promptly exposed by the clergyman, who would be perfectly familiar with the Rule referred to. The writer's story is only a specimen of the misrepresentations of Irish affairs that I have often read in "Tours in Ireland." This practice tends to keep up the Anti-English feeling among us, notwithstanding our admiration for such sympathetic statesmen as Gladstone, Morley, and Birrell.—Yours, &c.,

THE WORKS OF WALTER PATER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—With your permission, I should like to suggest that the works of Walter Pater, the writer of the most beautiful English prose of his time, should be published at a price more within the reach of the general public than is at present the case.

As far as I can ascertain, the thinnest volume, "Imaginary Portraits," costs 8s. 6d., and "Marius the Epicurean," in two volumes, 25s. Of course, such a distinguished firm of publishers as Messrs. Macmillan & Co. know their own business best, but I am inclined to think that they would find it profitable to issue Pater in the same style and at the same price as their excellent "Golden Treasury Series."

It is surprising how very little is known about Walter Pater, as compared, for instance, with Ruskin or William Morris, or even Nietzsche, whose ideas just now supply the latest craze in matters intellectual. Yet, Walter Pater's work as a literary artist will ultimately gain for him a higher permanent position than a good many of his contemporaries. It is a great pity, therefore, that these beautiful writings should remain a sealed book to many people who are not even acquainted with his name, but who would be amongst his most ardent admirers, if his works were made better known by being obtainable at more popular prices.—Yours, &c., L. B.

DRESSING FOR THE SLUM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In the course of an article on "Christmas and Charity" in the current number of The Nation, mention is made of the fashionable woman who puts on her gorgeous attire to go to "her ward" or "her slum," and who is so sure that it is a real pleasure to "see a pretty dress for once."

This last is "spoke sarcastic," but is most often the true state of the case. Poor women, poor girls particularly, do love purple and fine linen, and the things they typify. They would not have them abolished, but made general. The sight of them furnishes them with stuff for day-dreams, the raw material of romance, and, far from "afflicting them with the poignancy of contrast," is more often enjoyed with a sense of vicarious possession.

In most cases it would be taken as a bad compliment if Lady Bountiful went worse clad than is her wont to visit her poor neighbors; as we ourselves should think it if the millionaires on our visiting list always used the omnibus when making us a call, instead of drawing up to our humble door in "well-appointed" brougham or motor.

If we mistake not, Mrs. Humphry Ward makes one of her heroines attend an East End festivity in Court dress and diamonds, and we feel that she did the right thing.

After all, altruism is not confined to any particular class, and it is conceivable that the poor may derive assuagement rather than aggravation from the reminder that the lines are fallen unto others in pleasanter places than their own.—Yours, &c., K. S.

WOMEN'S WAGES AND THE SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Several of your correspondents seem to think that the rate of women's wages can be decided by legislation, ignoring altogether that, broadly speaking, this depends mainly on supply and demand, cost of living, efficiency and mobility of labor, &c., matters with which Parliament has little or nothing to do. More trades unions for women would help wages far more than "Votes for Women." It is true that wages have declined for women in unskilled labor lately, but so have they for men, too. If the possession of the vote is the panacea for low wages, why is the agricultural laborer of East Anglia in such a desperate plight? And how is it that the wages of the voteless female servant have nearly doubled themselves in the last forty or fifty years?

Oh, this much over-rated vote! One would think that it could ensure the millennium! But if some women are so very anxious to obtain it, why don't they go about the business in a more intelligent fashion? Instead of clamor, violence, unreason, vituperation of man and all his works, and dog-whips, why not resort to a few years' steady work in all branches of local government, where they now stand on an equality with the male voter? Let them work side by side with men, making themselves quietly indispensable by their more intimate knowledge of the needs of women and children, and identifying themselves fully with every measure of social regeneration? The Parliamentary vote would be given them then as a matter of course.—Yours, &c.,

(Mrs.) F. Travers.

Poetry.

THE DARK HOUR.

And now, when merry winds do blow,
And Rain makes trees look fresh,
An overpowering staleness holds
This mortal flesh.

Though I do love to feel the Rain,
And be by winds well blown,
The mystery of mortal life
Doth press me down.

And, in this mood, come now what will,
Shine Rainbow, Cuckoo call—
There is no thing in Heaven or Earth
Can lift my soul.

I know not where this state comes from—
No cause for grief I know;
The earth around is fresh and green,
Flowers near me grow.

I sit between two fair Rose-trees;
Red roses on my right
And, on my left side, roses are
A lovely white.

The little birds are full of joy,
Lambs bleating all the day;
The colt runs after the old mare,
And children play.

And still there comes this dark, dark hour—
Which is not born of care;
Into my heart it creeps before
I am aware.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE first volume of a work to be called "English Literature in the Victorian Era: A Biographical and Critical History," by Dr. Robertson Nicoll, will be published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton in the autumn. The book will run to six volumes, and it is hoped that they will be issued at the rate of one a week until its completion. We understand that Dr. Nicoll has been engaged upon this task for many years. His main purpose has been to estimate the value and influence of the writers and thinkers who have done most to shape the direction of English thought during the period treated. Dr. Nicoll's friends have often regretted that his almost unrivalled knowledge of literary movements and personalities, as well as his great gifts of criticism, have been over-engaged in periodical work. The coming book deals with a subject on which we may expect to see him at his best.

DURING the season Messrs. Methuen will publish Mr. T. R. Glover's Dale Lectures, delivered at Mansfield College, Oxford, in 1906. The title will be, "The Conflict of Religions in the Early Roman Empire," and Mr. Glover has made considerable additions to the lectures, the book as it stands dealing with Jesus and the early Christians, with Seneca, Epictetus, Plutarch, Lucian, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and others. Mr. Glover's aims, which he describes as "impossible, but worth attempting," have been "to see the founder of the Christian movement, and some of his followers as they appeared among their contemporaries; to represent Christian and Pagan with equal goodwill, equal honesty, and in one perspective; to recapture something of the color and movement of life, using imagination to interpret the data, and controlling it by them; to follow the conflict of ideals, not in the abstract, but as they show themselves in character and personality; and in this way to discover where lay the living force that changed the lives and thoughts of men." One of the signs of the times is the earnest effort now being made to pierce through the mass of Aberglaube which dogma and tradition have laid over the person of Jesus, and Mr. Glover's book promises to be a fresh and interesting contribution in this direction.

WE learn that Mr. Frank Harris has almost ready for publication a book called "The Man, William Shakespeare, and His Most Tragic Life Story." These essays contain a collection of the articles on Shakespeare that appeared in the "Saturday Review" when Mr. Harris edited it, with later additions. They are, we think, by far the most original, suggestive, and brilliantly conceived writing on Shakespeare that our times have known, or are likely to know.

ANOTHER book on Shakespeare which may be expected during the year is Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton's essay, "Shakespeare's Adequacy to the Coming Century." Mr. Watts-Dunton seems to have quite a number of works approaching completion, among them "Reminiscences of D. G. Rossetti and William Morris at Kelmscott," a critical account of the romantic movement, to be entitled "The Renascence of Wonder," and a new novel.

IN the biography of William Beckford, of Fonthill, the author of "Vathek," Mr. Louis Melville has chosen a most engaging subject. "Vathek" was originally written in French, and Beckford told Cyrus Redding, his first biographer, that the book was written at a single sitting. "It cost me," he said, "three days and two nights of hard labor. I never took my clothes off the whole time." Unluckily for Beckword's reputation for truthfulness there is good evidence that the work took him at least the greater part of a twelvemonth. "Vathek" is known to English readers by the translation of Dr. Samuel Henley, made, with Beckford's co-operation, in 1786. The original French text was issued in 1893 with a eulogistic preface by Stéphane Mallarmé. In spite of much flippancy and coarseness, "Vathek" is a masterpiece, the catastrophe in the Hall of Eblis with its sustained note of horror being one of the most powerfully descriptive passages in English. Dr. Garnett describes the work as the only modern Oriental story which "might appear with disadvantage in the 'Arabian Nights,' with Aladdin on its right hand and Ali Baba on its left." Byron had a great admiration for it, and was influenced by it, especially in his early work. So, too, was Barry Cornwall, whose "Hall of Eblis" seems to have been suggested by "Vathek." Apart from his literary reputation, Beckford is interesting for his mania for building and for his splendid collections of books and pictures. Mr. Melville has obtained permission to examine such of Beckford's letters and papers as are in possession of his descendants and would be grateful for permission to see any other letters that may be in existence.

A SENSATIONAL novel called "Banzai," which has had an amazing popularity in Germany, has been translated into English, and will be issued in this country by Mr. Stanley Paul. Its author, who writes under the pseudonym "Parabellum," is said to be a German official of high rank, and the book gives an account of a great war which is to take place between the United States and Japan. The story, which is an able example of a thoroughly flagitious form of the novel, is told with some power, and exhibits knowledge of the present state of the American Army and Navy. According to the author's forecast, the American forces are defeated by the Japanese, but the German jingo is pleased with the conclusion that his country intervenes on behalf of the United States.

MR. J. H. INGRAM has almost ready for publication a new "Life of Chatterton," which will contain some fresh material of importance. Certain poems published by Chatterton, but never since reprinted, will also be included. Chatterton has often been compared with Keats—and he can almost stand the comparison—but, although Wordsworth and Coleridge ranked him among the great English poets, he has received something less than justice from the critics of the past quarter of a century.

WITHIN the next few weeks, Messrs. Bell will issue Mr. R. S. Holland's "Builders of United Italy." The book is an attempt to provide the ordinary reader with an account of the men and movements that brought about Italian freedom. It contains studies of Garibaldi, Mazzini, Cavour, Victor Emmanuel I, Gioberti, Manzoni, and others, who directly or indirectly helped towards that result.

A CERTAIN amount of irritation, though rather more amusement, has been aroused by the attempt of the Roman Catholic Council of Censorship to obtain fees from authors and publishers before granting the official imprimatur which guarantees Catholics against literature injurious to faith and morals. A firm which publishes a large number of Roman Catholic books would find a fee on each publication a heavy tax, and protests against it have been made. It seems to be all the more unjustifiable as the Council of Trent decided that a work ought to be examined gratuitously. If such an anachronism as a press censorship is to be preserved, it should not be at the expense of the authors and publishers whom it restricts.

NEXT week THE NATION will contain an article on Edgar Allan Poe, by Mr. Bernard Shaw.

THE NINTH HENRY.*

Everything knowable about Henry Stuart, Cardinal of York, may be found several times over in the previous works of Mr. Andrew Lang, and Miss Alice Shield, and also in the present volume—with one notable exception. We have not been able to discover anywhere between these covers a mention of the fact that a highly competent study of the said Cardinal of York, by Mr. Herbert M. Vaughan, appeared barely two years ago. Had this poor dotard been a sister or a cousin or an aunt of Napoleon, he could hardly have attracted more biographical attention. Sketches, memoirs, and descriptions innumerable of this profoundly mediocre personage have appeared, and, before commencing to read Miss Shield's book, we felt it to be an almost sacred duty to say something which might possibly (though most improbably) serve as a deterrent to the great multitude of biographers who still cherish the vain hope of kindling a scintilla of original interest in such a subject—easier far to kindle a spark in the sand of an hour-glass!

After reading the book, however, we must readily acquit Miss Shield of any perverse notion in the matter. That Henry Stuart per se was an absolute dead-head, such as the hand of no biographer, however skilful, could possibly resurrect, seems to have been an axiom with her from a very early stage in the proceedings; and so the book is concerned primarily with Charles Edward, Pickle the spy, Clementina, the Sieur Wogan, the Countess of Albany, and poor old Mr. James Misfortunate. Henry himself figures as a kind of usher or white staff to these romantic personages; he appears in his petticoats and smiles as the curtain bell rings at the close of each chapter, and, even so, he becomes rather a bore. The same faculty, some might say over-fondness, for minute detail pervades this book that pervaded its predecessor, "The King Over the Water"; the same lapses of style, due to over-ellipsis or undue strains upon pronouns are apparent. Ambiguous phrases such as "He fully understood that France was more afraid of England than of Spain, or would be kinder to him," are too common. There is a good Stuart pedigree from 1603 onwards; the list of authorities is of the same extremely futile kind that we had occasion to reprobate in "The King Over the Water," but it is supplemented usefully by the footnotes.

Our main interest in the work, let us admit, is concentrated upon the skill with which Miss Shield has sequestrated her titular hero. The sidelights are excellent. The profiles of Charles Edward and his father, for instance, are more suggestive than most of the direct portraits, being frank and tolerant rather than apologetic. The last years of the "wild man" and the maladies that ensued on '45 are summarised here with a touch far more expressive to the average man than the excessive detail afforded by Ewald and his successors. Research seems to have confirmed the probability that Charles made several visits to England between 1750 and 1763. The bottle which by 1725 or earlier had mainly dissolved English Jacobitism into dining clubs, nerved Charles to sustain the old Hellenic rôle of a man contending against Fate. The last two years of his pilgrimage were greatly assuaged, according to Miss Shield, by the âme protectrice of his daughter. Fuddled not in this case by "the nasty bottle," but by the approach of senile melancholia consequent upon regal nostalgia, the last days of poor old James were far more lamentable than those of his elder son. Fugitive though he was, with no ascertainable direction, Charles Edward was well out of this picture of James III. and the Cardinal quarrelling about the details of table-money, Italian confessors, retreats, and confinements. James was unable to comprehend his younger son's preference of priest-craft over king-craft. For a man to take a serious interest in fiddling and church-music was as contemptible to him as to Lord Chesterfield; and that Galuppi, whose Toccata so delighted our Browning, should be admitted to their common table appeared to the would-be king little short of an outrage. In the case of Henry, it seems true that a slight fringe of artistic sensibility comes short of extenuating an inveterate commonplaceness, an amiable insipidity. How else are we to understand his prudent demeanour in 1745, his docility to the counsels of inaction, his flight from Paris at the crisis of Charles Edward's career, and his tame acceptance of a fat cardinalate, which was regarded by many as giving the coup de grâce to the Stuart dynasty and cause? Pious, narrow, exacting, and haughty, in the manner of an attenuated Charles the Martyr, benevolent and charitable in his own circle, the lean-spirited Henry lingers on at Rome into a century that knew not the Stuarts, the symbol of a departed faith, not unlike Madame Mère after the insulation of Napoleon.

The brief portraits of him are fairly numerous in the memoirs of the time, but they are indeterminate, and take color indiscriminately from the point of view of the individual depictor. Much of the consideration he obtained at Rome was obviously due to the fact that his coffers were so well filled, for in addition to his papal pension and offices about the curia, he held numerous benefices in Spain, Belgium, France, and Italy. The liaisons of his brother cost him a good deal. Fortunately, he had none of his own. In 1797, as might be expected, his revenues shrank like a burst bladder, and for a time he was reduced to something like penury, and had to part with many of his most interesting relics and jewels. When things looked their blackest (in 1800), as is well known, George III. took pity on the exile and granted him a pension of £4,000, English gold. Such generosity is remarkable indeed in view of George's usual parsimony—in cases in which borough influence was out of the question. Nor can it be wholly said that Henry never bit the hand that fed him, for, in 1806, despite the fact that his other revenues were at least partially restored, he actually asked for more. The old king, however, was fast relapsing into that amiable state of mania in which he ran races with horses or danced minuets with his apothecary, and he was, perhaps, unaware of this last act of Stuart mendicancy. The Regent characteristically promised £1,600 a year to the Countess of Albany.

For the last years of his life, Henry IX. of England, France, and Ireland, was a multi-millionaire in Rome, and spent lavishly on bad masonry and similar vanities. He died peacefully at his palace of Frascati on July 13th, 1807, and was buried on the 16th in St. Peter's, by the side of his brother. The Stuart succession since his death is a rather difficult proposition (if we may judge from the complex erudition of the last chapter), and must have caused some anxious half hours to the "secret consult" of the White Rose.

The controversy was extinct long before Henry's death. In 1707, the world at large had been Stuart; by 1807, it had become weary of the pageant of the family's misfortune. What is it that makes such willing Jacobites of us all in 1909? It is, emphatically, not a contemplation of the gentle virtues of Henry IX. The Stuarts were, to a certain extent, the victims of the party-morbus in its most virulent form, but this in turn was a natural and inevitable consequence of the Civil War, for which Charles Stuart was in a large measure responsible. From 1688 onward the Stuarts failed hopelessly to realise their vocation. This fact alone enlists many sympathies. Consideration of them as belonging to the old royal breed, who clung to the sacrosanct tradition of governing as well as reigning, and who refused to bow the knee to the new gods of finance, democratic ideas, and modern mechanical inventions may, perhaps, enlist a good many more—in conjunction more especially with the unloveliness of the Hanoverians, distilled by this hopeless exile. The incredible follies of Charles I. and James II. fall hardly upon the second and third generation, and we begin to think of just historical effect as fatality. The dross falls away from the Stuarts and the contemplation of their heroic side is inspired and poeticised by the romance of '45. The apotheosis of this owes more, perhaps, than any modern event to literature. Sir Walter, the Ettrick Shepherd, Lady Nairne, and the Jacobite minstrels did much. "Charley-over-the-Waterism" grew and prospered in proportion to the growth of the interests that had strangled the reality, in George Borrow's despite. The modern school of Stuart research, under the brilliant guidance of Mr. Andrew Lang, has refertilised the whole area of the legend. Documentary evidence has been brought to bear upon a very big scale; an enormous amount of picturesque corroborative detail has been recovered. What pabulum will these not afford to the poets, musicians, painters, balladists, and romancists of the future! The surface of the legend may appear to be momentarily suffocated by the multitude of small facts. But it will absorb them quite easily and triumphantly. And we shall soon have the fair fields of sentimental Jacobitism blossoming and flowering anew.

THE ENGLISH COUNTRY HOUSE.*

The country-house is what we have that is best and most representative in English architecture. It belongs to our national genius and our racial character that it should be so. English people, as their critics are never tired of explaining to them, have very little talent for theorising. It is an instinct of the British mind—the effects of which are palpable enough in British politics, British talk, and British literature—to stick to the fact. Practice, not theory, is the English maxim.

Generally speaking, this instinct for the purely practical is what distinguishes British action all over the world from the action of other people. It happened to the writer once to travel for some months in the French North-African colonies, after spending a year or two in English South-African ones. Now the opposite ends of Africa are like two clean slates on which two of the greatest European Powers have legibly inscribed their national idiosyncracies; and between the two there is always the same difference. Wherever practice is the ruling factor the Englishman excels. Wherever theory is the ruling factor the Frenchman excels. Independent and self-sufficient, the Englishman waits for no plan of action, bothers his mind about no methodical organisation or disciplined collective advance, but sets off with axe and rifle into the interior to possess himself of whatever may be best worth possessing. If he is an average man, he at least upholds our reputation as successful colonists. If he is an exceptional one, he adds a province to the British Empire. But in either case there is the same quality in his energy. It is all of the personal, practical kind, not at all of the collective and theoretical kind. But even colonising is not all a matter of personal initiative. There are times when the theoretical faculty even here has its opening. Cape Town, with its untidy and ill-disciplined streets, its heterogeneous jumble of incongruous buildings, its general shapelessness and incoherence, is very unimposing compared to the ample boulevards and dignified streets, the gardens and fountains and arcaded pavements of Algiers, all gathered and arranged into a scheme of some symmetry and unity. Here, where a great effect had to be foreseen and planned out in advance, here, as it seemed to us, the theoretical Frenchman quite eclipsed the practical Englishman.

In some form or other, in literature, politics, or other departments of life, this broad and general difference between the two races is bound often to have struck the reader. It is a difference which has its bearing on English architecture. Architecture, of course, like colonising, is an outcome, an expression of racial character. Hence the differences in the one are the differences in the other. A great building, for example, representative and fit to be a type of its style, has always in it something of a theoretical character. It must keep in view the structural idea which is the note of its style, and look steadily as it goes along to the effect as a whole which it means to produce. In this it resembles the laying out of a symmetrical city, the plan of which is conceived as an idea before its portions are begun. These are conditions which favor the French genius, and, in fact, the difference between a great French and a great English Gothic cathedral is precisely the difference between Algiers and Cape Town. The French town and the French cathedral both profit from the French strength in theory, while the English town and cathedral suffer from the English weakness in theory. The truth is that it does not do, in the construction of a monumental piece of architecture, to substitute personal initiative, as a guide, for abstract law. Personal initiative may yield various attractions; it may cast in stone a very interesting and graphic delineation of the life of its age; but, unless governed and kept under by the force of abstract law, it is bound to mar the building's claims as an authoritative example of the style it represents. Our own cathedrals are examples of this. Perhaps they are more full of human feeling, and appeal more to human sympathy and affection, than the French ones, but as specimens of the Gothic style they are altogether out of the running. Their chances are spoiled because they will persist in subjecting theory to practice in a field in which theory ought always to be in supreme command.

But architecture, after all, is as wide as life. There is no strength in life but will make itself felt in architecture. Our practical personal way of looking at things may handicap us when it is a question of the great monuments of pure style, but still that way of looking at things is too strong and sincere and genuine an impulse not to have some department of building assigned to it in which it can show itself to advantage. As a matter of fact it has a large and important sphere expressly assigned to it. That sphere is the house, not, of course, the town house, for a town house is not a house at all but a bit of a street, but the country house, and the country house of all dimensions from the peasant's cottage to the nobleman's palace. It is not necessary, nor even desirable, that a man's house, rightly subject as it must be to private convenience, should defer, like the great national structures, to abstract principles of style. Private houses not only have not, as a rule, the size and scope to do justice to abstract principles, but their character and the uses they are put to prevent them from devoting themselves to that aim. They are, therefore, in manifold ways straitened and perplexed by the too rigorous imposition of a set of laws of which they cannot exhibit the proper effects, and which impede them in the exercise of their duties. French country houses and chateaux are an example of buildings of this order. From all that is of human interest they are cut off in the endeavor to achieve importance as examples of style, and failing in this, as they almost invariably do, they achieve little in the way of grandeur to compensate for their coldness. It would be difficult to name a set of buildings more destitute of real attraction of any kind than the whole series of French chateaux from medieval times to the present. As illustrations of Renaissance structural principles they are trite and, with but few exceptions, unimportant, while as human documents they are altogether barren and meaningless. The truth is they are attempts to carry into the sphere of personal initiative in architecture the maxims which were appropriate in the sphere of collective effort.

Now if the reader will turn from these very cold and lifeless edifices to the Tudor, Elizabethan, Jacobean, and Georgian houses of England he will see in operation a set of motives of quite a different kind, but which are evidently in this department of architecture in many ways appropriate. The main characteristic running all through English country-house architecture is its flexible and ready adaptation of itself to the needs of human life. There are, no doubt, exceptions, and during the eighteenth century especially, the century of the ascendency of the great families, many cold and stately country palaces were built quite as aloof in expression from any aspects of the national life as their Italian or French models. These stand, however, altogether apart from English country-house architecture as a whole, and claim no share in its peculiar merits. The test of the style is perfectly simple. All we have to do is to observe whether the specimen under consideration, be it great or small, is in all essentials one with the rest of the rural architecture of its own period. Is it, however fine and stately, in harmony with the cottage, the farm, the rectory, and the manor house of the countryside? There is to be found in England, and we know not where else it is to be found in the same fullness and variety, a broad tradition in the way of domestic architecture which comes down to us through the centuries and which at every part of its progress applies equally to all society and draws into one common native language—having its own dialects, no doubt, and accents, and local or class differences, but remaining essentially one language still—the house architecture of all sections of the community. This architecture all holds together, and what holds it together is its responsiveness to life. It fits English life and yields and adapts itself to every pressure of that life. In this its charm, its interest, and its beauty consist. In short, the very drawbacks of the English temperament, or what are felt as drawbacks when dealing with great representative types of architecture—we mean the English love of what is practical and convenient, and the English dislike of what is theoretical and abstract—are in house-building a perpetual inspiration and a source of genuine vitality. How much of the beauty and charm of English scenery are due to the nestling cottages and farms and old country houses and more stately mansions, even, which all alike seem so to fit the landscape that they appear to be almost a natural growth rather than artificially planned constructions! These edifices have, in truth, no consciously artistic bias at all. Their merits are the merits of the, on the whole, thoroughly sound and healthy national life which they embody, and when they fail of their effect, as those fail that ape the style of artificial splendor, it is a sign not so much of artistic misapprehension as of a breach with the national life.

But, after all, such aberrations are few. Even the Renaissance, the style of abstract laws and principles, was forced very generally to yield in this country to the demands of life, and warm wainscoting and spacious bays and clustering creepers have impressed upon its austere features the characteristic expression of the English domestic style. In its most genuine, which are not, it is to be feared, its most recent manifestations, this English domestic style is marked by a certain sober and secure comfort, combined with a steadfast sense of the duties and the seriousness of life. It forms, in its way, a very noble and beautiful architectural inheritance, in which the cottage and the castle play a like indispensable part. So that, if we have not in England finely arranged cities or monumental examples of pure style, we have something to compensate us for the absence of these, something that is the characteristic output of our national temperament and national history. Let us conclude by recommending to the reader Mr. Shaw Sparrow's recent book on this subject. He will find it a work of unusual interest on a peculiarly interesting theme.

THE FALL OF JUDAH.*

Unlike the historian of another Decline and Fall, Dr. Cheyne finds, or feels, himself obliged to begin his narrative with a reply to those who have rejected the critical principles which it presupposes. An introduction of nearly fifty pages, crowded with intricate details and personalities, reproduces in a somewhat expanded form the defence of his peculiar North Arabian theory, against Germans, Welshmen, and Americans especially, which has already appeared in the pages of the "Hibbert Journal." "Hence the irregular spelling, 'Jerahmeel' for 'Yerahme'el,' 'Mizrim' for 'Misrim.'" Why "hence"? Would it not have been possible, without much trouble, to remove the variant spellings and preserve a uniform terminology? This, however, is a mere detail. The more serious objection raised by this introductory chapter relates to the general method of the volume. The first part is avowedly historical. It describes the period from the discovery of the reform-book in the temple to the destruction of Jerusalem, which the author treated years ago in his fascinating popular volume on "Jeremiah." The second part analyses the law-books of Israel as contained in Exodus, and especially Deuteronomy. But both parts, the first as well as the second, are dominated by the peculiar theory of an extensive editorial correction of the primitive text, which is re-affirmed in the introduction. Now, apart altogether from the merits of the theory in question—which, in the last resort, is one of textual criticism—the mixture of narrative and conjectural emendation is disconcerting and inartistic in the extreme. No book on Old Testament criticism which comes from Dr. Cheyne's pen can fail to reward the patient reader with original suggestions or to impress him by its singular combination of inventiveness and labor. But, after all, literary criticism must depend upon solid, inductive principles, and the problem of documents requires to be carried a certain length along the line of these principles before it is any use to set about a re-construction of the historical situation. At the risk of being excluded by the author from the tribe of the "open-minded," we must confess that neither of these conditions is fulfilled in the present instance. The fact is that the book falls between two stools. It tries to be at once a chapter in ancient history and a piece of literary analysis; it really succeeds in being neither.

The examples of conjectural criticism are not a whit more convincing than in the author's earlier volumes. Thus, we are invited to believe that "Jachin," or Yakin, the pillar of I. Kings vii., 21, is "a corruption of some form of Yerahme'el (such as Yakman) the name of one of the holy Two, or Three, who formed, in North Arabia, the Divine Company" (p. 21). And, again, in Deut. xxxiii., 6, "Let Reuben live, and not die," is transformed, by processes (pp. 167f.) which leave one breathless, into "Let Reuben lay hold of Yerahme'el." Such specimens of emendation are not calculated to inspire much confidence in the judgment of the historian who rewrites the history of later Israel by means of them. Dr. Cheyne hints that we should be thankful to critics like Winckler and himself, who "shake us out of our slumber." This is true enough. For any stimulus to fresh inquiry one should be grateful, and Dr. Cheyne may be assured that he will not miss the reward he deserves. But the alternative to critical drowsiness is not chasing will-o'-the-wisps over North Arabia.

The historical results of the book are not unfamiliar, as a rule, but there are two critical verdicts of the author which are of special significance. It is reassuring to discover that he minimises the influence of the Code of Hammurabi upon the Book of the Covenant in Exodus xx-xxiii. "To prove such a thesis a much larger amount of plausible evidence would have to be found. That both the Book of the Covenant and Deuteronomy may contain elements of non-Israelitish origin can be admitted, but not that any of these came, except indirectly, from Babylon" (pp. 104-105). Then, again, the "finding" of the reform-book in the temple by Hilkiah (pp. 11-15) is attributed frankly to deliberate purpose, and interesting Egyptian parallels are adduced. "It is an idea of Oriental priesthoods that religious authority needs to be kept up by illusion. We may assume, therefore, that Hilkiah was not groping in the dark, but saw what, from a priestly point of view, had to take place for the good of religion. Acting according to an ancient priestly custom, which involved illusion, he took the recently-composed law-book to the temple that he might find it there." This law-book, by the way, Dr. Cheyne refuses to regard, with Professor Kennett, as a prophetic utterance denouncing sacrifice. We wish that a scholar of his eminence had come to terms with Dr. John Cullen's ingenious theory of an original Book of the Covenant, which has been re-edited into the canonical Deuteronomy. The latter scholar's volume ("The Book of the Covenant in Moab," Glasgow, 1903), is much too acute and independent to be overlooked, or rather ignored, as it is by Dr. Cheyne, and the author's reply to his Continental critics, in Higenfeld's "Zeitschrift für Wiss. Theologie" (1905, pp. 181-193), elucidates several data of Deuteronomy in a more satisfactory fashion than the reader will probably find in Dr. Cheyne's pages.

A WOMAN'S STORY.*

In a very clever book, "We Women and our Authors," by the German writer, Laura Marholm, the attitude of the modern plebeian to the woman question is admirably sketched. "Numbers of fathers and brothers were released from the burden of supporting their unmarried women-folk; they were even released from the necessity of marrying them.

* "A Woman at Bay (Una Donna)." By Sibilla Aleramo. Translated by Maria H. Lansdale. Putnam's Sons. 6s.

Indeed, nowadays, many daughters and sisters work for their parents and younger brothers. Year after year, competition grows harder, and every department of labor is overcrowded with envious, nervous, panting people, who are pitted one against the other. . . . What does the plebeian man want with the superior woman? Nothing, of course. She is merely an annoyance to him; a burden. If he is enterprising, he marries a well-filled purse; if he has a more affectionate disposition, he marries a wife of his own class. The more cultured, highly-developed women are thrust on one side; nay, more, they are starved. They have a gnawing at the heart, a rankling distrust of happiness, of love, and of men in particular." "Women have begun to ask, 'Who am I?' and not: 'Whose am I?'"

This drives the nail well home. The particular irritation that the average man feels with the women who ventilate "Women's Rights," and who write novels of the class of which Signora Aleramo's "Una Donna" is a remarkably fine example, springs partly from his perception that a society that can no longer provide marriage and home life for its women, forces them to become independent of men, to go out into the world and to claim equal privileges. And he resents what he is powerless to change. In this connection it is of interest to recall the short-sighted criticisms of the so-called "sex novel" of twenty years ago. Instead of asking what social causes were at work behind that domestic revolt, the masculine reviewer pooh-poohed the entire class of novel as the hysterical aberration of the unwomanly woman; and he is now confronted with an extended development of the main movement, in the general campaign for Woman Suffrage. It is to be remarked how the intellectual "advanced" women who are conducting that battle drop no word on the many interesting questions which lie all round the subject. They fear the whole issue, and confine themselves to trying to gain the key of the situation—the political equality of the sexes. And yet it is a pity that our imaginative literature should throw no light on the battle that is being reported in the press and waged on the platform. In other countries, however, the Philistine public is more accessible to ideas, and it is not surprising that "Una Donna," which, in the phrase of an admiring critic, "has traversed Italy like a flame," should have been translated into French, German, Russian, Spanish, and Swedish, and that the belated version which has now reached these "poor islanders," should hail from America. It is not our intention to discuss the issues which the book raises as "a novel with a purpose," but to dwell briefly on its striking merits as a psychological document of an unhappy married life.

Personal chronicles of this class are, in England at least, generally spoilt by the author's naïve attempts to show herself adorable, but the heroine of "Una Donna" does not try to veil any unpleasing shade of her own character and words. She probably could not do it if she wished. In her picture of her submission to her husband, and of her final escape from him, with her child left, perforce, as a hostage in his hands, she shows an intense, bitter sincerity. She is a spiritual egoist, this woman, but she reveals a certain nobility of soul in her outlook, and in her unflinching gaze at the truth. It is a not uncommon story, in its main outline, this of the dead-sea fruit of the union of a superior woman, of a sensitive, serious, and aspiring nature, to a vulgarian, of her speedy disillusionment, frightful weariness, and intense and deepening suffering while the legal bond holds her, and the pressure of public opinion rivets the chain. It is precisely because of the commonness of the tragedy, that Signora Aleramo's novel will strike deep into the consciousness of tens of thousands of modern women. The narrative, which has many poignant passages, is painful from the fact that the heroine is pushed into the trap when a young girl, and that we see her purgatory stretching before her for long years, while she is too innocent and inexperienced to comprehend why this misery is hers. She sketches very well her childhood, her girlish devotion to her proud, clever, and self-centred father, her dim perception that there is a household tragedy implicit in her mother's faded, timid, anxious figure, in her father's growing outbursts of temper and increased absences from home. The tumult in the young girl's soul when she discovers accidentally that it is common talk in the neighborhood that her father constantly visits a poor family in the suburbs, and that he has a mistress, a factory hand, is done with profound understanding of the hardness of idealistic youth, when life becomes incomprehensible and hateful because our ideals of others are shattered.

It is at this moment when the girl, still immature, is judging others, that she falls a prey to a man, her social inferior, who has designs of marrying into his employer's family, and of raising himself by marrying the girl he has abused. It is a striking merit of "Una Donna" that the motives, acts, and commonness of this man, who as her husband is to direct her future life, and, under the shield of legal union and social convention, has the power of public opinion on his side, seem to us quite natural and inevitable, seen through the veil of the girl's dawning hatred. In this picture of marital life in the South of Italy, a curious sense is communicated to us of a semi-feudal atmosphere, in which public opinion supports the husband to the last. In his fits of jealousy he isolates the woman, shutting her away from all contact with any but the members of his own family. The psychological crisis comes in the chapter called "The Intruder," when the starved feminine instinct for love, "for feeling oneself a part of another, and giving voluntarily," awakens in the lonely woman, and she encourages the ambiguous advances of a stranger, who hypnotises her by his intent, impelling glance. But in a paroxysm of inner humiliation and scorn, she drives him from her when he, too, shows he is of common clay. There is something extremely fine-edged in the woman's bitter repudiation and loathing of anything that soils her ideal of herself. Her honor is untouched; but her husband's jealousy is awakened, and she becomes the victim of his suspicions and mortified pride. The scene in Chapter IX., "Flight," where she confesses to what has not passed, her husband's fury, the waking delirium of her despair, and the shadow of madness touching her, till she seeks oblivion in suicide, and is dragged back to life—all this is done with a remorseless intensity that, artistically, is of the first order. The greatest skill is shown throughout in the understanding and presentation of obscure states of mental and moral distress. The question of social ethics, raised by "Una Donna" was, indeed, raised a century ago by Mary Wollstonecraft's "Vindication." Looking back, we see that educated society has admitted, in nearly every argument she advanced, the validity of her pleading. Italy and Spain are perhaps the two most backward countries in Europe, in respect of recognising the "rights" that married women in England have gained, piece by piece, in these last three generations.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

The first two articles in "The Nineteenth Century and After" deal with the military situation—Major-General Frank Russell arguing the alarmist case that invasion is possible. He suggests the construction of a Clyde and Forth canal, and thinks that unless something is done at once "London before long may share the fate of Carthage, and Macaulay's New Zealander, before many generations have passed away, may actually gaze on the ruins of St. Paul's." The Earl of Errol contends that Mr. Haldane's scheme, so far from having furnished 90,000 additional men, has given us no substantial addition. "The exact contrary is the case, and we have really 80,000 men less to draw upon than we had three years ago, to say nothing of a decrease of 3,000 officers." Mr. Noel Buxton writes in praise of the Young Turks, believing that, whether or not all hopes will be fulfilled, "two good things are certain: first that the Hamidian régime in its hated form will not return; second, that, even if Macedonia could be dealt with by the Powers, the rest of the Empire has most to gain by the success of Young Turkey." Lord Ribblesdale, in an amusing, rather Frondist article on "The Lords and the Licensing Bill," protests that two or three more operations of a similar nature to that in which the Lords rejected that Bill, will incline him "to think that, on its own showing, the House of Lords is asking to be converted into a debating society. It is certainly all that we were permitted to be by Lord Lansdowne's decision the other night." Mr J A. R.

Marriott urges that the Report of Lord Rosebery's Committee is "a landmark in the history of the House of Lords," and demands for it "a respectful, if critical, consideration." Lady Paget contributes a readable article on "Court and Society at Berlin in the 'Fifties." There are two literary articles, a brilliant appreciation of Milton by Mr. Herbert Paul, and an estimate of Edgar Allan Poe by Mr. Lewis Melville.

In "The Fortnightly Review," M. M. R. Ivanovitch writes on "Europe and the Annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina," pointing out that Austria's action is a flagrant violation of the rights of Europe, and that her policy is "to denationalise and to suppress all that goes by the name of Serb." Mr. A. Maurice Low discusses "The Future of Parties in America." He anticipates the rise of a Labor Party, and a possibility that in future foreign politics will be found to be the dividing line between the great American parties. "The Opposition in the Commons," by "Auditor Tantum," is in a vein of Conservative criticism of party leaders, but it is not so ferocious or so palpably aimed at the wiping out of the reduced Free Trade "cave," as the article in last month's "National Review." It makes two curious mistakes. It writes the name of Mr. Fellowes as "Fellows," and speaks of Mr. Jeffreys as if he were still alive. "Auditor" banishes Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Stuart Wortley, Mr. Arnold Forster, Mr. Akers Douglas, and Sir William Anson. Mr. Long has no ideas; the ball no longer lies at Mr. Wyndham's feet; Mr. Lyttelton "fumbles"; and Mr. Austen Chamberlain is not more enlivening. The article speaks in just praise of Mr. Cave, and thinks it would be deplorable to shut out Lord Robert Cecil from office. But on the whole it thinks Mr. Balfour splendid—in isolation. Mr. W. T. Stead in "Why I Know the Dead Return," claims to have had regular communication with his son, who died twelve months ago. "For me," he says, "the problem is solved, the truth is established, and I am glad to have this opportunity of testifying publicly to all the world that, so far as I am concerned, doubt on this subject is henceforth impossible." "Executor" endeavors to discover "The Blessings of Naval Armaments," a Nonconformist minister gives an interesting and conservative view of "Nonconformity and Politics," Mr. John Masefield writes on "Daniel Defoe," and Mr. Filson Young discusses Mr. John Davidson as the great naturalist poet of his age.

"The Contemporary Review" opens with an article by Mr. W. T. Stead, who thinks that the day of cast-iron empires is fast drawing to a close, and that "in one form or another the whole vast stretch of country from Petersburg to Prague and from Prague to Adrianople will be covered by a federation or federations of free self-governing States, as peaceful as the Swiss Cantons, in which the Slavs, by the sheer force of numbers, will, of necessity, be in the ascendant." Mr. Harold Spender treats of "Unemployment Insurance," urging the adoption of such a measure, and sketching the methods adopted in Germany, Switzerland, and Belgium. Dr. J. H. Horace Round discusses with great learning and command of the subject Dr. Gee's paper on "The Continuity of the Anglican Church," read at the last Church Congress. Professor R. M. Meyer of Berlin writes on "German Literature." He holds that Germany has stood for "the general modernising and democratisation of poetry," and that for Germans even Wordsworth is "too much of a gentleman; too correct in his feeling; too much confined to pattern in his expression; too typical in his experience." "The Literary Supplement" contains an article on "Christmas and the Elder Gods," by "Museus," together with the usual number of book reviews.

The second number of a periodical is a severer test of its editor than the first, and the Editor of "The English Review" is to be congratulated on producing a second number even more interesting than its predecessor was. It opens with a poem of some length, by D. G. Rossetti, now published for the first time. The subject is a smoking match between a miserly old Dutchman and the Devil, which ends in orthodox fashion by the Devil winning his opponent's soul. The serials begun in the former number are continued, Mr. Wells's novel "Tono-Bungay" more than fulfilling the promise of its first instalment. There is a short story by M. Anatole France, a travel sketch by Mr. Cunninghame Graham, and the first section of a Moorish ghost story of the seventeenth century, by Vernon Lee. Among the shorter articles the most striking is an account of the present state of Russia, by "D. S." "The English Review" is, from a literary standpoint, far and away the best of the monthly periodicals now before the public.

Mr. E. Beresford Chancellor has followed up his book on the London Squares by another dealing with some famous London houses past and present. "The Private Palaces of London" (Kegan Paul, 21s. net) will, like its predecessor, be welcomed by those who care for what is stately and picturesque in the history of London. Although great changes are rapidly taking place in the appearance of the London streets, a fair proportion of the "private palaces" still exist, though most of them are notable rather for the beautiful or costly objects to be found within their walls than for any nobility in their architecture. Mr. Chancellor has made a good choice of the houses whose history he relates. It is not possible in a brief notice to touch upon any of the interesting themes discussed in his pages. We can only say that his work is something more than a mere assembly of anecdotes relating to the great London houses. On the contrary, it is a useful contribution to London history that could only have come from a careful study of the subject. The value of the book is enhanced by the excellent collection of prints and photographs with which it is illustrated.

A strong plea for missionary work is embodied in the "Life of Stewart of Lovedale" (Hodder & Stoughton, 5s. net), written by Dr. James Wells. The late James Stewart was one of the pioneers of mission work in South and Central Africa; and the flourishing establishment at Lovedale in Cape Colony is witness to his remarkable energy and powers of organisation. The son of an Edinburgh cab proprietor, he left Scotland in 1861, to join Livingstone on the Zambesi, and his association with the great explorer lasted until the day of the latter's death. Subsequently, he may be said to have taken up Livingstone's work at the point where the latter left it. The foundation of Livingstonia on the north-west shore of Lake Nyassa was due to Stewart's initiative; in fact, the entire system of African mission stations, as it exists at the present time, owes its inception to his example. He died in 1905 at the age of seventy-six. There are many glimpses of the practical side of mission work provided in this volume, and the subject's close connection, in later years, with the administrative heads of South Africa, forms an interesting side-light on some current matters of British policy in that quarter. The color question is freely and not unsympathetically discussed; but the "Ethiopian Movement" comes in for rough handling. A quantity of capital photographs, illustrative of the missions and their industries, complete a volume which only errs in being a little too long.

The ultra-personal touch of the modern newspaper interview makes itself felt in Mr. William Bayard Hale's account of "A Week in the White House with President Roosevelt" (Putnams, 3s. 6d. net). The sketch of Mr. Taft's predecessor is, nevertheless, a vivid enough character study by a writer who went and saw and was conquered by the President's personality. The latter is described at business and play from day to day of the week, and his manner of speech and methods of dealing with callers are set forth with the utmost detail, the general conclusion being that Mr. Roosevelt's claim to genius, like that of President Lincoln, rests upon his understanding of the "average" American citizen. Full responsibility "for any statement, sentiment, or opinion that follows," is assumed by the author in his Foreword—a pronouncement that should silence critics who might suspect him merely of having the courage of Mr. Roosevelt's convictions.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."

THE INDEX TO VOLUME III. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY and can be had free on application to the Manager.

Richards, 3s 6d. net) is an agreeable volume of essays on Hogarth, Reynolds, Gainsborough, Romney, George Morland, Lawrence, Turner, and Constable. The selection is catholic enough, considering the period covered; neither need Mr. Dowman apologise for including Lawrence, because he "rounds off an epoch" or is highly esteemed in France, since Lawrence's contemporary fame was almost, if not quite, equal to that of any other of his time, and nowadays, judged by the auction-room records, has undergone a revival rather than an eclipse. Catholic, also, is his judgment of most of his subjects. In regard to Constable, however, whose work he terms "noble prose," in contrast to Turner's "poetry"—not the truest of distinctions—his estimate is clearly colored by his admiration for Turner, and seems to us to be not as well digested as the rest. Thus with reference to the Leaping Horse, he observes that the crimson fringe on the horse's trappings "was invented by Constable as a deliberate pictorial effect—an unusual procedure with this painter." There is nothing unusual in the introduction by Constable of a bit of vivid color to key the rest of the picture. Neither did he disdain deliberate pictorial effects, as is admitted by Mr. Dowman on page 282, where he observes, "his choice of a natural scene was governed by distinctly pictorial considerations." The half-tone reproductions in this book are popularly chosen and finely executed

We cannot suggest any particular reason for the publication of Mr. Henry Saxon's "Churchwardens of the Past" (John Ouseley). It is not, as one might suppose from the title, an attempt to deal historically with a rather interesting church office, but—with the exception of a very brief introductory chapter setting forth the past and present duties of churchwardens—a series of would-be humorous sketches of "types" actually encountered by the author. All these types appear to us to be very much alike. At any rate they share the characteristic of speaking in an almost incomprehensible dialect. The one remarkable feature of this booklet is the length of its ill-constructed sentences, and its one virtue is its restriction to seventy short pages.

The Week in the City.

	Price end of Dec., 1908.		Price Friday morning, Jan. 8.
Consols 2½ per cent.	84⅛	...	83⅞
German 3 per cent.	84½	...	84½
Russian 5 per cent.	97¼	...	96⅞

Inquiries recently made in the City about the revival in trade indicate that both China and Japan are beginning to emerge from the long and severe depression, which amounted in some of the large towns to serious banking crises. An important improvement in the trade with India is expected when the rice and corn crops begin to move. American importers are acting cautiously, in view of approaching tariff reductions. The Board of Trade returns for December give import figures higher than last year's record, although prices are now much lower. On the whole, competent authorities seem to be convinced that the decline of trade has been checked, and most of them look forward hopefully to a gradual improvement, if only the danger of war in the Near East can be averted. It is this which has been hanging over the stock markets, though the set back in American prices has been long overdue. At the beginning of the week it looked quite as if the Austrians might take the offensive against Servia in consequence of the Servian Minister's foolish speech; but when an explanation was forthcoming the markets took heart once more.

The City is beginning to feel nervous about the Bank Rate in view of the withdrawal of another million to Argentina. Unless something unexpected happens before next week the Directors of the Bank of England may feel it necessary to raise their minimum rate of discount. This would be unfortunate for the Russian loan which is expected to appear in about a fortnight. It is chiefly owing to the accumulation of gold in Paris that the Bank of England's reserve has fallen so low. But apparently the provinces are also requiring more gold; for the currency does not return rapidly from circulation.

New Investments.

Among new prospectuses, the Bristol Corporation issue of 3½ per cent. stock at 99 is a gilt-edged stock which deserves the attention of those who are content with a moderate interest and complete security. The City of Montreal 4 per cent. issue, at 103, yields a little more, and the Province of Alberta loan, at 99½, offers, I think, good security, and is a trifle better still. The trouble about Canada is that every community and institution seems to be needing money, and for some time to come, therefore, capital put into Canadian securities is not likely to appreciate. But so long as the investor sticks to the Governments or large Municipalities he is perfectly safe. What you should avoid is a village calling itself a city, which is quite capable, if its debts become onerous, of moving itself a few miles away. The 4½ per cent. loan issued for railways by the Grand Duchy of Finland by Messrs. Hambro, at £92 10s., has not been very successful, to judge from the fact that applicants got all they asked for, and that a small discount was established. But then the Jewish houses did all they could to mar its success. The Chilian Government, however, is to be congratulated upon the readiness with which the three millions it asked for were taken up. The list was only open for two or three hours on Monday morning, and a premium was immediately established. Chili seems to be emerging from its crisis, for the peso, which fell below eightpence last June, has now recovered to thirteen pence, and, according to a Reuter telegram, the gold standard may be restored and specie payments resumed next year. Ten years ago Chili was regarded as the most stable and trustworthy of the South American Republics, and if the friction between Argentina and Brazil continues, it may resume its old position.

The Ind Coope Fiasco.

It is a curious comment on Brewery Finance that a month or two after the rejection of the Licensing Bill the first debenture holders in this big brewery should have found it necessary for their own protection to apply to a Vacation Judge for the appointment of a receiver, which application has been granted. The truth is, as a friendly critic of the Trade feels bound to remark, "these brewery companies, no doubt, made their great mistake in paying fatally excessive sums for tied houses, in the great public-house boom." And now the Armaments boom, and the war scares which are always stimulated by the pot house and the drinking saloon, will probably stiffen the back of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and make his hand all the heavier when he comes to raise the Licence Duties in his approaching Budget.

Diary of the Week.

At last a real advance has been made towards the settlement of the Balkan squabble. On Saturday Austria decided to make monetary compensation to Turkey: she offered £2,500,000 in addition to the other terms, but refused, under any circumstances, to give more. Turkey apparently has accepted this offer, though a few preliminaries will have to be arranged before a formal agreement is signed. There is a curious condition attached to the monetary payment, which is to be for the State lands in Bosnia, and is not to be made until it is proved that these lands belong to the Turkish, not to the Bosnian, Government. No difficulty, however, is expected in this connection, and, indeed, Austria is already preparing to hand over the first portion of the indemnity. Turkey has made a thoroughly good bargain. She gets, besides a large sum of money, the return of Novi Bazar, the abandonment by Austria of her protectorate over the Albanian Christians, freedom to increase the tariff and to set up monopolies, and a promise to discuss the abolition of the Capitulations. It is expected that a settlement with Turkey will follow quickly. Negotiations have been resumed. Servia, too, has been warned by the Powers to be of good behaviour. The only country which finds the prospect of a speedy and general arrangement melancholy is Russia.

Kiamil Pasha, the Grand Vizier, made his statement in the Turkish Chamber on Wednesday, and secured an unanimous vote of confidence. He gave credit to the Sultan, the Army, and "that eminently patriotic body, the Committee of Union and Progress," for the establishment of the Constitution. Schemes had been drafted for the reform of every administrative department, and foreign assistance had been called in for the reorganisation of the Army, the Navy, and the Treasury, and for the development of irrigation in Mesopotamia and Cilicia. The first need of the State was to put the finances in a healthy condition. For years the Budget had not balanced, the floating debt had increased, and the State properties been mortgaged. A loan would have to be raised for immediate needs, and new revenue sources tapped. The Government noted with pleasure that Great Britain had once more co-operated in furnishing the Treasury with funds, and it realised that the best guarantees that could be given to foreign investors were a sane financial administration, and an unadventurous domestic and foreign policy. The proclamation of the Constitution had secured the respect and the friendship of the Powers. It had put a stop to intervention in Macedonia, and it had re-established "the old sincere friendship" with Great Britain, with whom, before the proclamation, Turkey's relations had been not very friendly. The questions at issue with Austria and Bulgaria would soon be satisfactorily solved. The statement was received with enthusiasm, and the decision of the Committee to support the Cabinet had been previously made clear by its dismissing from the staff of its organ those responsible for the attacks on Kiamil.

Mr. Churchill made a disappointing speech on the House of Lords question at Birmingham on Wednesday. He declared in favor of a "normal" period of five years' life for the Administration. He coupled this with the qualification that in future no Liberal Government should take office without securing from the King a promise, similar to that wrung from William the Fourth, that the opposition of the House of Lords to their reform would be "swamped" by a sufficient creation of peers. Mr. Churchill's verbal attack on the Lords was strong enough. He insisted that Lord Lansdowne put their claims far higher than Lord Salisbury had ever put them, and that beneath the mask of an Assembly of Notables they concealed "the leer of the Artful Dodger" of politics. But as Mr. Churchill does not propose to fight the Lords, is not this language equivalent to saying: "Hit me again and again. I won't hit back; but, at least, I can abuse you"?

The conclusion of Mr. Churchill's speech was that the Lords' destructive work had only imposed "checks and vexations" upon the Government, whose "vital and essential" lines of policy remained intact. However, he suggested that there might be a speedy dissolution if the Lords rejected the Budget. For the present, however, the field of social reform remained open, and the Government would till it diligently, especially within the area of child labor, unemployment, and sweated and unskilled industry. This line of policy almost invites Sir Alexander Acland Hood's satirical comment, "The Government are always saying that they are to stand or fall by this or that great question. But when a question arises, they neither stand nor fall. They quietly lie down."—We note that Mr. Churchill's speech is not in harmony with Mr. Haldane's bolder declaration at a meeting in East Lothian on Saturday. Mr. Haldane's statement was that the situation with the Lords could not continue, and that a step forward was necessary in order to adjust the centre of political gravity.

Labor and capital in the shipping trade have signed a great treaty of peace, which stops the leak in the engineering agreement. The agreement which is concluded between the employers' Federation and the twenty-six trade unions concerned in the making of ships, both fixes wages for piece and time work and adjusts disputes. For this purpose it sets up a catena of conferences—first, a local conference of employers and trade unionists; secondly, a general conference; and, finally, a "Grand Conference," in which the whole machinery of trade unionism will face the Shipbuilding Employers' Federation. No stoppage of work can occur while these bodies are deliberating, while the fixing of wage-rates is thorough and comprehensive. It looks now as if strikes might practically be eliminated from all our staple industries, coal, cotton—where a sliding scale of wages will probably be set up, the railway service—in which, as Mr. Churchill said at Leicester, the men have elected their representatives to the Conciliation Board—and now shipbuilding. Engineering alone holds out. But Mr. Churchill showed that even last year, which was one of industrial disturbance, a million of men settled wage disputes without striking. And the State machinery of conciliation will soon be at work. Practically the reign of non-compulsory arbitration is set up for organised, skilled industries, the unskilled trades remaining perforce outside. All this makes for the revival of trade which Mr. Churchill's hopeful Leicester speech predicted.

The revolt in Ispahan has become as pronounced as in Tabriz. A council has been formed there to govern the town, and it is trying to co-operate with Tabriz. The Shah is thus cut off from the southern as well as from the northern provinces. That he has lost the support of the clergy, except a few reactionary sycophants, is manifest from the text of the proclamation issued by the priests of Kerbela and Njef. The guardians of these, the most sacred shrines of the Persian Shiahs, denounce the Shah for having broken his oath to preserve the Constitution, bombarded the Parliament, murdered the deputies, attacked the lives, property, and honor of the people, and cut out the tongue of any one who dared to breathe the word "freedom." They declare the Shah a usurper and robber, and make known that the nation will not be bound by any loan contracted, concession granted, or treaty made, until the Constitution is restored. Meanwhile the character of the projected Anglo-Russian intervention is being slowly revealed. The "Novoe Vremya" tells us that intervention is necessary to prevent "a palace tragedy and wholesale uprisings," and that it should take the form of the appointment of foreign councillors to all the departments of State; in other words, that Persia should be turned into a second Egypt, but under a condominium.

President Roosevelt has not come out well from his encounter with the Senate and the House of Representatives, but he seems to have scored a partial triumph over his old adversary, Senator Tillman. Mr. Roosevelt's message practically charged both Houses with sympathy with corruption. They had, he said, cut down the vote for secret service, because they resented its use against a Senator and a Congressman guilty of land frauds in Oregon, and were afraid of its application to themselves. The House of Representatives retorted by passing a resolution, by an enormous majority, declaring the President's language in his message to be a breach of privilege, and ordering it to be tabled. The Senate replied with a tu quoque, charging the President with letting off the Steel Trust for a breach of the Anti-Trust Law in return for help in stopping the financial panic. The Senate tried to get at Mr. Roosevelt's Attorney-General; Mr. Roosevelt retorted by refusing to allow him to act on the Senate's instructions. Mr. Tillman's defence against the President's charge of having used his political influence to divert land from public uses to his private advantage was not thought to be conclusive. But the Press is mostly hostile to Mr. Roosevelt, with the significant exception of his old enemy, Mr. Hearst.

The personnel of the Government has been slightly altered during the week. Sir Hudson Kearley, who has made one of the best Parliamentary Secretaries of the Board of Trade that the country has ever known, has been made Chairman of the new London Port Authority, and, at his own request, will at first fill the office without a salary. His place at the Board of Trade has been taken by Mr. H. J. Tennant. Mr. Tennant is the Prime Minister's brother-in-law, but he has shown special knowledge of industrial questions, and thus far his appointment is a fair one. But his criticism of the Scottish Land Bill will make his nomination unpopular in Scotland, and it strengthens the rather excessive force of the moderate or Imperialist wing of the Government. Indeed, the Prime Minister seems to us really the most advanced member of his Administration.

The Kaiser is unfortunate. He cannot even address the generals commanding army corps, assembled at the usual New Year's gathering, without some waiter or bird of the air carrying the matter. He commented on an article called "Present Day Warfare," in the "Deutsche Revue," attributed to Count von Schlieffen, ex-Chief of the General Staff. The article represents Germany and Austria as attacked on all sides at once by England and the other Powers of Europe. It then deals with the military problem exactly as Lord Roberts and other distinguished soldiers and sailors are continually dealing with the problems that would arise if we lost command of the sea, and Germany, America, or what other Powers you please, invaded us together. Besides the official statement in the "Imperial Gazette," there is other evidence to prove that the Kaiser only commented on the strictly military side of the question. Especially he appears to have discussed the relation to strategy of the great fortresses round Germany, and the change in tactics necessitated by the improvement in arms. As is well known, the Germans on manœuvres still practise the attack with heavily massed troops, whereas the Kaiser supported Count von Schlieffen's view that the attack is now only possible for skirmishing lines in extended order, as we proved in the Boer War, and as, indeed, Moltke was forced to admit in the war of 1870. To seek further cause of offence in such a discussion is equally ungenerous and needless.

The Departmental Committee appointed by the Home Office to inquire into the working of the Inebriates Act and the earlier Drunkards' Act, has issued a bold Report in favor of compulsory State action. The Report finds that the Act of 1898 has been almost useless, for it has only dealt with a little more than one in every thousand of the cases of inebriate offenders. The Committee rightly, it seems to us, decline to favor experiments in treatment by drugs, and treat mainly of the moral reformation of inebriates—criminal and other—by way of discipline and detention. This latter remedy they would make compulsory under certain conditions. They would allow a relative, friend, or guardian, to ask for a compulsory order of committal to a retreat, while convicted inebriates would be interned, with a probationary period, rising (with the sentences) on the repetition of the offence. This provision is to be made by the State and not by the local authorities.

The Protectionists continue to make small gains within the Tory Party. Speaking at Blackburn on Saturday, the new Lord Derby, who was a Free Trader in the past Parliament, and to whom the Confederates have issued a notice of banishment from a future Tory Government, announced that he had joined the Tariff Reform League, and pronounced for protecting trades suffering from "unfair competition." This is, of course, rank Protection, though Lord Derby affects not to see it. On Monday, Mr. Austen Chamberlain dealt, at Bromsgrove, with the shrinkage of the home area under corn and hop cultivation. He did not, however, draw the full conclusion of protective duties against foreign and colonial producers, but suggested gradual experiments in co-operative small holdings, based on ownership. Smaller agricultural industries might, he thought, be helped by a "revised tariff." The Protectionists are being drawn into the dilemma which ruined the Fair Trade agitation. They cannot protect the countryman without hurting the townsman, or the townsman without hurting the countryman, and they will have in effect to decide between losing either the rural or the urban vote.

Mr. Bryce, who, less than a year ago, commenced the settlement of outstanding difficulties with the United States by negotiating an Arbitration Treaty, has carried that good work a notable step further by concluding an international waterways agreement. The treaty, which was signed on Monday, provides for the establishment of a joint commission for the division of water rights on the American-Canadian frontier. It must, of course, be sanctioned by the Senate before ratification, but the Senate is expected to approve. Canadian opinion, though not quite unanimous, seems to favor the agreement, and the Press notes that as the English Government's representatives on the Commission will be Canadians sitting at Ottawa, Downing Street will cease to have the responsibility for any disposition of Canadian rights the Commission may make. A much more complicated, important, and difficult treaty is in process of negotiation for settling the secular fishing disputes between the United States, Newfoundland, and Canada. A draft of this document reached London more than a week ago.

It is becoming pretty clear that Japanese intrigues were responsible for Yuan-Shih-Kai's fall. Yuan-Shih-Kai was the greatest opponent of Japan in Manchuria, and he sent Tang-Shao-Yi to Washington to conclude a Chinese-American alliance, the point of which was to be directed against Japan. This policy broke down when America made her agreement with Japan, and Japan took advantage of this failure to secure Yuan-Shih-Kai's dismissal just before the opening of the critical negotiations with Japan with regard to Manchuria. The Tokio Press indignantly denies that Japan had any hand in upsetting Yuan-Shih-Kai, but the corroborative evidence is too strong. The Powers, for instance, have found it impossible to make representations to the Chinese Government, because of the refusal of Japan and Russia to co-operate, and both Tieh-Liang, the leader of the cabal against Yuan-Shih-Kai, and the new head of the Chinese Foreign Office, are in notoriously intimate relations with the Japanese Legation.

Our Paris correspondent writes:—The new career of the guillotine was inaugurated at Béthune on Monday by a scene which can only be described as a national disgrace. All through Sunday night a hilarious crowd drank in the cafés, or surrounded the prison, cheering for the executioner, and enlivening the last hours of four of their fellow-creatures by ribald jests and cries for vengeance. The authorities, in order to facilitate a fitting preparation for the amusement of the morning, allowed the cafés to remain open all night, and the sale of Flemish beer is said to have been unusually large, even for a thirsty district. The account of the execution in the "Temps," by the very coldness of its impartial narrative, gives a more vivid impression than could any sensational "word-painting." The "jeering and festive crowd of men, women and children" fought for places as near as possible to the guillotine; gentlemen who arrived in motor cars offered fifty francs apiece for the 250 seats reserved for officials, reporters, and other privileged persons. The "performance" being a little late in beginning (two of the convicts were hearing Mass) the "house" became impatient, and recovered its good spirits only when the first victim was dragged half-fainting to the guillotine. The first sight of blood further "excited the passions of the crowd," which cheered more and more loudly as each head fell. When Abel Pollet's head rolled into the basket, the spectators "broke out into delirious joy." One of the wretches, met as he issued from the prison by cries of "A mort! Nous voulons voir!" exclaimed in a strangled voice: "Allons, laissez-moi tranquille! Laissez, laissez!"

The decision of the Scottish Rugby Football Union to withdraw from the International match against England, arranged for March 20th next, has come as a surprise to most footballers, though dissatisfaction with the methods of the English Union has existed for some time. The Scottish Union has long been determined, and, in our opinion, rightly determined, to uphold the amateur system. In pursuance of this policy, a request was made in March, 1907, for a statement of the accounts of the New Zealand team which visited this country in 1905. The statement has only just been furnished, and discloses the fact that each member of that team received an "allowance" of a guinea a week, in addition to all out-of-pocket expenses. As this payment was made with the approval of the English Committee, the Scottish Union decided that, unless professionalism was to be legalised, a decided step must be taken. Most Rugby footballers who wish to preserve the purity of the sport will agree that some such action was necessary. The English Union has more than once shown serious laxity in dealing with the matter. Players have been selected of whom it was an open secret that they hovered on the threshold of professionalism. Protracted tours by visiting teams have done a great deal to revive and stimulate an interest in Rugby football, but it is a question whether more harm has not been done to non-professional sport by the large sums which some of these touring teams have collected. The continual menace of the Northern Union and the state in which Association football finds itself to-day ought to be a straight enough warning to the English Committee against tampering with the amateur status.

Politics and Affairs.

THE DOMINATING ISSUE NOT DOMINANT.

THERE are many complimentary things which can justly be said about Mr. Churchill's speech at Birmingham, but it has one obvious drawback. It was not the speech that the Liberal Party wanted him to deliver. Liberals wish to be led against the House of Lords, not to be fed with excuses for running away from it. Yet this is the only fare which Mr. Churchill provides. He does indeed repeat in form the rhetorical attack on the Lords with which every Liberal review of the Session of 1908 is graced. But he deprives this attitude of all its reality, and we are bound to add, of nearly all its justification, when he states the conclusion of it to be that though Parliamentary Liberalism has sustained "checks and vexations," it has not suffered an arrest of the "vital and essential lines of its policy." If that is the extent of the Lords' interference with Liberal legislation, we have indeed no "dominating issue" before us, and we see no reason why Mr. Churchill need concern himself to deliver even the inspiring prophecy of a dissolution in 1911. "Checks and vexations" are things which all Ministers have to confront, and if this Government has endured nothing worse at the hands of the Peers, there exists no constitutional trouble worth the name. Mr. Gladstone was wrong when he stated fourteen years ago that the quarrel between Lords and Commons must be brought to an issue. Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman was equally wrong when he induced the House of Commons to pass a resolution in limitation of the veto. And the Prime Minister was equally astray when he insisted that the problem of the power of the House of Lords absorbed and overshadowed every other political question. Under the existing dispensation, Liberalism, counting a majority of nearly 200 votes in the House of Commons, is admittedly deprived of the power either to touch or to deal effectually with the following questions—

Education,
Land Tenure,
Temperance,
Irish Government,
The Suffrage,
Disestablishment,

to which we add, with perfect confidence, all legislation affecting unemployment and poverty which really qualifies the "workhouse test." It is an arguable proposition that there are minor devices of social reform which a Liberal Government can pass with advantage to the community, and with no appreciable subtraction from their merits by the House of Lords. But it shows small knowledge of the movement of political forces to suggest that a great party can accept this limitation of its energies, and it seems at variance with the Prime Minister's express declaration. We are not sure, indeed, that Mr. Churchill does not go further than this, for he seemed to hint to his Birmingham friends that if the Lords would consent to pass the next Budget, the Liberal Party might consent to treat bygones as bygones, and to forget such trifles as the rejection of the first-class measure of last Session. We greatly regret the reference to the Budget. What right have we to suppose, even of this House of Lords, that the financial powers of the House of Commons, firmly embedded as they are in the fabric of the Constitution, are assailable by the Peers, and to speak as if a tolerable relationship between the two Houses could be sustained on the basis of "hands off the Budget," while the whole domain of non-financial and specially Liberal legislation was left open to the ravages of the hostile army?

We take almost equal objection to the argument of Mr. Churchill's speech that though constitutional and political reforms may be abandoned, a Liberal Government may find a harbor of refuge from the peers in "social" legislation and in complete freedom in foreign affairs, a freedom, by the way, which the new doctrine of continuity greatly qualifies. We think that if Mr. Churchill had thought out the meaning of Liberalism, he would not have used this line of defence. We understand the idea of a democratic State, and we understand the notion of steady, non-revolutionary advances towards the enriched conception of such a State with which the thought and the social investigations of the last thirty years have furnished us. But we do not understand the notion that such a State can be fitted into a body politic of which the House of Lords is the governing organ. And we believe still less that a party which accepts and acts on such an absurdity, and whose instinctive spirit does not revolt against it, can retain its hold on the imagination of the people. What precisely are the measures which Mr. Churchill has in contemplation? A simple piece of social machinery like labor exchanges can, of course, be elaborated without difficulty. But when we come to the allied problems of the Poor Law and workmen's insurance, we approach a subject on which fierce opposition will be aroused, and as to which a great deal of careful explanatory work must be set up. By all means let the Government begin this work, and, indeed, they are committed to an amendment of the Unemployed Act this Session. But if Mr. Churchill imagines that when the really controversial points of such a scheme of social change are reached, they will escape the natural and inveterate prejudice of a band of Tory landlords, he has much to learn in practical politics. Such a programme has not been thought out, if the Birmingham speech is a guide, and the notion behind it involves a miscalculation of political values. Mr. Churchill seems conscious of this, for he makes the important suggestion—the one satisfactory point of his speech—that in future no Liberal Government can take office without receiving from the King guarantees that the will of the House of Lords will be overborne.

Now these are not academic points. The question of the House of Lords is an immediate practical issue. What are the Government going to do? If they are going to fight, with a view, let us say, to a Dissolution in January, 1910, there is no time to be lost. Within the next few days the programme must be arranged for a fight, or for a surrender, or for a postponement which is, in effect, a surrender. We shall not, we hope, be told that a Welsh Disestablishment Bill can be regarded as a weapon of attack. We agree with the Welshman who says that he is for a fight with the Lords, but that if his Bill is postponed all competing National Bills ought to share its fate. It must either be concentration on the Lords, or a dangerous competition between the various sections to run mere demonstration Bills against each other. In such a policy an Irish Land Bill would be just as useless an item as Welsh Disestablishment. This is rational ground; but to debate a great issue in religion and politics for week after week, month after month, and then to offer it for slaughter at Lord Lansdowne's sacrificial altar in Berkeley Square is a mockery of Parliament. It is to such futilities, more or less disguised, or to a deliberate selection of semi-colorless measures, that Mr. Churchill's unfortunate proposal must tend. The issue is changed. It is no longer a question of attacking the Lords; it is a question of the Government's sticking to office, and defiantly inviting the Lords to turn them out if they dare. We content ourselves with saying that on this question we stand by the Prime Minister's declaration at the National Liberal Club, and that, in common, we believe, with the mass of the Liberal Party, we do not accept or understand Mr. Churchill's attenuation of it. The trouble with the House of Lords is due to no fault of the Government. It is on the whole a very good Government, abler, more conscientious, more active and more useful, better led and better officered, than its predecessor, and it has done well for South Africa, for the British workman, and for the Irish Catholic student. But the House of Lords is "straddled" across its path, as was Apollyon before Christian's, and, like him, it must either fight for its right of way or yield it.

THE TWO EUROPEAN CAMPS.

The settlement in outline of the dispute between Turkey and Austria-Hungary gives to Turkish Liberalism the assurance of an uninterrupted development, lessens the risk of war in the Balkans, and goes far to restore to Europe that sense of security which for nearly four months has been lacking. The solution is in the end honorable and advantageous to both parties. To Austria it means the removal of the ambiguity of title which rendered her rule in Bosnia needlessly difficult for her officials and harsh to her subjects. The surrender of her military rights in Novi-Bazar and her protectorate over the Catholic Albanians is really as great a gain to her as it is to Turkey. So long as her Empire overflowed through these illegitimate channels into Turkish territory, she was constantly tempted to squander her strength, and to make enemies while she acquired clients. The only mystery, indeed, is that Baron von Aerenthal should so long have hesitated to adopt so obvious a solution. If instead of snatching Bosnia without a "by your leave," he had approached Turkey in a friendly spirit, it is probable that he might have obtained her assent to the annexation on these or even easier terms. He would have paid the same price, but he would not have incurred the enmity of Turkey, the suspicions of Europe, the losses of the boycott, and the waste and disturbance of military preparations. In the end Turkey emerges with enhanced prestige, with valuable concessions, and a substantial contribution towards the readjustment of her finances. The crisis, so far from having damaged the new régime, should consolidate it, for it will be generally realised in Constantinople that, under the old order of things so relatively favorable a settlement would have been quite impossible. A year ago an Austrian squadron might have closured discussion by sailing for Mersina or Smyrna, a proceeding which the rest of Europe would have watched without a sign of indignation. Kiamil Pasha, when at last he had before him terms which might be accepted without loss of dignity, showed promptitude, good sense, and moderation. His experience is emphatically necessary to the new school, which includes among its chiefs attractive leaders, enlightened thinkers, and efficient conspirators, but no statesman who has had an adequate training in affairs. The enthusiastic reception of his statement in the Chamber this week goes to show that the risk of his supersession has passed. The crisis is not yet over, and now more than ever Turkey requires a diplomatist. The dispute with Bulgaria has yet to be settled. Fortunately, the Bulgarians accept the principle of a money indemnity which Austria began by rejecting, but if the Young Turks were tempted to put their claims too high, in the hope of crippling Bulgaria and rendering her harmless for the future, they might find that they had only succeeded in driving her into an attitude of definite and adventurous hostility. There remains the possibility of a Bosnian rising and a Servian war. But, alike on the Austro-Servian and the Turco-Bulgarian disputes, the settlement of the tension between Austria and Turkey must exert a favorable influence. Servia ranged more or less in line with Turkey by common grievances, and Bulgaria linked more or less with Austria in a common adventure, were both waiting for the result of the negotiations between the two principals to the main quarrel. Both would have joined in a war had war become inevitable, and both are now virtually compelled to arrange a peace.

The delays and dangers of this crisis are to be traced not so much to local causes as to the fact that no effective Concert, no real Europe, exists or has for some years existed. Each party to the quarrel had its "brilliant seconds" (to use the Kaiser's duelling phrase), but there was no available jury of honor. This was no new situation. It became, in fact, acute some months before the Turkish revolution, when Austria virtually withdrew from the Eastern Concert, in order to push her railway project, while England and Russia demonstrated their new intimacy at Reval. Every difficulty which can now arise within Europe or its dependencies is governed and aggravated by the sense of tension between the two groups of Powers. No question, in consequence, can be solved on its merits. Morocco becomes a pawn in the game between Germany and France; the Balkans are supposed to be a chessboard on which Germany and England are moving the pieces. One can hardly doubt that Baron von Aerenthal's inexpedient obstinacy was due not so much to any ill-will towards the Turks, as to his resentment of the imaginary intrigues which some responsible persons in Vienna and Budapest were pleased to ascribe to England. In the course of two successive months the notion seriously entertained in Paris that Germany was officially organising desertions from the French forces in Morocco, and the notion seriously entertained in Vienna that the Balkan Committee had subsidised the Turkish boycott, very nearly ended in precipitating two wars.

Behind these grotesque manifestations of mutual suspicion lie the two larger alarms that Germany aims at hegemony in Europe, and that England manœuvres to isolate her. The "Times" had the disastrous inspiration last week of preparing a cool reception for King Edward in Berlin, by accusing Germany of aiming at predominance in Europe. A few weeks before any meeting which might conceivably bring the two Governments together, the "Times" punctually delivers its apple of discord for the feast. It announced before the Kaiser's visit to London that Prince Bülow would not be welcomed, and it has now capped that performance by an article in which Lord Northcliffe's leader-writer attempts to mar the coming ceremonies in Berlin by justifying the whole policy of "penning in." The two suspicions are mutually complementary. England declares that Germany is aiming at hegemony; the answer is the tightening of a ring around her. Germany perceives that the ring is closing round her, and she attempts by more than one violent movement, partly in anger, but more in fear, to break through it. The more she struggles to free herself from the circle, the more do our own Jingoes interpret her movements as a restless effort to bully Europe and disturb its peace. Each side is afraid; each resorts to a sort of offensive-defensive strategy; each finds its suspicions confirmed by the efforts of the other to insure safety and peace. It is a common fallacy in politics that the Jingo and the Imperialist is a person of excessive courage, abounding spirit, and a passion for adventure. That type exists, but very rarely attains in any old and settled country to influence and power. The Jingo and Imperialist is more often a person of large possessions and great commitments, personal or vicarious, abnormally sensitive to every risk which seems to threaten them, and when he stumbles into war, it is usually from an excessive fear of it. It is this tendency which in both countries keeps England and Germany estranged, and digs the rift which has divided Europe. Of a genuinely aggressive temper on either side, we discern few signs. No one, on the other hand, with any sense for psychology, can read such typical utterances as this "Times" leader, or General Schlieffen's too famous article in the "Deutsche Revue," or the Kaiser's little speech about "grave times" to one of the guard regiments, without detecting in them the shrill voice of conscious fear.

A candid student of this situation will not attempt, if he is wise, to deny that each side can produce a certain justification for its fears. The hard materialism of Prussia, and the calculated instability which is the essence of the Bismarckian tradition, are disturbing factors in Europe, and as much may be said against the vast counter-schemes of which M. Delcassé was the original architect. It is more useful, however, to point out that the defensive strategy which both sides are adopting has in the past, and will in the future, perpetuate the dangers which they seek to conjure. The "league of peace" which links England, France, and Russia, with Italy, Turkey, and Spain within its influence, has in fact coincided with a period of alarms to which we can recall no parallel in Europe since the Treaty of Berlin. War has seemed imminent thrice at least since the winter of 1905. The impossibility of summoning a Conference to deal with the Balkans is another evidence. The essence of the theory is that in rehabilitating the position of Russia in Europe, we have restored the balance and made peace more durable. Yet it is indisputable that ever since the Reval meeting, the knowledge that Russia was supported, has conduced to disturbance in the East, and the manifest disappointment of some Russian newspapers at the settlement of the Austro-Turkish dispute ought in itself to warn us of the dangers of our policy. We have become in effect a Continental Power, and it is this new factor which is chiefly responsible for the disturbance of the balance. Our entry into a Continental combination has been marked chiefly by a recrudescence of Imperialist adventure. It is not Germany which is looking about her for "places in the sun." It is France which is quietly attempting to absorb Morocco, and Russia which is intriguing for a mandate to "control" Persia. It is easy to talk of the danger of German "hegemony" in Europe. The expansive ambitions of other Powers are certainly more in evidence at this moment. These ambitions we are perforce covering and assisting. In the process we serve no Liberal purpose, and bring no nearer the permanent Liberal aims of disarmament and peace.

THE ROOSEVELT MANNER.

Mr. Roosevelt seems destined to end his Presidency in a characteristic whirl of invective. He is embroiled with the House of Representatives; he is embroiled with the Senate; and he has on hand at least half-a-dozen personal and political feuds with individual members in both Chambers. Of these the one with Senator Tillman has engaged the most attention, and been prosecuted apparently with the greatest relish. The two men are old antagonists. They could hardly be otherwise. Tillman came into politics simply as a social protest. Before he rose to power, South Carolina was ruled by an oligarchy such as existed nowhere else in the United States. It was an oligarchy of cultivated, easy-living, aristocratic Southerners of the old régime. They had everything that social prestige and graces could give them. But they neglected the interests of the masses. Compared with the rulers of neighboring States, they seemed a survival of the Middle Ages. Under their polished but stagnant domination, South Carolina made neither intellectual nor material progress. Even Charleston itself, the capital of the State, and the citadel of the oligarchy, began to decay. Its wharves rotted. Its schools and universities languished. Self-satisfied, remote, and somewhat arrogant Toryism was producing its inevitable results. Then came a revolt, headed by Tillman. It was not a party movement, for the antagonists on both sides were Democrats. It was a movement of social and popular discontent. It triumphed after a ferocious conflict, and brought with it some benefits of a lasting kind. It shook a sleeping Commonwealth awake, and made possible the rise of a people. But the misfortune of the movement was that it had a bully for a leader. Tillman is coarse, fanatical, brusque and even brutal in speech and method, scorning refinement and dignity, trampling with passionate joy on all that made the charm and gentleness of old Southern life. He has done many things that needed doing, but he has done them all in the wrong way, and his speeches and actions in the Senate as often as not are an affront to civilisation itself. Between him and the President, a man of equally impulsive and masterful temperament, a clash was inevitable. It came several years ago, and one episode after another has served to embitter it. It is doubtful, indeed, whether even the President's direct charge of dishonourable conduct and the Senator's fiery defence have added much to an animosity that for years has glowed at white heat.

Whether Mr. Tillman is innocent or guilty we do not know. But we shall be surprised if any wrong-doing is proved against him one-half so prejudicial to the decencies of public life as President Roosevelt's manner of handling this whole controversy. One of the many legends about the Standard Oil Company that used to obtain throughout America was that it possessed a dossier of every prominent politician in the country, and could ascertain by a glance through its files what were his weak or vulnerable points. What was untrue of the Standard Oil Company seems to be true of Mr. Roosevelt, and we can conceive nothing more objectionable than that the President should be in the habit of collecting and storing evidence against Senators and Congressmen, not for the legitimate purposes of a public prosecution, but to score a personal point in a private or semi-private quarrel. If Mr. Roosevelt believes the charges he has made against Senator Tillman to be well-founded, he should have set the law in motion. The one thing he was clearly debarred from doing was to frame an ex parte indictment against Mr. Tillman, to use his position as a means of securing it the fullest publicity, to distribute among such newspapers as cared to print them photographs of the "evidence" he had accumulated, and under cover of a violent personal attack upon one of its members to escape from justifying the charges he had brought against a whole Assembly. But if the President's treatment of Senator Tillman seems to us both unfair and undignified, his treatment of Congress deserves far stronger language. Even in the highly contentious atmosphere of American politics, where peace rarely reigns between the two ends of Pennsylvania Avenue, nothing like it has occurred before. The facts of the case are few and simple. There has existed for many years, under the control of the Treasury, a corps of detectives known as the Secret Service. Their functions were originally limited by law to the suppression of counterfeiting, but since the murder of Mr. McKinley they have also been detailed to form a Presidential bodyguard. It seems, however, that the custom has sprung up of lending the Secret Service agents to any Department that required detective work to be undertaken. Such a custom, besides being illegal, lends itself to easy abuse, and Congress was fully within its rights in inserting in the Appropriation Act an amendment prohibiting the employment of Secret Service men by any other Department. It was this amendment that President Roosevelt attacked in his Annual Message of a few weeks ago, asserting that it was of benefit only to the "criminal classes," alleging that it was adopted to save members of Congress from being themselves investigated, and ironically inviting the Legislature to pass a special law specifically exempting its members from the scope of the Secret Service.

No Assembly in the world could have stood such a taunt and such an imputation, and both the Senate and the House of Representatives have effectively marked their sense of indignation. It is doubtful, indeed, whether even Cleveland or Johnson so thoroughly exasperated Congress as Mr. Roosevelt has done. Congress, however, is not a body that stands particularly high in American esteem, and the resentment of its members finds anything but a unanimous echo in the country. The bulk of American opinion, while admitting the impropriety of the President's language, probably regards him as fundamentally in the right on the main question, and is more than reconciled to the idea of empowering the Secret Service to devote whatever attention is necessary to the doings of Congressmen and Senators. With the people the incident will do Mr. Roosevelt no particular harm, though it finally disposes of any hope he may have cherished of writing another measure on the Statute Book. Therein, indeed, lies its main significance. It exemplifies very strikingly a defect that has marred Mr. Roosevelt's whole Presidency, and it helps to explain why, with all his force and popularity, his legislative record is so singularly meagre. Lord Rosebery once declared that you cannot legislate by hurricane. But Mr. Roosevelt has no other conception of legislation save by hurricane. Goodwill between the Executive and the Legislature is a condition that may almost be said to be prescribed by the American Constitution. Mr. Roosevelt has never sought it. The least conciliatory of men, he has always preferred to carry his point by coercion, hectoring, and browbeating. The factor of his personality has at no time worked out to an easy equation, and it is extremely doubtful whether with all his fuss and tumult he has accomplished one-half as much as a President of Mr. McKinley's persuasive temperament and accordant manner would have achieved with no noise at all. The greatest obstacle to the adoption of the Roosevelt policies has been Mr. Roosevelt himself.

PUBLIC OPINION AND THE DEATH PENALTY.

THERE must be very few occasions in the history of modern States when the public executioner becomes a popular personage. Society in most countries looks upon him as an indispensable instrument of the criminal law, but personally he is shunned and even hated. We are told that even those whose official duties force them to come into contact with the hangman, and who are more or less familiar with his presence, cannot rid themselves of the feeling of aversion and of "uncanniness" which such a personage inspires. Popular sentiment in this respect is peculiar. It attaches no social stigma to the police officer who arrests the future victim of the scaffold; it even applauds the witnesses who come forward to give evidence against him—though a recent notorious murder trial offered an exception to this rule; it is full of respect for the judge who pronounces the sentence of death; even the prison officials who detain the doomed man are respected members of the community. But the executioner, who merely finishes the work which the police and the witnesses and the judges and the jailers have been elaborating, is placed in an altogether different category. In so far as regards the arrest, the trial, the conviction, and the detention of the man who has committed a capital crime, the public conscience has no qualms whatever. It contemplates all these proceedings and the officials who are concerned in carrying them into effect with approval and equanimity. But when the final stage in the dealings of law with the murderer is reached, when their victim is actually handed over to the executioner, a revulsion of feeling suddenly takes place, and the man whose duty it is to carry them out is almost barred out from the amenities of life. A sentiment such as this is one of the strongest proofs that the revulsion against the death penalty, which has now been in operation for more than a century, will ultimately lead to the abolition of capital punishment.

But the executions which have just taken place in France after a lapse of some years are sufficient to show that the public mind is not yet prepared to get rid of the punishment of death. As far as we can gather from the French newspapers, the executioner, Anatole Deibler, has, for the moment, become a sort of national hero. The odium which habitually attaches to a man of his profession has vanished. He now excites enormous interest wherever he goes. In ordinary circumstances he would creep into the prison unobserved, and disappear as mysteriously after his grim task was over. But at present he is greeted in the streets with the cry of "Vive Deibler." Picture postcards bearing his portrait as he stands beside the guillotine are selling like wildfire in the streets of Paris; the Parisian population turn out in multitudes to cheer him; innkeepers and even private residents at Bethune were eager to have him as their guest, and the man is surprised and embarrassed at his unexpected popularity. All these manifestations make it clear that the executioner is only an unpopular personage when the public mind is unconsciously averse from the punishment of death. This unpopularity, as we see in the case of the malefactors who were executed at Bethune, immediately disappears when the crime they perpetrate is of a peculiarly atrocious character. For crimes of this description the average citizen still insists on retaining the penalty of death. He insists upon it not because he believes that its retention is an additional guarantee for the security of human life. He is indifferent as to whether it has that effect or not. His determination to retain the death penalty for atrocious cases of homicide is a survival of the old primitive instinct of vengeance. As long as this instinct exists in its present intensity it is, perhaps, safer to satisfy it through the medium of the law than to allow it to burst its legal bounds and break loose in the still more barbarous form of lynching, as we see it in the United States. In a matter of this kind it is useless for abolitionists, however deeply we may sympathise with them, to press for reforms for which public opinion is imperfectly prepared. A wave of reaction, such as is now taking place in France, would suddenly arise and sweep away the laborious efforts of years, and the cause they have at heart would be in a worse position than before.

In the midst of the reaction against the abolition of capital punishment in France, it is satisfactory to see that the most convinced believers in the guillotine are opposed to the French practice of public executions. An execution, whether public or conducted privately within the precincts of a prison, is one of the most degrading spectacles it is possible to conceive. It is certain that the work of the guillotine in France within the last few days has done more to demoralise the population of the Republic than all the imagined good that can possibly arise from the terrors of such a spectacle. In England, the proportion of murder cases to the population has enormously diminished since the abolition of public executions; and although it is not suggested that the abandonment of the practice is the only cause of the decrease, it is almost certain that it has had something to do with it. Some advocates of the abolition of the death penalty are of opinion that public executions should be retained so as to disgust the public mind with capital punishment. So far from this being the result, the practice of public executions has the immediate effect of debasing the public conscience, and of intensifying that very atmosphere of callousness of which it is the aim of the abolitionists to get rid.

The immediate practical aim of penal law reformers is not to ask for the abolition of capital punishment, but to press for the classification of homicide. Murders vary immensely in gravity, but at the present time a person who is tried for murder in this country and is convicted, must be sentenced to death no matter how important the extenuating circumstances may be. According to the criminal statistics for 1906—that is to say, the latest returns—there were no fewer than eighteen cases in which sentences of death for murder were commuted by the Home Secretary to sentences of penal servitude. If our laws relating to the crime of murder were on a proper basis, in none of these cases would the sentence of death have been pronounced at all. A condition of things such as exists at present means that in a great many instances the offence has practically to be tried over again by the officials at the Home Office. It is true that at these secret re-trials the executive authorities rely to a large extent upon the opinion of the judge who presided over the case. But work of this kind is not the proper business of the executive. It is essentially a judicial function, and the law of murder should be so amended that these cases can be openly dealt with before a properly constituted judicial tribunal.

Life and Letters.

EDGAR ALLAN POE.*

THERE was a time when America, the Land of the Free, and the birthplace of Washington, seemed a natural fatherland for Edgar Allan Poe. Nowadays the thing has become inconceivable: no young man can read Poe's works without asking incredulously what the devil he is doing in that galley. America has been found out; and Poe has not: that is the situation. How did he live there, this finest of fine artists, this born aristocrat of letters? Alas! he did not live there: he died there, and was duly explained away as a drunkard and a failure, though it remains an open question whether he really drank as much in his whole lifetime as a modern successful American drinks, without comment, in six months.

If the Judgment Day were fixed for the centenary of Poe's birth, there are among the dead only two men born since the Declaration of Independence whose plea for mercy could avert a prompt sentence of damnation on the entire nation; and it is extremely doubtful whether those two could be persuaded to pervert eternal justice by uttering it. The two are, of course, Poe and Whitman; and there is between them the remarkable difference that Whitman is still credibly an American, whereas even the Americans themselves, though rather short of men of genius, omit Poe's name from their Pantheon, either from a sense that it is hopeless for them to claim so foreign a figure, or from simple Monroeism. One asks, has the America of Poe's day passed away, or did it ever exist?

Probably it never existed. It was an illusion, like the respectable Whig Victorian England of Macaulay. Karl Marx stripped the whitewash from that sepulchre; and we have ever since been struggling with a conviction of social sin which makes every country in which industrial capitalism is rampant a hell to us. For let no American fear that America, on that hypothetic Judgment Day, would perish alone. America would be damned in very good European company, and would feel proud and happy, and contemptuous of the saved. She would not even plead the influence of the mother from whom she has inherited all her worst vices. If the American stands to-day in scandalous pre-eminence as an anarchist and a ruffian, a liar and a braggart, an idolator and a sensualist, that is only because he has thrown off the disguises of Catholicism and feudalism which still give Europe an air of decency, and sins openly, impudently, and consciously, instead of furtively, hypocritically, and muddle-headedly, as we do. Not until he acquires European manners does the American anarchist become the gentleman who assures you that people cannot be made moral by Act of Parliament (the truth being that it is only by Acts of Parliament that men in large communities can be made moral, even when they want to); or the American ruffian hand over his revolver and bowie knife to be used for him by a policeman or soldier; or the American liar and braggart adopt the tone of the newspaper, the pulpit, and the platform; or the American idolator write authorized biographies of millionaires; or the American sensualist secure the patronage of all the Muses for his pornography.

Howbeit, Poe remains homeless. There is nothing at all like him in America: nothing, at all events, visible across the Atlantic. At that distance we can see Whistler plainly enough, and Mark Twain. But Whistler was very American in some ways: so American that nobody but another American could possibly have written his adventures and gloried in them without reserve. Mark Twain, resembling Dickens in his combination of public spirit and irresistible literary power with a congenital incapacity for lying and bragging, and a congenital hatred of waste and cruelty, remains American by the local color of his stories. There is a further difference. Both Mark Twain and Whistler are as Philistine as Dickens and Thackeray. The appalling thing about Dickens, the greatest of the Victorians, is that in his novels there is nothing personal to live for except eating, drinking, and pretending to be happily married. For him the great synthetic ideals do not exist, any more than the great preludes and toccatas of Bach, the symphonies of Beethoven, the paintings of Giotto and Mantegna, Velasquez and Rembrandt. Instead of being heir to all the ages, he came into a comparatively small and smutty literary property bequeathed by Smollett and Fielding. His criticism of Fechter's Hamlet, and his use of a speech of Macbeth's to illustrate the character of Mrs. Macstinger, shew how little Shakespeare meant to him. Thackeray is even worse: the notions of painting he picked up at Heatherley's school were further from the mark than Dickens's ignorance; he is equally in the dark as to music; and though he did not, when he wished to be enormously pleasant and jolly, begin, like Dickens, to describe the gorgings and guzzlings which make Christmas our annual national disgrace, that is rather because he never does want to be enormously pleasant and jolly than because he has any higher notions of personal enjoyment. The truth is that neither Dickens nor Thackeray would be tolerable were it not that life is an end in itself and a means to nothing but its own perfection; consequently any man who describes life vividly will entertain us, however uncultivated the life he describes may be. Mark Twain has lived long enough to become a much better philosopher than either Dickens or Thackeray: for instance, when he immortalized General Funston by scalping him, he did it scientifically, knowing exactly what he meant right down to the foundation in the natural history of human character. Also, he got from the Mississippi something that Dickens could not get from Chatham and Pentonville. But he wrote A Yankee at the Court of King Arthur just as Dickens wrote A Child's History of England. For the ideal of Catholic chivalry he had nothing but derision; and he exhibited it, not in conflict with reality, as Cervantes did, but in conflict with the prejudices of a Philistine compared to whom Sancho Panza is an Admirable Crichton, an Abelard, even a Plato. Also, he described Lohengrin as "a shivaree," though he liked the wedding chorus; and this shews that Mark, like Dickens, was not properly educated; for Wagner would have been just the man for him if he had been trained to understand and use music as Mr. Rockefeller was trained to understand and use money. America did not teach him the language of the great ideals, just as England did not teach it to Dickens and Thackeray. Consequently, though nobody can suspect Dickens or Mark Twain of lacking the qualities and impulses that are the soul of such grotesque makeshift bodies as Church and State, Chivalry, Classicism, Art, Gentility, and the Holy Roman Empire; and nobody blames them for seeing that these bodies were mostly so decomposed as to have become intolerable nuisances, you have only to compare them with Carlyle and Ruskin, or with Euripides and Aristophanes, to see how, for want of a language of art and a body of philosophy, they were so much more interested in the fun and pathos of personal adventure than in the comedy and tragedy of human destiny.

Whistler was a Philistine, too. Outside the corner of art in which he was a virtuoso and a propagandist, he was a Man of Derision. Important as his propaganda was, and admired as his work was, no society could assimilate him. He could not even induce a British jury to award him substantial damages against a rich critic who had "done him out of his job"; and this is certainly the climax of social failure in England.

Edgar Allan Poe was not in the least a Philistine. He wrote always as if his native Boston was Athens, his Charlottesville University Plato's Academy, and his cottage the crown of the heights of Fiesole. He was the greatest journalist critic of his time, placing good European work at sight when the European critics were waiting for somebody to tell them what to say. His poetry is so exquisitely refined that posterity will refuse to believe that it belongs to the same civilization as the glory of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe's lilies or the honest doggerel of Whittier. Tennyson, who was nothing if not a virtuoso, never produced a success that will bear reading after Poe's failures. Poe constantly and inevitably produced magic where his greatest contemporaries produced only beauty. Tennyson's popular pieces, The May Queen and The Charge of the Six Hundred, cannot stand hackneying: they become positively nauseous after a time. The Raven, The Bells, and Annabel Lee are as fascinating at the thousandth repetition as at the first.

Poe's supremacy in this respect has cost him his reputation. This is a phenomenon which occurs when an artist achieves such perfection as to place himself hors concours. The greatest painter England ever produced is Hogarth, a miraculous draughtsman and an exquisite and poetic colorist. But he is never mentioned by critics. They talk copiously about Romney, the Gibson of his day; freely about Reynolds; nervously about the great Gainsborough; and not at all about Rowlandson and Hogarth, missing the inextinguishable grace of Rowlandson because they assume that all caricatures of his period are ugly, and avoiding Hogarth instinctively as critically unmanageable. In the same way, we have given up mentioning Poe: that is why the Americans forgot him when they posted up the names of their great in their Pantheon. Yet his is the first —almost the only name that the real connoisseur looks for.

But Poe, for all his virtuosity, is always a poet and never a mere virtuoso. Poe put forward his Eureka, the formulation of his philosophy, as the most important thing he had done. His poems always have the universe as their background. So have the figures in his stories. Even in his tales of humor, which we shake our heads at as mistakes, they have this elemental quality. Toby Dammit himself, though his very name turns up the nose of the cultured critic, is more impressive, and his end more tragic than the serious inventions of most story-tellers. The shortsighted gentleman who married his grandmother is no common butt of a common purveyor of the facetious: the grandmother has the elegance and free mind of Ninon de l'Enclos, the grandson the tenue of a marquis. This story was sent by Poe to Horne, whose Orion he had reviewed as poetry ought to be reviewed, with a request that it might be sold to an English magazine. The English magazine regretted that the deplorable immorality of the story made it for ever impossible in England!

In his stories of mystery and imagination Poe created a world-record for the English language: perhaps for all the languages. The story of the Lady Ligeia is not merely one of the wonders of literature: it is unparalleled and unapproached. There is really nothing to be said about it: we others simply take off our hats and let Mr. Poe go first. It is interesting to compare Poe's stories with William Morris's. Both are not merely stories: they are complete works of art, like prayer carpets; and they are, in Poe's phrase, stories of imagination. They are masterpieces of style: what people call Macaulay's style is by comparison a mere method. But they are more different than it seems possible for two art works in the same kind to be. Morris will have nothing to do with mystery. "Ghost stories," he used to say, "have all the same explanation: the people are telling lies." His Sigurd has the beauty of mystery as it has every other sort of beauty, being, as it is, incomparably the greatest English epic; but his stories are in the open from end to end, whilst in Poe's stories the sun never shines.

Poe's limitation was his aloofness from the common people. Grotesques, negroes, madmen with delirium tremens, even gorillas, take the place of ordinary peasants and courtiers, citizens and soldiers, in his theatre. His houses are haunted houses, his woods enchanted woods; and he makes them so real that reality itself cannot sustain the comparison. His kingdom is not of this world.

Above all, Poe is great because he is independent of cheap attractions, independent of sex, of patriotism, of fighting, of sentimentality, snobbery, gluttony, and all the rest of the vulgar stock-in-trade of his profession. This is what gives him his superb distinction. One vulgarized thing, the pathos of dying children, he touched in Annabel Lee, and devulgarized it at once. He could not even amuse himself with detective stories without purifying the atmosphere of them until they became more edifying than most of Hymns, Ancient and Modern. His verse sometimes alarms and puzzles the reader by fainting with its own beauty; but the beauty is never the beauty of the flesh. You never say to him as you have to say uneasily to so many modern artists: "Yes, my friend; but these are things that men and women should live and not write about. Literature is not a keyhole for people with starved affections to peep through at the banquets of the body." It never became one in Poe's hands. Life cannot give you what he gives you except through fine art; and it was his instinctive observance of this distinction, and the fact that it did not beggar him, as it would beggar most writers, that makes him the most legitimate, the most classical, of modern writers.

It also explains why America does not care much for him, and why he has hardly been mentioned in England these many years. America and England are wallowing in the sensuality which their immense increase of riches has placed within their reach. I do not blame them: sensuality is a very necessary and healthy and educative element in life. Unfortunately, it is ill distributed; and our reading masses are looking on at it and thinking about it and longing for it, and having precarious little holiday treats of it, instead of sharing it temperately and continuously, and ceasing to be preoccupied with it. When the distribution is better adjusted and the preoccupation ceases, there will be a noble reaction in favor of the great writers like Poe, who begin just where the world, the flesh, and the devil leave off.

G. B. S.

A WORD AND AN ACTION.

THE centenary celebrated to-day doubly displays the tricks of immortality. A few have lived by a word, a few by an action. But here we have two men whose fame is limited to one word, one action, and that fame is based upon the same event, and is inseparable. But for Sir John Moore's death at Corunna no one would ever have heard of the young poet who wrote thirty-two lines upon his burial. But for the young poet no one outside the narrow circles of soldiers and historians would ever have heard of Sir John Moore and Corunna.

Those thirty-two lines, with the magnificent suddenness of their opening—"Not a drum was heard"—move like a battalion marching with arms reversed. They are our poetry's Dead March in Saul. They have in them the sombre mourning of three volleys fired in the air. They are the noblest Last Post ever sounded over a soldier's grave. The three cold or old-fashioned words which they contain are merged and lost in the heartfelt splendor of the whole. Our people have rightly adopted them as the national dirge, and their very rhythm and phrasing have passed into the most intimate expressions of our language, winning alike the perpetual honor of parody and ironic use. Yet Charles Wolfe wrote nothing else that would be remembered if he had not written that—nothing else, indeed, that is remembered except by an occasional scholar. His dirge over a woman, certainly, contains two great lines:—

> "But I forgot, when by thy side,
> That thou couldst mortal be."

They have the touch of Wordsworth in the verses of perfect sorrow, beginning:—

> "A slumber did my spirit seal;
> I had no human fears;
> She seem'd a thing that could not feel
> The touch of earthly years."

But the rest of the poem is comparatively cold and common. To place beside the "Burial of Sir John Moore" there is nothing at all. That was the poet's unique achievement, and it is what we call immortal.

So in Sir John Moore's own case. At the time of his death he was forty-seven. He had seen service, both military and political. St. Lucia had known him, and Holland, and Cadiz, and Egypt, and Sicily, and Sweden, and even the House of Commons under Pitt. Irishmen might still give him a grateful thought for his comparative mercy to the unhappy patriots of 'Ninety-Eight and Vinegar Hill; also for his admiration of Wolfe Tone, and a summary of his speech at the court-martial. Soldiers might still remember him for his skilful landing at Alexandria under Abercromby. But his fame would not be general and maintained, except for his retreat to Corunna, and his death there. Imagination, aided by the poet, has fixed upon his death as the seal of his glory. And so in a sense it was, for if he had returned home safely with his troops from Corunna and become a country squire or a Bath invalid, no one but half-a-dozen officers would celebrate his life or death. Yet it was not his death on the battle-field, nor even the skill of his retreat, which gave him the true title to fame. It was his genius in devising the advance upon Napoleon's communications in Spain—a stroke of genius that altered the whole course of European history, and may be said to have started the train of events that led to Napoleon's downfall. It was this that General Maurice, in his excellent edition of Moore's Diary has gallantly called "the boldest, the most successful, the most brilliant stroke of war of all time." This was Moore's unique achievement, and it is what we call immortal.

The achievement is equally dramatic and easy to understand. In the summer of 1808, Napoleon stood at the very zenith of his power. Ulm, Austerlitz, and Jena had laid central Europe at his feet. The Peace of Tilsitt had secured him against Russia, and by its secret clauses had also insured, as he hoped, the ruin of England. He was in a position to give away the kingdoms of the world, and he gave them away. To his brother Joseph he gave the crown of Spain, and when within two months the Spaniards drove Joseph from Madrid, it seemed an easy thing to gather his grand army for another triumph, to sweep through the scattered insurrections of Spain, and to avenge the troublesome little victory of Wellesley at Vimiero, which had led to the withdrawal of the French troops from Portugal. Up to a point it was indeed easy. Mustering a vast army of nearly 400,000 men west of the Pyrenees, Napoleon reached Vittoria himself early in November, and in four weeks Madrid was again in his possession, while Soult, in full strength in the north-central provinces, kept open his communications with France. The whole south of Spain lay open before him. Only one small hostile force—some 25,000 English troops under an officer named Moore—remained as an organised body in the field, and he believed he could drive that force back upon Lisbon and capture them, together with the city, at his leisure.

Only two short months earlier—in October, 1808—Moore had been sent with what we should now call one small army corps to back up the popular insurrection in Spain. Trusting to reports of patriotic enthusiasm and vast levies inspired by the love of freedom, he had advanced to Salamanca, barely a hundred miles north-west of Madrid, in expectation of finding a powerful Spanish army in his front for him to support. His downright Scottish nature was beguiled by the southern temperament. Except to the eye of patriotic delegates, there was little enthusiasm, and there was no Spanish army. But stretching right across his bare front, from Madrid to the Pyrenees, lay the enormous armies of France, commanded by the greatest soldier the world has ever known. What, then, was to be done? There he stood in the centre of a foreign country which gave him no assistance, but only confused counsel by vain reports. He was involved in the fog of war, where lies loom up like truths only to disappear, and nothing seems substantial. It was the depth of winter. His supplies were bad. England, as usual, had forgotten to send him money. As usual, the contractor for the commissariat was a scoundrel, and filched his profits off the starvation of the troops. Even before Napoleon reached Madrid, Moore had written to Castlereagh:—

> "Spain is without armies, generals, or government. I see nothing that can give hope of her being able to resist the attack being made on her. I could not calculate the powers of a people enthusiastic and determined. But I see no symptoms of this, and yet I know nothing else that can save them."

Retirement was obviously inevitable, and nearly every general in history would have done what Napoleon expected Moore to do, and retired at once upon Lisbon. But to Moore, in the solitude of his responsibility, there came the splendid, and perhaps the sudden, thought of striking one adventurous blow for his country's cause and for Spain before he withdrew. Napoleon's vast armies depended for their very existence upon that long line of communications with France. How if one edged up a little north-east towards that sensitive line—the continuous channel that feeds the belly upon which all armies go? Would not that disconcert even Napoleon's plans? Would it not shake even the conqueror of the world? In the second week of December—just five weeks before his death—Moore broke up from Salamanca, and instead of retiring south-west to Lisbon, about 150 miles by safe and easy roads in his rear, he advanced into the full blaze of danger, about eighty miles north-east to Sahagun, confronting the little river Carrion, where Soult was rapidly gathering his force to cover Burgos, the upper valley of the Ebro, and the main roads by which supplies were passing continually down from Bayonne to Madrid.

Whether or not it was "the most brilliant stroke of war of all time," certainly it was a stroke that few would have conceived or dared. Stonewall Jackson might have done it; De Wet might have done it. On a smaller scale they displayed similar genius, similar hardihood. But without saying anything invidious, we may admit that they were not acting, as Moore was, against the greatest soldier in history. It was a decision of almost overwhelming importance—a moment in which the full weight of a general's solitary responsibility is felt, and the steel of his genius tested. Sir William Napier has well described what the decision meant for Moore:—

> "He felt that in so doing he compromised the safety of his own army, that he must glide along the edge of a precipice, that he must cross a gulf on a rotten plank. But he had confidence in his own genius, and the occasion being worthy of a great deed, he dared essay it even against Napoleon."

The effect was instantaneous. The gods are known to each other, and in a flash Napoleon perceived that he was now dealing with a genius worthy of his own. In the history of all his lightning marches, there is none more amazing than his transfer of 50,000 men from Madrid to Astorga—two hundred miles in ten days, through rough and mountainous country, in mid-winter. He had summoned Soult to co-operate with him at Astorga, hoping to encircle the English, or grip them like a nut in the crackers. And on January 1st the armies converged there as by appointment—70,000 infantry, with 10,000 horse, and 200 guns, ready to crush Moore's little force, that by that time numbered only about 19,000, for he had already sent his light brigades by another route to Vigo the day before, so as to relieve his supplies. "Ask me for anything but time," was one of Napoleon's maxims, but for once even Napoleon was too late. Moore had slipt through, and the retreat to Corunna was well on its way. That very day Napoleon started for France, and left Spain for ever. It has been disputed whether he was really recalled by disturbing news from Austria, as he gave out, or whether he recognised that Moore had given what he called the lock-jaw to his plans in Spain, and so left the matter to his inferiors. But with some justice Moore's biographer has fixed upon that day as the crisis of Napoleon's career and the turning-point towards decline.

Many know the story of the terrible days during which our army struggled through the winter mountains to Corunna, harassed continually by Soult and Ney hanging on their rear. And many know the story of Moore's death in the moment of a victory that would have been complete had he not fallen. Sir Charles Napier, who was present, has left us such an account of Moore upon that battlefield as has been given of few generals in action. For his burial and his fame we have the eight stanzas known to all our race. But on this centenary we have preferred to dwell upon the supreme deed of arms which preceded those familiar events, and was the cause of the glory with which his army left him in the grave alone. For it illustrates as succinctly as any event in our annals the splendor of courageous initiative, and the all-powerful leadership of true personality when the intuition of genius is supported by that simple and fearless character which all men trust.

THE HOME LIFE OF JESUS.

A CENTURY or two after the appearance of the Christian Gospels, which we still read, it was the fancy of men of letters to supplement them. The canonical books, it was felt, had left gaps in the Story of our Lord, and these were filled, though not with any great literary skill. The new Gospels, set alongside of the old, illustrate the saying of Jesus as to patched garments—"the new agreeth not with the old." The "Gospel of the Infancy" tells us, for example, of a teacher whose hand was miraculously paralysed when he was on the point of striking Jesus, and of a boy who, coming heedlessly round a corner, ran into Jesus, and was struck dead with a word. The "Gospel of Thomas" has a tale of a couch, which Joseph the carpenter made too narrow, and which he and his son miraculously pulled out to the prescribed dimensions. There is one story of some charm in both these "Gospels," which tells of clay sparrows made by Jesus (on the Sabbath, too), which flew away when he clapped his hands. Such books sufficiently explain the connotation of the word "apocryphal."

Now, quite apart from the human interest which always clings about the childhood of a significant man, the early years of Jesus have a special value for us, for it is to them that he always returned when he wished to speak his deepest thought upon the relations of God and man. The life and love of the home was for Jesus the truest picture of the divine life. We shall better understand his thought here if we realise the experience from which he spoke. Is it at all possible to reconstruct this? The Gospels tell us little directly; but, after all, they preserve for us, in some abundance, what is more valuable than any ordered narrative—Jesus' own reminiscences. The scenes and settings of the parables fit easily and pleasantly into the framework of the historical and geographical facts of Jesus' life in Nazareth. They are pictures of real life—there is no doubt about that—and every recorded detail of the home at Nazareth is in harmony with them. They are very often his memories of home and childhood.

The early disappearance of the elder Joseph from the story of his house has been explained by his death, and with this much else agrees. The widow was left with five sons and at least three daughters. The eldest son, according to the story, was more than twelve years old, and on him, in all likelihood, fell a large share of the household burden. The days were over when he played with other children in the market-place, and, while he never forgot the games, he had now to widen his experience and learn what it was to be weary and heavy-laden.

His parables hint at this home life. There is one that tells of a little house, where the master in bed can carry on an argument with an importunate friend in the street, who wants to borrow three loaves—a tale and scene of very humble surroundings (Luke xi. 5). In a group of stories, which we may call "the parables of the mother," we are shown the woman, sweeping the house and seeking carefully till she finds a lost drachma, and counting its recovery joyful enough to call on her friends to rejoice with her (Luke xv. 8). Money meant something to a widow, especially if she had an "adversary" (Luke xviii. 3). It was Mary, no doubt, who "hid the leaven in three measures of meal till the whole was leavened," while Jesus sat by the fire and watched it work. He never forgot the sight—the basin, the heaving mass in it, the bubbles struggling out, swelling and breaking, and the rising and falling of the level—and all this commotion, the bursting of every bubble, was the proof of something alive and at work within. We can imagine his mother telling him, as she must often have had to tell him, that a younger brother's clothes would mend no more, and that new ones were needed. The careful elder brother would ask the reason why they would not mend, and the explanation stuck in his mind, and later on became the parable of the patches.

In any case, the Gospel of John definitely indicates a close and tender relation between mother and son. According to this evangelist, his mother's future was one of his cares upon the cross (xix. 26). In the earlier scene, at the wedding of Cana, Mary is represented as falling back instinctively upon her long experience of her eldest son's helpfulness, when their host seems likely to be in difficulties. Whatever the historical value of the Fourth Gospel as a whole, in such details it does not take us beyond what we could have recreated for ourselves from the synoptic picture of Jesus.

Throughout life the speech of Jesus recalled this little home and its interests. His metaphors of salt and candle and bread, his parables, all point to this quiet life, and it is significant. It means that the home was a happy one, that parents and brothers and sisters, on the whole, agreed well with one another. If conjecture is right, Jesus had himself to be father to his younger brothers and sisters—for years, in all probability. It may be that one reason why his public teaching did not begin till he was thirty years of age was the necessity for looking after the brothers and sisters.

One thing is certain—that he always had a peculiar tenderness for children. "Suffer little children to come unto Me." The old version of this saying stays in all our minds from childhood, associated with a group of memories of which we do not often speak. If we were to go behind it and look at the Greek, we might lay more emphasis on the infinitive, for a Greek would hardly have said "come" if he had meant "be brought." Children, we may be sure, came to him of themselves, and were at their ease at once. The suggestion has been made that this saying, too, goes back to Nazareth days, that the small children found a welcome in the workshop, and strayed in to see their brother there on their own irrelevant errands. To him a child was not unimportant—to hurt a child was an unspeakable thing. Indeed, if the Kingdom of Heaven meant anything, it meant that we must be children again. It is quite possible that this idea underlies the saying about a man's being born again (John iii. 3). At any rate, we have to recover, he said, what we lost when we outgrew the child; we must have the simplicity and the frankness of children.

The outdoor life of Jesus lies recorded in his sayings and his parables. They are full of the sights and sounds of the open air. The whole life of the farm is in them. The lost sheep, the ox in a pit, the worried flock, the servant who feeds the cattle, are all there. It is, perhaps, a mark of his race and age that he has a Jew's feeling about "feeding swine," and that the dog is an unclean animal. He speaks of ploughing, and he knows how it should be done; while sowing, a favorite metaphor with teachers, gives him a good many parables. The secret growth of the grain and the harvest over-ripe, with its instant need of the reaper, lest the wheat should be spilt, were to him pictures of human life. With vineyards and their work he seems familiar; perhaps he, too, had "borne the burden and heat of the day." The more homely aspects of farm and garden had their appeal to him. The simile of the hen and its chickens is associated with one of his hours of deepest emotion.

Wild nature, too, he knew and loved—the reed swaying in the wind and the wild red lilies. These last the women cut down and stuffed into ovens to burn there till the ovens were hot for the baking—a matter of daily occurrence, of which no one thought. But he thought of it, and bade men study the flowers and how they grew. God had taken pains to clothe them with more beauty than Solomon had with all his dyed garments and soft raiment. Probably Jesus had seen Herodian princes on the Galilean roads, for He has more than one allusion to royal draperies. The birds of the air, from the callow sparrow that did not fall from its nest "without your Father" to the eagles that gathered about the lost sheep (Luke xvii. 37)—all these he watched. The Psalmist had said long ago that these all had their meat from God, but Jesus brought them into the human family: "Your heavenly Father feedeth them." Even his knowledge of weather signs is recorded for us (Luke xii. 54), and John tells us how he spoke of the wind sweeping over the hills.

A simple home, with an atmosphere of affection and intelligence, where life was not lost sight of in its refinements, where ordinary needs and common duties were the daily facts, where the past had a meaning and gave a meaning to the present—this is the early environment of Jesus, as it is to be deduced from his words. The Mediterranean world was full of men who thought of religion, and mostly in terms of ritual and trance, of the abnormal and unusual. For Jesus, as for every man who has ever helped mankind, the ordinary and the commonplace were enough—if they were once understood. The carpenter's bench and the Book of Psalms and the children's play in the market-place—these kept a man in touch with the normal, and interpreted it. Thus Jesus never thought of God, as the philosophers did, as of one out of the world, to be defined by negations and reached in trance or ecstasy. He kept within the limits of human experience, and found God there, giving significance to the meanest detail of the most commonplace life. Men then, as in a later time, saw death ruling over the natural world. "Decay," said the Stoic philosopher, "is in the material substance of all things; they are but water, dust, bones, stench." * Jesus, on the other hand, saw life in all things—God watching over birds and clothing the grass of the field. To-day we think less of the old philosophic antithesis, between God and matter, and it comes as a relief and encouragement to us to find that Jesus did without it.

NESTS OF DEFIANCE.

Leafless winter reveals to us many secrets that baffled us in summer, in the shape of nests perched in the hawthorn, woven among the dead nettle stems, slung low down on honeysuckle bushes, reared under the once leafy shelter of the sapling elms. The birds that built many of them were well known to us in summer, either the yellow-hammers, daily familiar by sight, or black-cap, nightingale and grasshopper warbler, known better to the ear than the eye. Last year's game of hide-and-seek is up, and we are allowed to see how "warm" we have been without finding, or how very wide of the mark we were. But the winter does not show us, as the summer did, the admirable means of deception practised by these, the more furtive of the nesters. Even the big buildings of the magpies were often so hidden that it was with much surprise that we saw them unveiled in late autumn. These belong to the alleged sub-species of "hedge magpie"; in other words, the well-hidden magpie nests are mostly those in the low trees. The birds carried their sticks fearlessly enough to the tall tree that nine schoolboys out of every ten declare unhesitatingly to be unclimbable, such as the Scotch pine in the Red Field that towers sixty feet without giving so much as a snag for hand or foot.

As any boy has been free to learn this winter from the men who have been setting up and wiring new telegraph poles, even the magpie tree is pregnable to a pair of climbing-irons. You must be very careful, however, to make the most of the slight hold for the arms that a trunk ten feet in circumference affords. If a bit of bark were to give way unexpectedly, and you were to fall backward, it would be bad for you, whether the irons came out and allowed you to take the full fall, or whether they held and allowed you to break both ankles and hang head downwards. Then note the high bend in our magpie pine, where the trunk becomes horizontal for awhile before shooting up once more to bear its crown of leaves wherein the nest sits. Have we a certain means of circumventing that bend when we arrive there, blown with a sixty-foot climb against the full force of gravity? And would our climbing-irons prove a help or a hindrance there, as we crawl that round plank, with the chance of slipping round and finishing with our back to the earth? The magpie pine, in fact, is just such another as one of the worst trees described in Colonel Willoughby Verner's new book, "My Life Among the Wild Birds in Spain" (Bale & Danielsson). This tree the intrepid and agile Colonel swarmed without rope or climbing-irons, and, though his sketch makes it look twice as terrible, we would have guaranteed him a large attendance if, in his palmiest days, he had so attacked our magpie pine.

"Of one thing I am well assured," says Colonel Verner, "namely, that the ravens in selecting this particular tree were perfectly aware of the difficulties it presented to the climber. For there were scores of other trees all round it, some higher and with fewer branches, and apparently more formidable; but as regards security from attack, none of them could be compared to the one the ravens had built in." We would not subscribe so readily to the conclusions drawn from the facts. It may be that the same ravens or others had proved the pregnability of neighboring trees by bitter experience, and it is even not impossible that a hundred years ago some bird made the tree zigzag by putting the weight of its nest on its leading shoot. Gilbert White was not so "assured" of the sagacity of the ravens that built in Losel's wood in an oak with "a large excrescence about the middle of the stem." He is only sure about what the boys thought of it: "The difficulty whetted their inclinations, and each was ambitious of surmounting the arduous task. But when they arrived at the swelling, it jutted out so in their way, and was so far beyond their grasp, that the most daring lads were awed, and acknowledged the undertaking to be too hazardous."

White's must have been a remarkable tree, for it stood in a grove of timber trees, many of them fifty feet, without a bough, and the raven tree was "shapely and tall on the whole," the only exception apparently being the excrescence Such an excrescence low down would not have daunted the rock-climber, for there the typical roughness of the oak would have presented many finger and toe holds that are all that the rock-climber is accustomed to expect. It is nothing short of a revelation to the ordinary tree-climber to be shown how small a roughness in the bark will enable the finger-tips of one hand to hold him up while the other gropes for a higher hold. The beech ("glossy beech," says Cowper) that holds the squirrel's "dray" is twenty feet without a bough. But, as it has two of those warts with which the beech is sometimes marked, each about the size of a walnut, our Cumberland friend used to make twice a day the apparently futile attempt of climbing it. We called it the "impossible" climb, but it only deserved the title about a week. The sparrow hawk's oak, being unusually smooth of bark, is inaccessible without a rope by that way, but the twigs of a very long bough can be reached by jumping, and a long struggle lands you among the central timber. We do not imagine that the sparrow hawks, before selecting the eyrie, came down and measured the height of the trunk, and overlooked the danger of that drooping bough. We think, in fact, that they must be the same pair that once nested in a certain pine, and, driven thence, tried the yet more climbable wild pear, and by chance have found their third choice, on the whole, the best of the three.

It is the misfortune of most birds to "whet the inclinations" of the boy by the skill with which they put their nests out of sight or out of reach. The demand for thrushes' eggs is soon glutted, the nests being so easy to find and to get, except for the prosaic difficulty of a few thorns. The nest of the furtive stonechat is far more desired, and more seldom found. But the pleasures of hide-and-seek do not tempt the young naturalist so much as the grosser delights of accepting the challenge of the rooks: "Here are our nests. Get at them if you can." It is a rash challenge, even to our Cumberland friend, who sportingly bars himself from the use of ladder, rope, climbing-iron, or drooping bough. His strict method leaves many trees unclimbable, whereas they still provide scope for a great deal of skill and exertion to the player of the "all in" game. Colonel Verner's book, which is a good deal more about climbing than about birds, makes us anxious to climb every difficult tree in the neighborhood. We shall have to pretend to his excuse—the desire to photograph the nests that are in them. We could not face the cold eye of the village by climbing an empty tree for the sake of getting up there and coming down again. The proper way up the squirrel's beech, no doubt, is by the two warts; the sparrow hawk's must be visited by scramble from the twigs inward; but the conquest of lordlier difficulties by means of appliances has clearly its own fascination.

How safely the falcon sits at the top of her mast of smooth spruce! Not so if we can cast a stone over that snag two-thirds of the way up. For the stone will carry a length of twine, and the twine will haul a rope over, and the rope is our spider-web that will land ourselves on that snag. On the point of what to do next we are not quite clear, but two-thirds of the way is two-thirds. The exertion is terrific, but this lazy body of ours must have its lesson. That is why we are asked to gallop after hounds or to knock a small but expensive ball round the hills. So from our dizzy snag we will cast the rope to a higher vantage or boldly attack the next height by swarming. And when nearly the last ounce has gone, and the boughs are still unwon, we have the stirring refrain to hearten us, the words of "Scud" East when the Madman was climbing the tree in the spinney, "All up with the old magpie now."

The Drama.

"PENELOPE" AND POPULARITY.

Mr. Somerset Maugham—who, by the way, assures me that he is an individual, and not a syndicate or corporation—has a remarkable genius for writing characters to fit Miss Marie Tempest. So nicely did he suit her in "Mrs. Dot" that the play, though a singularly empty one, and quite the poorest of his productions, has apparently been a great success. In "Penelope" he has produced a much better play, and a character equally congenial to the brilliant little actress. As is Miss Hilda Trevelyan to Mr. Barrie, so is Miss Marie Tempest to Mr. Maugham: that simple proportion sum gives you a pretty fair appraisement of Mr. Maugham's talent; at any rate, in its present phase. For Miss Tempest is the type and incarnation of a certain aspect of modern social life, and perfection in the art of "fitting" her is not a perfection to which everyone would aspire. I fancy, for instance, that it scarcely comes within the scope of Mr. Barrie's ambition. Nevertheless, it presupposes a very distinct sort of cleverness, and we cannot afford to quarrel with cleverness of any sort or size. Where there are brains there is hope: it is pretentious stupidity that is the real enemy.

I laughed a good deal at "Penelope," and I do not blush to own it. The second half of the play is much better than the first half, and contains some passages of irresistible humor. There is even a real touch of satiric originality in the idea of the husband who, on learning that his wife has long known of his infidelity, and has (apparently) made light of it, feels his moral sentiments outraged, and finds himself, quite sincerely, playing the part of the indignant accuser. The complications arising from the lamented decease of "Mrs. Mack" are extremely amusing, and there are touches throughout which betoken the genuine humorist. Taking the play simply on its own level, the worst one finds to say of it is that it is carelessly and unconscientiously written. It is not a well-finished piece of work. There are loose ends and rough edges that an assiduous workman would have removed. For example, Penelope is suffered, in a score of speeches, to betray her knowledge of her husband's divagations long before she ultimately confesses it. Mr. Maugham has not taken the pains to render in the least plausible O'Farrell's blind belief in her blindness. Over and over again he sacrifices plausibility to a momentary comic effect, and thus discounts the one really excellent passage in the play, where Penelope's pretence of ignorance breaks down. It is this slovenliness of workmanship which makes it impossible to class "Penelope" as a first-rate play, even of its kind. Mr. Maugham may, if he pleases, abjure "taking himself seriously" as an artist; but he might at least take himself seriously as an amuser.

In the one excellent passage above alluded to, Miss Tempest's acting rose to the pitch of genius. For the rest, she was her own inimitable self throughout—an actress whom the French may well envy us, and who ought to be eulogised in French. Why does not Mr. Walkley rise to the occasion? The cast, for the rest, is excellent—how could it fail to be, since it includes three such comedians as Mr. Alfred Bishop, Mr. Eric Lewis, and Mrs. Calvert?—the pick of the basket, if one may put it vulgarly. I heard stern critics, in the theatre, objecting to the episodic nature of Mrs. Calvert's part. That did not trouble me in the least. The scene was delightful, and if it did not actually advance the plot, it contributed to one element in the comic effect of the whole act—the extremely unprofitable nature of Dr. O'Farrell's business on that fateful afternoon. Mr. Graham Browne was good as the Doctor, and Miss Norma Whalley, whose rendering of Mrs. Ferguson seemed at first a little extravagant, proved in the end to be entirely justified. To have made the character in the least serious, not to say sympathetic, would entirely have upset the balance of the play. As it was, we felt more than once that Mr. Maugham was skating pretty near the edge of the intolerably cynical. To keep the play in the key of irresponsible comedy, it was necessary that it should have the unreality of the old-fashioned adaptations from the French, in which the real nature of the facts concerned was studiously dissembled, and, so far as actual words went, it seemed that much ado was being made about little or nothing. I do not say that this is either an edifying or an artistic convention; but it is the almost inevitable condition of Maugham-Tempest comedy on the English stage.

As nothing more occurs to me that can profitably be said about "Penelope," I may perhaps eke out this article with a brief consideration of the confession of faith which her creator, it would seem, has recently made public. I take the confession at second-hand, as reproduced in a thoughtful article by "Max"; but there is little doubt, I fancy, that the following summary is accurate enough:—

> "To Mr. Maugham apparently, the 'serious' drama is a thing very ridiculous, very negligible. He has been telling an interviewer that it is 'most unwise' of dramatists to 'take themselves seriously.' He has no patience with 'great central ideas'; and 'to entertain' he declares . . . 'should be the first—perhaps the only—aim of the playwright.'"

This utterance, coming from the author of "A Man of Honor," seems to have scandalised a good many people; and certainly it carries to an extreme that tendency to make a general law of our own particular qualities and limitations from which none of us, probably, is altogether free. But I think there is a substratum of sound sense beneath Mr. Maugham's exaggerations. He fails to make allowance for the wide divergency of tastes, and for the fact that many people—not mere scattered individuals or æsthetic cliques, but people who are quite capable of making a fair show on the booking-sheets—are at least as willing to be entertained by plays with "a great central idea" as by empty trivialities. If he has a "great central idea" lying around in his brain or in his notebooks, I think he makes a mistake, even from the merely financial point of view, in leaving it undeveloped. He is quite clever enough—for he is born with the gift of the stage—to make it a marketable commodity. To do so would cost him more pains, no doubt, than to throw off an ephemeral triviality like "Mrs. Dot"; but the reward, if not larger at the outset, would be more permanent. If I am wrong in my estimate, and he really has not the power of writing thoughtful plays as well as thoughtless sketches, the inability is not a commercial asset, but the reverse. It will lessen, and not increase, the amount of the succession duty which he is so laudably desirous—though probably not impatient—to contribute to the national Exchequer.

Stripped of its exaggerations, however, Mr. Maugham's pronouncement contains an element of sound sense. The playwright who despises the public, and writes simply to please himself and his little circle, makes as great a mistake as he who sacrifices everything to instant popularity. I know this is a damnable heresy in the eyes of many excellent people and my very good friends. "What other motive is possible to a self-respecting artist," they ask, "if it be not to please himself?" Certainly that ought to be his primary motive; but if he cannot please himself while pleasing, or at any rate keenly interesting, a very considerable public, he is the lesser, not the greater, dramatist. The strength of drama lies in its strict conditions and narrow limits, its glory in its wide appeal. So far as I know, history records no instance of a playwright failing to gain the ear of his contemporaries and then being recognised and appreciated by posterity. Alfred de Musset might, perhaps, be cited as a case in point; but he did not write with a view to the stage, and did not try for contemporary popularity. As soon as it occurred to people to put his plays on the stage, they were found to be delightful. Let no playwright, then, think it a merit that he cannot disburden his soul within the three hours' limit, and cannot produce plays intelligible or endurable to any but a specially selected audience. Of course, I do not include among the conditions which make for the strength of drama the necessity for conciliating an arbitrary censorship and providing a showy part for an actor-manager or a star actress. In the English theatre, as at present constituted, many fine plays seem to appeal only to a clique, because, for one reason or another, they cannot get at the public that would appreciate them. They are out-advertised by the star plays and the musical frivolities. But the worst mischief of this state of affairs lies in the fact that our ablest writers are so apt to abandon all hope of popularity and become intransigeant self-pleasers. They deserve our respect, perhaps, rather more than Mr. Maugham, who chooses to go to the opposite extreme; but not more than the writers who make a sincere effort to do the best work of which the conditions of the popular stage admit. It is not a merit, but a defect, in a play that it should set at defiance all reasonable limits, either of human endurance or of human intelligence. The haughtiest self-pleaser must write with an ideal audience in view; and his play will not be better, but worse, if that ideal be in the nature of things unrealisable.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Art.

A MODERN PICTURE BUYER.

THE Royal Academy has proved before now that if its conservatism is deep-rooted and difficult to dislodge, it can at times surprise. The winter exhibition just open is a case in point. It is a surprise, and, to some people, a disappointment. Hitherto the galleries at Burlington House have always included a certain proportion of "old masters" in the winter show; and although the opinion obtained that the zeal shown in collecting these might be tempered with a little more discretion, it was felt generally that the authorities were fulfilling a high educational and artistic mission in thus providing examples of the art of the venerable past. Even on those occasions, when the old and the new were mingled somewhat incongruously, no grumble was heard; the comparison, at any rate, was recognised as instructive. But this year the "old masters" have vanished. For the first time in its history the Academy has followed its summer exhibition of modern paintings by a winter show that is hardly less modern. For the first time the entrancing game of attribution cannot be played, since the "masters" either live or died but yesterday. And for the first time the learning of the connoisseur can display itself little more than that of the regular visitant to the important English and Scottish Exhibitions.

We think, perhaps, that the last circumstance may have something to do with the strong expressions of dissent that have come from a section of the critical world. The "old masters" exhibitions were at once their pride and their butt. They loved them while they attacked them. They were glad to discover the unauthentic work, though they ridiculed those responsible for the assertion of its genuineness. But here there is nothing to attack or praise, except what has been attacked or praised within the memory of our generation, and nothing to "attribute" except at the risk of being laughed at. In fact, there is no sport to be had from the McCulloch Collection; and if the absence of this interest does not extenuate the wholesale condemnation of the exhibition as unworthy of the Academy's winter traditions, it accounts at least for a very human feeling of resentment.

For the latter, too, some arguments put forward by the other, the apologetic side, afford a certain justification. It has, for instance, been asserted that the collection is better calculated to raise the status of modern British art and to encourage living artists than any exhibition of old masters. This, to say the least of it, is very doubtful. The idea reminds one of the attempt made by the British Institution in Hazlitt's time to extol the contemporary English artists by poking fun, through the medium of a catalogue raisonné, at an exhibition of older pictures. Admitting that the "old master" craze is over-done to the detriment of modern work, an æsthetic public opinion that ruled out old masters would be worse than one that appraises them beyond their value. For ourselves, we do not believe that modern art can be stimulated by any number of exhibitions of modern art, nor can we see that it is any encouragement to living artists to be confronted with 360 works of painting and sculpture of very much the same class as they themselves produce, all or some of which may shortly be thrust upon the open market. Moreover, the thought occurs—so far as the Academy's good intentions are concerned—that their opportunity for encouraging British art occurs regularly each May, and that the result so far has hardly been such as to warrant their making an additional effort in January with any hope of success.

Yet to the detached student of matters artistic, the McCulloch Collection offers food for considerable reflection. There are pictures here that one is genuinely glad to make or renew acquaintance with, and there is no lack of variety of a sort. Most important of all, the exhibition sheds an interesting light on the genus collector, or at any rate on one phase of him. Accepting the view that picture-collectors are divided into two classes, the born and the made, we should unhesitatingly, and without any intent to disparage, place the late Mr. McCulloch in the latter class. He liked pictures, bought them, and acquired knowledge and taste as he bought. His buying was conducted on business-like principles. He avoided old masters, and purchased only from living artists. A wise speculator, he speculated almost entirely in the works of those who were rapidly arriving or had already arrived. This does not mean that he confined himself to Royal Academicians, as at least one modern millionaire is known to have done, although there is an undeniable academic stamp about the bulk of the collection; it merely signifies that he bought judiciously—on his own initiative, or in accordance with safe advice—rather than with inspiration He had not the instinct of a Staats Forbes, that inspired the purchase of Barbizon masters when those masters were still comparatively unrecognised. Still, with his judiciousness and a fair taste—as millionaires' tastes go—he rarely made a bad mistake; and this, considering the range of his operations, which extended over most of the British Schools, and some foreign ones, reflects great credit on his powers of business discrimination. He bought intelligently and with his eyes fixed on the current movements and personages of the artistic world. It is almost possible to date the notoriety enjoyed by successive painters during the past thirty years by the examples of them in the McCulloch Collection. In this way he ranged from Burne-Jones to Whistler, and from Dagnan-Bouveret to Mr. William Orpen.

Representativeness was obviously a hobby with him, and it is this quality that will attract the variety-loving public to the collection. Yet it is doubtful whether the claim that he was catholic in taste can be sustained. With such opportunities for indulgence, a truly catholic taste could not, it seems to us, have drawn the line at old masters. A man may have a knowledge of modern British or any other modern art, and may have acquired a certain taste with the knowledge. But his knowledge cannot be said to be perfect unless it is prefaced by some understanding of what has gone before, neither can his taste be truly catholic without having as its basis some sympathy with the achievements of former masters. It is manifestly impossible to appreciate modern painting in the wider sense—and it is only by such wide appreciation that true catholicity of taste can be attained—without appreciating the source whence it sprung; to know Sargent without having known Velasquez or Raeburn, or to relish the modern landscapists without ever having heard of Constable, Turner, Ruisdael, or Claude. This applies both to artists and amateurs. In regard to embryo painters, learning their craft, it is impolitic to set them to emulate the masterpieces of olden times; but it would be worse than unjust to deny them, in the later stages of their apprenticeship, a sight of these, and with the art-lover who would study art without practising it professionally, the more he gleans from its pictured history, the better equipped will he be. The distinction between modern and older art is not nearly as great as the connecting of the one with the other is important; and, for this reason, we rather regret any exhibition that tends to set up an antagonism between the two in the public mind, that creates the idea that the interests of the one are diametrically opposed to those of the other. If old masters were better understood, and their value appraised artistically as well as commercially, the depression in the modern picture-market would quickly disappear.

From another point of view the catholicity of the late Mr. McCulloch is open to question. One doubts whether he liked all that he bought; the representativeness of the collection is suspicious. A catholicity that embraces Bastien-Lepage and Bouguereau, Whistler, Lord Leighton and the Hon. John Collier, John Brett and William McTaggart, Charles Sims, Fred Morgan and James Maris—to name but a very few—is one that the Forty of the Academy itself cannot emulate. If, therefore, the collection must be saddled with an adjective, we prefer that it should be representative rather than catholic; and if we had to label the late Mr. McCulloch as a collector, we should call him industrious, rather than great. To come to the details upon which the foregoing remarks are based, the pièces de résistance of the British School are undoubtedly the Orchardsons. For here are "The Master Baby" of 1886, and "The Young Duke" of two years later, both works well-nigh perfect in their scholarly blend of æsthetic quality and human appeal; in color—as M. Chesneau described it—"as harmonious as the wrong side of an old tapestry." Then there are three McTaggarts, all painted within the last twenty years, inspired wonders of daylight and fresh air; four Petties, adequate, if hardly showing that painter's color sense at its best; a Hornel, a late Hughes-Stanton—for Mr. Hughes-Stanton is a late arrivé—David Murrays, McWhirters, and Coutts-Michies in plenty, five Peter Grahams, the same number of David Farquharsons, a sombre Cameron, a Lavery; the Scottish group is almost complete. Had this group been exhibited apart, instead of scattered throughout the remaining pictures, one would have carried away a firmer impression of its strength, if also, alas! of its individual weaknesses and disappointments.

The English exhibit almost startles by its variety. Leighton's enormous "Daphnephoria," Millais' "Sir Isumbras"—purchased, of course, a long time after it was painted—Burne-Jones's "Love Among the Ruins," Watts's "Fata Morgana," form almost comic contrast to the too familiar genre of Mr. Marcus Stone, the landscapes of Mr. B. W. Leader, the mature work of Mr. Sargent. Whistler is not omitted. One of the minor Valparaiso nocturnes and a portrait of himself, nebulous as a Carrière, are lost in a wilderness of bright canvases in the Water-color Room. Among the French pictures are two fairly important examples of Bastien-Lepage, and quite a collection of painting and drawings represent one of our Honorary Foreign Academicians, M. Dagnan-Bouveret. There would appear also to have been a Spanish period in the twenty years or so occupied in collecting. Several quite imposingly empty Spanish subject-pictures by "modern masters" of that nationality overwhelm the few Belgian, Hungarian, and other European canvases that chance to find themselves in the same room. The sculpture section—which includes a marble version of Rodin's finely emotional "The Kiss"—is small; but it certainly displays more coherence in selection, and is, on the whole, preferable to a collection of pictures by one man whose ambition, to put it frankly, would seem to have been the gratification of many other tastes rather than the indulgence, or even the cultivation, of his own.

Letters to the Editor.

SIR EDWARD GREY'S OPPORTUNITY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read your article in last week's issue with great interest. Sir Edward Grey has a great opportunity before him. What I fear is that English readers do not realise how serious the situation of Turkey is. It is not too much to say that since the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina every week has increased the hostile attitude both of Turkey and Austria. At first, while the feeling of the young Turkey was that Bulgaria and Austria had been guilty of sharp practice in taking advantage of the situation, it was balanced by another which expressed itself by saying, "What does it matter whether Ferdinand calls himself prince or king?" As to Bosnia and Herzegovina, they have been lost to Turkey for thirty years. At present this attitude is changed.

There is little or no hostile feeling against Bulgaria. Turks and Bulgarians believe that they have need of each other. They entered into negotiations in regard to matters which required adjustment consequent on the new order of things. They settled these in principle, the Grand Vizier and the Bulgarian delegates being each reasonable. The only point left open was as to the share of the Public Debt which should be paid by Bulgaria proper, that is, excluding Eastern Roumelia, as to which they have arranged. As they never have paid anything for Bulgaria they refuse to do so now, and any impartial observer would justify them in their refusal. The Turks themselves care little about it because, if anything was paid, it would go to foreign bondholders.

But here comes the hitch. The Turkish Ministers are afraid of the responsibility of making a definite settlement. The Turkish newspapers, conducted with quite remarkable ability considering that most of their editors are inexperienced men, have led their readers to expect that Turkey will receive much more than she is likely to get, and the Ministers know it. In their fear of responsibility they wish to place upon the Conference the burden of making the definite settlement.

As to Austria, the irritation has gone on steadily increasing. This is mainly due to boycotting, which, while really a wonderful invention, is a dangerous one. It is a measure by which an irresponsible minority can take out of the hands of Government the power to inflict a worrying and a serious injury to a foreign State. Let me, in passing, say that the statement that the English have aided in the boycott is simply the reverse of the truth. The allegation that the Balkan Committee had anything to do with the matter is nonsense. It began before its members came here, and I doubt whether the subject of the boycott was ever discussed with any of them. But the boycott continues, and Austrians naturally resent it. An American friend who a few days ago was in Bosnia states that the feeling among the Austrian troops is extremely warlike. They want war.

On this side, the Turks are doing all they can to be prepared for any eventuality, and Turkey, which is in great financial straits, has to find money for a war which ought to be impossible.

What Turkey wants at the present moment to overcome these outside difficulties is foreign guidance, and here comes in Sir Edward Grey's opportunity. Of all the injuries which Abdul Hamid inflicted upon the country, none is greater than that he deprived it of men trained in statesmanship. All power was centred in the palace gang, among whom there was not a man accustomed to consider public questions. The present Ministers are the most honorable and clean-handed set of men whom Turkey has seen for thirty years. But, excepting the Grand Vizier and the Minister of Foreign Affairs, none has had experience in guiding public affairs. None has been accustomed to take responsibility. The Minister of Foreign Affairs is amiable but distrusted. He was never suspected of conspicuous ability, and probably at the present time is less disposed than ever to take the initiative in the settlement of any question. He can hardly be expected to urge on a settlement which would probably make any Minister unpopular. He therefore lets things drift. Kiamil, the Grand Vizier, is upright, clear-sighted, and of good judgment, but he is on the wrong side of eighty. He has to deal with many internal questions, and the wonder to me is that he does not break down from sheer physical weariness. I left him a few nights ago at eleven, and knew that he had been transacting business from eight in the morning, and that he had an appointment for eight the next morning.

All the other Ministers are occupied with the business of their own departments. Foreign affairs are allowed to drift, and they are drifting the wrong way. Under these circumstances the assistance of Sir Edward Grey will be invaluable. In Sir Gerard Lowther he has a man who is essentially level-headed, and who has already shown himself tactful. For many reasons the guidance of Europe can come through him better than through any other ambassador. England is now in Turkey the most popular nation. It is recognised that though we worried the Porte about misgovernment in Armenia, and more recently about the necessity of reforms in Macedonia to improve the condition of Christian and Moslem alike, we had no selfish object in view. No other ambassador is so well trusted as the representative of England. The German is, of course, a man of conspicuous ability and would do his best to avoid war, but Germany as the ally of Austria is not trusted. Russia, for different reasons, is not looked upon by Turkey as sincerely friendly. France and Italy are trusted. England, backed by them, would be listened to with sympathy. Many reasons which need not even be indicated go to prove that the Turks would prefer that England should take the lead in helping their Ministers to come to an arrangement with Austria. What is there against such a lead? We are friends with Austria, and the wanton statements in some of her newspapers undoubtedly trouble Austrian statesmen less than corresponding words in some of our own papers trouble English statesmen. We are friends with Turkey and wish to deserve her friendship. Sir Edward Grey can find no better means of doing good to Turkey, of strengthening the new régime, of preventing reaction, than by using the great influence of England to bring Austria and Turkey to a friendly arrangement. While there is nothing against the lead being taken by Sir Edward with the two other Powers, there is everything to be said in its favor. Above all, there is the fact that the Council of Ministers, unused to taking responsibility, will not shrink from the task when they know that their disinterested friends are unanimous in advising them to decide upon a particular course. The time offers the greatest opportunity for a British statesman in reference to the Near Eastern question that has been presented for thirty years. Without British guidance we shall probably drift into war, and possibly into a military dictatorship. With it—and Sir Edward has shown his power to grapple seriously with the question—he will secure an honorable peace with the gratitude of Turkey, Austria, and Bulgaria.—Yours, &c.,

"WHY?"

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The letter "Fiat Lux," in your last week's issue, raises questions which will have been in the minds of many since the terrible tidings from Messina came to hand.

Are there not, however, certain lines of thought, which, if followed up, give a glimmer of light upon the deep problems raised?

Earthquakes, as other natural phenomena, are due to the unchanging character of the laws of nature. Can it be shown that the immutability of these laws has on the whole worked for the uplift of the race? I think it can.

Indeed, human effort would have been paralysed, and man's ascent from the condition of the cave-dweller to his present position would have been impossible, unless he had been able to count upon such immutability. It is easy to see that to the race the unchanging character of the laws of nature works beneficently. Take, as illustration, the terrible outbreak of cholera in Hamburg in 1892. During three months 16,956 persons were attacked. "At the cemetery some hundreds of men were engaged day and night digging long trenches to hold double rows of coffins; even so the victims could not be buried fast enough." (Enc. Brit.) In Altona, however, which is continuous with Hamburg, only 328 persons died. Inquiry showed that in the case of Hamburg the water supply was polluted, while in Altona it was pure. The object lesson was not lost. From this time forth the connection between impure water and cholera was no longer a fact known only to medical scientists and a few advanced Government departments, but became the common possession of the civilised world.

As recently as 1871-1880 the annual death rate in England and Wales was 21·3, while in 1901-1907 it had sunk to 15·8. In my own city the death rate in 1801-1810 is given at 29; in 1907 it had sunk to 15. Consider the enormous lessening of human suffering represented by these figures. The saving of human life was largely due to wider knowledge of the conditions of health. But this wider knowledge was based upon inquiry and observation—processes which would have been baffled at every point if the answers of nature to the questions addressed to her had been capricious.

How incalculable, again, has been the lessening of human suffering due to the discovery of anæsthetics, and to the discoveries associated with the names of Pasteur and Lister. Their work has not only benefited the race, but has immediately benefited the individual. How could these discoveries have been made but for the unchanging character of nature's laws? If one result had followed a certain experiment, and a different result had followed another identical in character, the most penetrating intellect would have been baffled. A general survey assures us that the laws of nature, whether in the great or in the infinitely small, alike immutable in their character, are, with ever increasing rapidity, coming under the control of man, and in many cases becoming serviceable to him.

Local famine was one of the scourges of the ancient world, but to-day, if any European market indicates an approaching scarcity of corn, the knowledge quickly passes by telegraph to Canada, to the United States, or to Argentina, and through the agency of steam on sea and land the needed supplies are quickly forthcoming. The discoveries of the steam engine and of the electric cable would, however, have been impossible if the answers of nature to Watt and Wheatstone had been capricious. Let me break the sequence of my argument to note that the terrible sufferings of our great cities, which fill us with shame and sorrow, are in the main due, not to natural causes, but to the cruelty and selfishness of man.

Messina lies is a well-recognised earthquake zone. The town was destroyed by the great earthquake of 1783, after which it was rebuilt But the necessary and obvious precautions were not taken; lofty houses, insufficiently strong, were built. The mistake is not likely to be repeated. The character of building suitable to a district subject to earthquakes will now be carefully studied, and the information to be obtained from Japan and other countries utilised. You mention in last week's NATION that "the houses of Messina which were built of reinforced concrete were undamaged by the earthquake." If buildings of a suitable character be erected, Messina is never likely again to experience a disaster so terrible in its consequences as that of the 28th December.

Former generations would have spoken of this disaster as due to "the act of God." It is surely no small thing to know that these words, in the sense in which they were formerly used, are a misnomer. That, rather, the disaster was due to the operation of laws beneficent to the race in their ultimate results.

But what avails this, it will be asked, to the tens of thousands who perished miserably and to the survivors left alone in the world? I know that my argument will only carry a certain length. It greatly lessens the moral problem, but it does not remove it. The mystery of pain and evil in the world remains, and I do not think it is possible to justify the ways of God to man apart from a belief in immortality.—Yours, &c.,

J. R.

York, Jan 13th, 1909

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I do not presume to give an answer to the tremendous question raised by your correspondent "Fiat Lux," but if he will accept it, I will reach out a hand of sympathy to him through the darkness which is assuredly caused in many souls by the earthquake of Messina.

I entirely agree with him as to the insufficiency of the explanations which have been suggested to him for the purpose of "justifying the ways of God to man" in this catastrophe. After all, the question is this: "How can we reconcile such murderous outbursts of natural forces with the two propositions 'God is Almighty,' 'God is all-loving'?" If I must give up one, I would rather give up the first than the second; rather accept the Dualism which fascinated so many Oriental thinkers, and believe that the earthquake is the work of a cruel Ahriman whom the beneficent Ormuzd was unable to overcome, than think that God's character is displayed to us in the terrible event of the 28th of December. In a slightly different sense I would say with the old Hebrew chronicler, "The Lord was not in the earthquake." The tragedy is enacted in a scale of stupifying terror; but is not this necessarily our attitude towards the existence of such a disease as cancer, as insanity, as the awful typhoons in the China Seas? As to how many phenomena like these in the world of Nature or the world of man, our secret thought is, "Had I been omnipotent I would not have allowed these things to be"; and yet somehow faith has survived their fierce assault. We have a conviction that the answer must be, "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter."

To me the first word of comfort to my menaced faith came from the reported words of an Austrian geologist, who said that the earthquake at Messina was part of a great cosmic process which had been going on for many aeons, and would probably continue for many aeons to come, that process by which Sicily was disparted from Africa and by which hereafter the mountains of Sicily will probably one day become mere islands in the Mediterranean. When I read these words the thought came to me, "We have been witnessing a scene in the making of the world." Mountains, lakes, and rivers: how much of the glory and the loveliness of our planet is due to these; to the great rivers especially how much do we owe of the civilisation and progress of mankind? Yet are not all these due to birth-throes far more terrible than the slight earth-shrink which has caused the destruction of Messina? The making of the world is apparently not yet finished, and man, the creature who has reaped such infinite gain from its completed stages, suffers, and probably must suffer, from its relatively insignificant continuing processes. In a certain sense the agony of these closing days of 1908 was predestined when the Sicilian aborigines built on the brittle rocks which line the Straits their humble village of Zancle, to be afterwards changed by Greek colonists into the proud city of Messina. For two millenniums and a-half—a mere span in geologic time—the buildings of Messina (far too solid and stately for the substructure of rock below them) have been awaiting their doom.

But then the question recurs, "If the Almighty Maker who is also our Father, knew that this peril was hanging over the cities of the Straits, Reggio as well as Messina, why was no warning sent to the hapless dwellers under their roofs?" An Old Testament writer says: "Surely the Lord will do nothing but He revealeth His secret unto His servants the Prophets." If some such man as Il Santo of Fogazzaro's tale had been sent to cry against the city like Jonah of old, "Yet forty days and Messina shall be overthrown," All-wisdom would have at least done something to bridge over this terrible chasm between All-mightiness and All-love. It is true; and certainly we may wish that there were now men such as those who are said to have existed in the childhood of the world who could foretell great natural occurrences, famines, earthquakes, floods. But if such a prophet had appeared two months ago, and had gone through the streets of Messina crying his cry of doom, how would this generation have listened to him? Do we not know that all men would have called out for the suppression of this crazy fanatic who was agitating the stock-market, and, as far as he was listened to, depressing the value of house property in an important Sicilian city? It may be that the Lord God would willingly speak to man through "His servants, the Prophets," even as He did in the childhood of the world, in the days of ancient times, but that we are too intent on material things, too much puffed up with the pride of all our newly-acquired knowledge, to give Him a chance of speaking to us. And thus when the strong wind is followed by the earthquake, and the earthquake by the fire, the Lord being "in" none of these cosmic manifestations, we fail to hear Him in that which would truly reveal Him to us, "the still small voice" which might show us things to come, and at the least would renew in our hearts the persuasion that All-mightiness is also All-love.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Surely no Christian teacher will presume to tell "Fiat Lux" that "it is sinful or blasphemous to question or to doubt." For was not "asking questions" one of the means by which the Christ Himself "increased in wisdom"?

Surely, too, no Christian teacher will suppose himself competent to give an adequate answer to the questions which this terrible disaster in Italy is forcing men to ask, nor to the questions which unnumbered incidents of every day suggest with equal cogency, if not with equal force.

For, sir, as you point out in your article, "Nature's War with Man," the teaching of Jesus has at last made impossible for Christians the one explanation of these things which formerly seemed to be sufficient.

On page after page of the Old Testament events of this kind are interpreted as the judgments of God upon sin. This was the orthodox explanation of them given by the religious teachers in the time of Jesus. It is strange indeed that it has lingered on through generations of Christians. For Jesus Himself was at special pains to repudiate it. His teaching about the fall of the Tower of Siloam forbids us to seek for a moral cause for these calamities, or to look to the physical forces of Nature for interpretations of God's moral judgments.

We seem, then, to be set in the midst of a world in which law is supreme—law that is not broken in the interest of man. We know that storm and earthquake, as well as rain and sunshine, are manifestations of natural law. And if we believe that Nature is, in any sense at all, a manifestation of God, then we cannot deny that the laws of Nature are His laws, however little we may find in them of moral meaning or purpose.

But, then, is it not evident that a non-moral world, a world of physical cause and effect, cannot be to us a manifestation of the moral nature of God? To persons, an adequate manifestation of God can only come through persons. So it is that in the prophets and righteous men of every race we find a clearer manifestation of God than we can expect to find in the physical order. A man, in whom life, love, and courage, and self-sacrifice are manifest is an instrument through which God can express Himself, as He cannot express Himself through the physical forces of Nature.

So we say "God was in Christ" because we believe Christ to be "the effulgence of His glory, and the very image of His substance." In Christ, "Himself taking our infirmities and bearing our sicknesses," we believe that we see God's true attitude to the world's sorrow.

When our faith is shaken by the heedlessness of physical law, we can still say, "These are but parts of His ways."

When Nature's report of God seems to clash with Christ's message from Him, then we must interpret the lower by the higher, not the higher by the lower.

We look for God, not in the earthquake which turns man to destruction, but in the Life which is the Light of men.—Yours, &c., J. M. J.

January 12th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I do not propose to enter at any length into the deeper questions raised in the letter signed "Fiat Lux," which appeared in your columns of Saturday last, for they are ably dealt with in the article headed "Nature's War with Man" (but which I should prefer to see entitled "Man's Struggle Against Nature"), the concluding paragraph of which I specially recommend to your correspondent's notice.

But as regards the particular catastrophe which has so deeply moved him, I should like to point out that if man persists in erecting populous cities upon a portion of the earth's surface, which the scientific knowledge he has been permitted to attain plainly tells him cannot be otherwise than specially dangerous, he must surely take the consequences of his action.

Moreover, except in a few instances (which significantly withstood the earthquake), the buildings in Messina and Reggio appear to have been constructed on ordinary lines, without any thought or provision being taken to meet the disaster which sooner or later was bound to overwhelm them.

I suggest to your correspondent, therefore, that the "blame" for the misery which has followed is due rather to man's blindness and carelessness than to any malignant intention on part of the Power which has "hung this earth upon nothing." Now, whatever views may be held as to the origin of the universe, it is at least admitted that it is subject to certain fundamental laws—mathematical, astronomical, physical, chemical, and biological, as we term them—which are not evil in themselves, but with which man is constantly trying conclusions. Sometimes he succeeds, or appears to do so, but the contest is a risky one, and failure is inevitably attended by dire consequences, whether to individuals or communities. Let "Fiat Lux" take a broader view—let him, above all, consider what the "cosmos" is, and he will surely come to see that man's part in it, with all his struggles and consequent sufferings, is, whilst not lacking its proper position, but a minute factor in the general scheme.—Yours, &c., B.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The earth commenced its existence as a nebulous mass possessed of a vast store of heat. It has been slowly cooling down for untold ages. The solid crust which has thus slowly developed is thinner in some parts than in others. As the cooling process continues, the shell, at its weakest parts, warps a little. This phenomenon of nature is called earthquake. That is "Why?"

"Why" your correspondent, "Fiat Lux," should now "feel the bands of faith snapping" I am at a loss to understand. In my turn I ask, Why? Does your correspondent require Almighty God to regulate the forces of nature in the interests of puny mankind?—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Nottingham, January 12th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—"Fiat Lux" has been thrown down by a great shock—a shock which many others are sharing with him. The ancient problem of human suffering has thrust itself upon us in an unusually awful form, and most of us are liable in such circumstances to go down—for the moment. But shall we remain prostrate?

Is it really necessary to accept the paralysing conclusion that no answer to our questionings is possible, because we see none now?

Have we sufficiently considered the vast scale on which we must think, ranging over space which to us at least seems infinite, and over worlds without number, if we are to understand the working out of the Divine purposes? Can we really do such thinking, we whose powers are so limited, and as yet so undeveloped? To some of us it seems practically certain that there are issues which our minds could not grasp, if God himself were to place them before us in the most accurate human language. The difficulty may lie most of all in our rudimentary moral condition, making it impossible for us rightly to compare values in human life; tempting us to regard suffering as more horrible than degradation or stagnation, and to prize comfort above the full life of the spirit.

All seems to point to the conclusion that, however painfully, we must wait for our answer. But in the meantime, is there nothing that we can lay hold of, to save us from the paralysis of despair? Is the meaning of the life and death of Christ really exhausted, or can we not find an assurance there, that God does not stand apart from the sufferings and struggles of His creatures, but rather that there is no death into which He is not willing, if we dare say so, actually to accompany us? Such an assurance, if we can receive it, may (as for many before us) prove the entrance into an acquaintance with the Author of our life, so close and so satisfying as to exclude doubt.

Truly we need to be strong; for the mass of preventible human misery is overwhelming, and united unselfish action is loudly called for. We may remember, too, that the suffering caused by natural forces might with the right conditions be enormously lessened; as with proper building in earthquake zones. But there are worse human ills than even earthquake; and may we not take the present sudden awakening of pity as a call to look round and see what we can do?—Yours, &c., ONE WHO IS WAITING.

MR. ARCHER AND "THE LAST OF THE DE MULLINS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—"Who shall decide when doctors disagree?" Mr. Archer declares that Monty Bulstead's speech to Janet De Mullin, "I wonder if Bertha and I will ever have a son like Johnny," is "silly, clumsy, boorish, bounderish, unpardonable, incredible, and idiotic." Mr. Shaw, on the contrary, in a characteristic postcard, calls it "the nicest thing your young man says." I confess it seems to me a perfectly natural and certainly quite inoffensive remark in the circumstances in which it is uttered; but tastes differ. I leave it to "An Old Playgoer"—for whose doughty championship I am duly grateful—to settle who is right.

Meantime, my main contention, that Mr. Archer is no longer in sympathy with the modern dramatic movement in this country, receives complete support from the tone of his article last week. Mr. Archer tells us he has "consistently fostered" and "fought for" our latest drama, but he adds that he has done so sometimes at the cost of his sense of proportion. He has sometimes praised plays "not, indeed, insincerely, but with a careful suppression of the final essential truth, which was that, tried by any exacting standard, they were very small beer indeed."

Just so. To Mr. Archer the work of the new school of dramatists is, on the whole, "very small beer indeed." Simply that, and nothing more. So he pats it gently on the back in a kind, grandfatherly manner, bidding it go away and not be troublesome, while his mind goes back with rapture to the great works of the 'eighties and the 'nineties, to "The Profligate" and "The Middleman." To him the new plays are poor stuff, not all of them, perhaps, quite so despicable as my own "thin shrill clevernesses," but not to be compared with the great achievements of his prime. There were giants in those days!

Mr. Archer says he has never tired of praising "The Voysey Inheritance." We all do that to-day. But let him compare his tepid enthusiasm over that play on its original production with the paean he raised over "His House in Order," and tell us which of the two seemed to him the better work. I think he will own the latter. Could anyone who understood and appreciated what the newer school of drama is aiming at have held that opinion?—Yours, &c.,

ST. JOHN HANKIN.

"THE GLEAM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Under the above heading, I was surprised to find an article, in a broad-minded paper like THE NATION, holding such narrow views on the divine fire of genius. Surely the educated classes, which is only another name for the wealthy, have more than a sufficient monopoly of the good things of this world, without claiming further the sole royal road to follow the Gleam. In the days when education was the privilege of the favored few, would not the world of literature, science, and art have been the poorer if only the educated had followed the Gleam? Might not the late South African War have come sooner to an end if there had been more Fighting Macs and fewer educated generals? Is not the battlefield more the place for action than accent? Turning again to literature, Charles Dickens would have continued to grub on at the blacking factory if he had failed to follow the Gleam because of his lowly position at the start. Yet this is only one instance out of many that could be cited, but I am personally interested in one.

Why this onslaught upon John Clare? Why this reference to the stain upon his birth? Is not this visiting the sins of the father upon the children, even unto the third and fourth generation? For there are many of Clare's great grandchildren's children who may perhaps read this attack upon Clare with pain, and wonder what they have done to deserve it. Simply because their great-great-grandfather decided to follow the Gleam in opposition to the theory of the writer of this article, "The Gleam." This wizened imp of the fen was not an ill-favored lad at all according to those who knew him, but a very attractive-looking little fellow, with pale, delicate face, but the eyes and high forehead quite atoned for that, and a very quiet lad. Imps do not as a rule write poetry and attend night school after a hard day's work as little John Clare did. Fortunately, Grimshaw, W. Hilton, R.A., and Behnes have handed down Clare's portrait and bust, so the public may judge for themselves. As a man Clare was not a drunkard; as a matter of fact, he was a total abstainer for some years. He was under-gardener at Burghley eleven months as a young man, but left on account of the drinking habits he was pressed to take part in. My mother and uncles always spoke of their father as a very sober man and the best of parents. To say he starved in dirt is a cruel libel, as his cleanliness was apparent to all who knew him. His cottage at Northborough is the best in the village to-day. The other, not so black as it was painted, is inhabited up to now. Clare's first book was praised by all the reviewers, while the "Quarterly Review," that made such a bitter attack upon Keats, had nothing but praise for Clare. Gifford was not the man to be led away by half a dozen people in London. In 1821 he had an annuity of £45 given to him by his patrons. His last book brought him £40. The Literary Fund presented him with £50. He was the tenant of three small farms in his time, besides having a cottage especially built for him. But poets are not good business men, and he was often in low water. He never ceased to follow the plough to follow the Gleam. To my mind, Clare lost nothing by following the Gleam. He had nothing to lose, as he was only an agricultural laborer at the start.—Yours, &c.,

[We are much indebted to our correspondent for his very interesting letter, but we think he mistakes the purpose of our article, which was to show the pity of real talent struggling in vain against the hindrances of modern society. We admire men like John Clare all the more for their struggle and for their persistence in following the Gleam. We only pointed out how terribly even men of high natural gifts like John Clare are handicapped in running their race, and how seldom they are able owing to their wretched circumstances to display their highest powers. Our facts about John Clare were mainly taken from Mr. Symons's sympathetic introduction.—ED., THE NATION.]

THE REPRESENTATIVE CHURCH COUNCIL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your footnote to my letter, you say that you cannot see that I in any way rebut the Dean of Ripon's statements. But I have given evidence of the inaccuracy of those statements, and I am content to leave your readers to judge between the Dean's letter and my own.

And you ask—"Does Mr. Holdsworth maintain that the Representative Church Council stands for more than a section of the Church?" Yes, sir, he does so maintain. The facts of the case compel him to do so. The Representative Church Council includes all the Bishops, all the Deans (including the Dean of Ripon), all the Archdeacons, Proctors from every diocese (elected by the incumbents), and lay delegates from every diocese (elected by the Diocesan Conferences). To state that such a body stands for no more than a section of the Church is to state that which is obviously inconsistent with the plain facts of the case. In my last letter I described the Council as "a tentative effort towards a real and effective system of self-government." This implies that it is at present imperfectly representative; but there is a wide difference between the imperfectly representative and the "unrepresentative." Imperfect representation may be very real and effective so far as it goes; indeed, a perfect system of representation is impossible; the House of Commons is sufficient proof of this. We have had ample evidence that the present House of Commons is but imperfectly representative; but is it to be altogether condemned on that ground? And the fate of the Education Bill (I say nothing of the merits of the measure) shows that the Prime Minister does not consider the Representative Church Council to be unrepresentative, or to stand for no more than a section of the Church!

You may rest assured that the Council has come to stay. Its representative character is at present imperfect; but it can be improved, and it will be improved. What the Council stands for is really this—the self-government of the Church of England.—Yours, &c.,

ALFRED HOLDSWORTH.

Poetry.

TO MY DOG.

My dear, when I leave you
I always drop a bit of me,
A holy glove or sainted shoe;
Your wistful corse I leave it to,
The soul of you has gone to see
How I could ever have the heart
So to abandon you.

My dear, when you leave me
You do not even drop a shoe;
And yet you know a man to be
The sort of dull monstrosity,
Whose spirit cannot follow you
When you're away, with all its heart,
As yours can follow me.

My dear, since we must leave,
One sorry day, I you, you me;
Teach me to grieve as you can grieve;
Then through the ages we'll retrieve
Each others' scent and company,
And longing shall not pull my heart—
As now you pull my sleeve.

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

ONE of the most promising of the new books announced by Mr. Murray is "The Life of the Hon. Mrs. Norton," by Miss Perkins. Mrs. Norton, as everybody knows, was a granddaughter of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, and the second of "the three Graces," the other two being her sisters, Lady Dufferin and the Duchess of Somerset. She inherited much of her grandfather's wit and vivacity, as well as some share of his literary gift. Her poems were praised by Lockhart in the "Quarterly Review," but her most effective writings were her pamphlets on the position of women. The improvements in the laws regarding the right of married women to their own earnings, and, in certain circumstances, to the custody of their children, were, in some measure, due to Mrs. Norton's advocacy. Several episodes in her career, particularly her unhappy marriage, her journalism, and her friendship with Lord Palmerston, bear so close a resemblance to the fortunes of the heroine of "Diana of the Crossways" that there was some ground for the belief that she was the original of Mr. Meredith's great picture. This has, however, been denied in a later edition of the novel, though one may still believe that the author had Mrs. Norton in mind—a different attitude from that of deliberate portraiture. Miss Perkins's volume will contain a number of hitherto unpublished letters.

FEW theatrical memoirs have been so popular as Sir Squire and Lady Bancroft's "On and Off the Stage," which first appeared nearly twenty-one years ago. It ran through seven editions, and is now out of print. Playgoers will be glad to learn that Mr. Murray has in the press a fresh volume of reminiscences by the same authors, in which the story of their famous management of the Haymarket Theatre will be examined from a different perspective, and "told with greater freedom."

ANOTHER book also to be published by Mr. Murray owes its existence to Lord Acton's suggestion that the origin and development of certain historical ideas bearing upon the Christian religion might be traced by means of studies of representative men who acted towards them as foster-parents. The work is by Mr. Algernon Cecil, and is called "Six Oxford Thinkers," the representative Oxford thinkers chosen being Gibbon, Newman, Church, Froude, Pater, and Lord Morley—certainly a brilliant and broadly varied selection.

MR. J. C. SNAITH'S new novel, "Amarinta," will be published early this season by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. The coming book is said to be a return to Mr. Snaith's earlier style and to have little in common with "William Jordan, Junior," which last year proved so difficult a puzzle for the critics. Mr. Snaith is one of the few living novelists of whom one may use the word "genius" without absurdity, and a new novel from his pen is sure to create the liveliest interest.

"JIMBO: A FANTASY," is the title of Mr. Algernon Blackwood's coming novel. Like Mr. Snaith, Mr. Blackwood has a gift for analysing and describing the psychological state that lies on the borderland between sanity and insanity. "Jimbo" is a study of the mind of an imaginative child who meets with an accident. During a period of physical unconsciousness the child is held in the grip of a vague fear originally suggested by a foolish nurse. The theme is suited to the author of "Dr. John Silence," and the story is said to be worked out with great power of suggestion. It will be published by Messrs. Macmillan.

SEVERAL Dante books of importance are to be issued this season. Mr. W. Warren Vernon is to be congratulated on the completion of the revised edition of his "Readings in the Divina Commedia," the last instalment of which appeared this week. Mr. Vernon has presented his valuable Dante collection—some 450 volumes, including many scarce works—to the library of the Athenæum Club. A new translation into English verse of the whole of the "Divine Comedy" has been made by Mr. Edward Wilberforce, and will be published shortly by Messrs. Macmillan. Mr. Wilberforce's version of the "Inferno" appeared in 1903, and was well received by Dante scholars, some of whom think it to be the best English metrical version. He has now completed his task by translating the two remaining sections, and the whole work will be issued in a uniform edition. Lastly, the Oxford University Press announces a volume called "The Moral System of Dante's Inferno." Its author, Mr. W. H. V. Reade, believes that there is still an opening for students to modify, or even to revolutionise, some of the common opinions concerning "The Divine Comedy." This is a bold statement, and any attempt to alter our view of Dante's philosophy is sure to come under the hammer of discussion.

IT is said that Lady Warwick is writing her memoirs and that the book will be published as a serial in one of the popular magazines. Like Lady Randolph Churchill, whose example she is following, Lady Warwick should have some interesting reminiscences.

IT was natural that the centenary of the battle of Corunna should revive the old question of the authorship of the ode generally attributed to the Rev. Charles Wolfe—an ode which Byron thought one of the most perfect ever written. In a pamphlet published by Mr. Thatcher of Bristol, "The Writer of 'The Burial of Sir John Moore' Discovered," Mr. R. C. Newick attempts to establish that the famous ode was written, not by the Rev. Charles Wolfe, but by a soldier of the 9th Regiment, named Joseph Wolfe, who was one of the party that actually dug Moore's grave. The poem first appeared in "The Newry Telegraph," in 1817, with the initials C.W., and it is undoubted that Charles Wolfe claimed to be the author. The evidence for the authorship is not as strong as might be wished, and Mr. Newick attempts to refute it partly by the difficulty of believing that Charles Wolfe, who was a lad of seventeen at the time of Moore's death, could have given an account of the burial so full of details, all of which are true to the facts. His other main argument is the account of the composition of the ode by Joseph Wolfe, to be found in the "Memoirs of Sergeant Paul Swanston," published probably in 1850. Mr. Newick has reprinted the passage in which Swanston maintains that Joseph Wolfe is the true author of the poem. He has tested Swanston's work in many of its details relating to the war, and is satisfied that it is substantially accurate. Although Mr. Newick's arguments have some weight, he hardly establishes his position, though he certainly makes out a better case than can be advanced on behalf of other pretenders such as Macintosh. Our verdict is one of "not proven," leaving the present holder in possession.

SURMISES ON THE "IRON MASK." *

One of the minor puzzles of modern history (never very widely considered) is this: What became of Prince James Stuart? James Stuart, alias James de la Cloche, alias Henry de Rohan, was a natural son of Charles II., and the eldest of that promiscuous monarch's children. At the end of 1668 he suddenly disappeared from Europe, and no real trace of him has been found. Monsignor Barnes, a Chamberlain of Honor to the Pope, has had the courage to transform the missing prince into the Man of the Iron Mask.

The story seeks its motive in Charles's scheme of corporate re-union with Rome. That scheme, as we know, had perforce to be abandoned. England had no mind to be Catholicised again; Charles had no mind, as he very candidly confessed, to set forth again upon his travels. Not until he lay a-dying was he formally received into the Catholic Church. In so far, however, as he could be said to hold any religion, Charles was almost unquestionably a Catholic. We may fail to perceive in him those marks of sincerity and deep earnestness which Monsignor Barnes recognises; but we need not proclaim him, with Lingard, a mere cynical dissembler. Secret negotiations with the Pope, secret negotiations with Louis XIV.—begun, discontinued, renewed—were part of the policy whereby he sought to make himself independent of Parliament, and govern as a Papist an England reconverted to Rome. This seems to be the one policy of Charles II. which deserves the name of genuine; and to carry it he relied in some measure on the counsel and help of the son, James Stuart, whose very existence he kept hidden from the world. Still more, as appears, did he rely on this son to prepare the way for his own reception into the Church.

Who, then, was this son? What is our knowledge of him? Many readers, we doubt not, are acquainted with Lord Acton's essay, the "Secret History of Charles II." Published as far back as 1862 in the "Home and Foreign Review," it was recently included in the volume of "Essays on Modern History." It is, in some forty judicial pages, an excellent example of Lord Acton's method—of the way he estimates authorities, weighs up testimony, and arrives at last at the judgment which his editors so happily describe as sword-like. We have compared this study very carefully with Monsignor Barnes's account of James Stuart, or James de la Cloche, and are unpersuaded that the record of 1862 has been materially improved on by that of 1908. Lord Acton, as may be supposed, is for no sensational surmises. He realises that history has not resolved as yet the fate of James Stuart, but finds no reason in history's ignorance for saying that this must, therefore, be the Man in the Iron Mask. His opinion on the Mask he naturally has; and his single, brief, and very definite pronouncement for Mattioli—significant above everything else in its refusal of argument, as if the matter had passed from problem to axiom—will be found in the lecture on "Louis XIV."

In the year 1646, during a visit to Jersey, Charles, though he was barely seventeen, became the father "of the first of the long series of his natural sons." The mother, a young lady of rank some four years older than her lover, was Marguerite Carteret, "the only unmarried daughter of the Seigneur of Trinity." In her thirty-first year Marguerite married Jean la Cloche, son of the Rev. Etienne la Cloche, "her husband always afterwards calling himself 'de la Cloche.'" To Marguerite's son by Charles was given, as we infer, the name of James Stuart.

James seems to have been packed off abroad at a very early age, and, educated in Holland and France, was brought up, says Lord Acton, a Protestant. Even after the Restoration he remained on the Continent unnoticed until, in 1665, Charles fetched him to England. His father's Court was not to the liking of the studious and quiet youth, and the King gave him leave to return. Lord Acton says:—

> "He had made great proficiency in his studies abroad, and he desired to continue them in the Dutch Universities. His father did not know what to do with him in England, and allowed him to go."

Before he left, James received from the King what Monsignor Barnes rightly describes as a "very curious document." It was a certificate in which Charles acknowledged him as "our natural son, Mr. James Stuart," bade him live under another name, "that of De la Cloche du Bourg de Jersey," and commanded him to keep the whole matter secret "until after our death." With this strange passport James returned to Holland to resume his studies, and in February, 1667, Charles "sent him another document, recognising his birth, and directing his successor to give him £500 a year." In July, 1667, James Stuart became a Catholic at Hamburg. He had determined to enter the novitiate of the Jesuits and took up his residence in Rome early in 1668. In the register of the House of Novices of the Jesuits at Rome, the entry concerning him may still be read: "Jacobus de la Cloche ingressus 11 Aprilis, 1668." His age is given as twenty-four, though he could not have been more than twenty-one.

Scarcely had the young prince settled down in Rome when his father was again anxious for his presence at Court. Monsignor Barnes gives the particulars of a long letter, written with his own hand, by Charles to the general of the Jesuits, in the course of which the King—

> "goes on to say that he has long prayed, amid the cares of royalty, that he might find one single person to whom he could safely confide the affairs of his soul without thereby leading the Court to suspect that he was in fact a Catholic."

The son, having providentially joined the Church, was the ideal person for this trust. There were priests in London, but they were well known; the royal novice in Rome was all but a stranger to the Court of St. James's. Towards the middle of October, 1668, Prince James, disguised as a French cavalier and calling himself Henri de Rohan, left Rome and got quickly to England. Here, however, he stayed not more than a fortnight. We have one other letter from Charles, dated November 18th, 1668, which states that:—

> "Mr. de la Cloche, Jesuit, had desired to return to Rome, in order that he might act as ambassador on an exceedingly important and secret matter between the King and the general of the Jesuits."

What this mission was we do not know. James left England on November 18th, and it is pretty clear that he arrived safely in Rome, "because," says Monsignor Barnes, "this letter which he carried is in the Jesuit archives." At this point, nevertheless, we lose sight of him.

> "From that day," says Lord Acton, "he disappears from history; and after his arrival in Rome, in November or December 1668, the name of De la Cloche, by which he was known in the novitiate, figures no more in the books of the society."

Monsignor Barnes adds:—"There is no Father James Stuart known to history, nor does the name of De la Cloche ever appear again."

"We have no other probable record of his life," is the summing-up of Lord Acton; but Monsignor Barnes, with a capital taste for a capital mystery, has devised a record for him, the probability of which shall be judged by the reader. He surmises that the young prince returned to London in January, 1669. This is likely enough; and likely is it that, returning under another borrowed name, he would take refuge "in some friendly house in London until fresh arrangements could be made for him." Here, however, the author seems to quit the path of fair conjecture. He proceeds to invest "Mr. James de la Cloche" with the character of an astrologer. A play called "The Mock Astrologer" was being acted at the King's Theatre, the plot of which was—

> "based upon the assumption of the rôle of an astrologer by a friend of certain lovers whose affairs were going wrong. . . . The only other point in the play which is important for our purpose is that the lover in question, though supposed to have gone to France, was really lying hidden at a friendly house."

This play, on Monsignor Barnes's hypothesis, gives Charles an idea. Why should not James Stuart pose as an astrologer sent by the French Court to Charles, or recommended by Monmouth, who had just come back from France; and why, again—

> "should he not lie hid in London until such time as imaginary letters of introduction could be obtained from France, which he could take to Colbert, posing as a new arrival from that country?"

We are next to suppose, in the working out of this oblique and tenebrous scheme, that James Stuart crosses

* "The Man of the Mask: A Study in the By-ways of History." By Arthur Stapylton Barnes, M.A. Smith, Elder & Co. 10s. 6d. net.

to Paris at the end of January, charged with a letter to Madame (Charles's sister)—

> "asking her to arrange the business of sending him back to England in the character of an astrologer."

Was ever such a rigmarole? It is true that "no such letter has survived"; Monsignor Barnes has merely imagined it. We have, however, a very singular epistle from Louis's minister, Lionne, to Colbert, the Ambassador in England, commending a certain Abbé Pregnani, astrologer, who is—

> "to manage to enter into the amusements and occupations of the King of England, and to use every effort to assist you, as you may direct him, for he has been told nothing whatever here."

In Father Pregnani the joke culminates. Who is he? The French authorities themselves, in the very act of introducing and commending him to Colbert, have not the slightest idea. He is apparently the invention of the "merry" monarch. Says Monsignor Barnes:—

> "The presence of James Stuart in London is apparently being 'covered up' at Charles's request, although the French authorities are still left entirely ignorant who it is for whom they are doing this kindly office, even to the extent of hoodwinking their own ambassador in London."

The Abbé Pregnani, says Monsignor Barnes, was James Stuart.

Whoever he was, the incognisable Abbé made a mess of it. The French began to suspect him, and Lionne suggested his recall. Since Lionne, Colbert, and Louis himself were utterly in the dark concerning Pregnani's identity, their anxiety as to what he was or might be doing in London was not altogether unreasonable; and Monsignor Barnes throws out a hint that he was playing an intriguer's part at Court, and disclosing French secrets of State. His return to France is at last somewhat peremptorily ordered. Early in July, accordingly, he sets out for Calais; and then, like James Stuart at Rome in the previous December, he vanishes from the scene. Nothing more is ever heard of the Abbé Pregnani. What then has happened?

"In this total absence of real evidence"—this, unfortunately is, from first to last, the situation in which the author finds himself—"a hypothesis is the only resource that is open to us." The hypothesis is that Pregnani, setting foot again on French soil, is straightway arrested by order of Louis XIV., and whirled away to the dungeon of Pignerol, where, in the keeping of the celebrated Saint-Mars, he becomes forthwith the Man in the Iron Mask. Is the hypothesis good?

Monsignor Barnes's whole case, it will be seen, is comprised in a series of pure suppositions. He has no choice but to assume every point he seeks to prove. There is nothing whatever to show that the Abbé Pregnani was James Stuart. We fancy, indeed, that the part of the "mock astrologer," compelled to "tip" horses for Monmouth at Newmarket, and to cool his heels at Colbert's, would have been worse than distasteful to the studious and retiring prince. Later it is essential to the système Barnes to show Pregnani or Stuart in the character of a dangerous intriguer, a revealer of the secrets (whatever they may have been) of the French King. Now, were this system sound in all other places, it would here, we are convinced, so far as James Stuart is concerned, fall hopelessly to pieces. The Abbé Pregnani, if he ever existed, may or may not have been a schemer. Prince James Stuart assuredly was none. For this was the one Stuart who, in Lord Acton's words, "preferred the cloister to the steps of his father's throne"; and, in every action we behold him in, he is sincere, simple, single-hearted, and the quintessence of discretion. Then, if Pregnani is Charles's son, why does Charles so meekly send him back to France at the bidding of Lionne? And why, lastly, when the son—his eldest—returns no more, melts, as it were, in the European vague, does not the father clamor to the skies for him? The least honest of English Kings was not an unnatural father. Must he not have raised in all Europe a pother that would sooner or later disturb the ear of Louis? And Louis, not yet exactly the omnipotent, discovering that he had "run in" to Pignerol, no vulgar plotter against himself, but a straightforward and devout young Catholic prince, some twenty-two or twenty-three years of age, the eldest son of his friend and cousin of England—what could he do but return Prince James to his father, with apologies? Monsignor Barnes's reference to missing letters that were possibly destroyed by Louis does not quite satisfy us. If Charles had suddenly and unaccountably lost his eldest son, letters from him about this son must surely have gone to every Court in Europe. The son need not, and probably would not, have been named; but it was imperative on Charles's part to make the inquisition; and, had he done so, it is difficult to believe that the archives of Europe contain not a single record on the subject.

On its merits, Monsignor Barnes's case is unacceptable. Our impression of it, on a very close reading of a book that is highly interesting, is that it is seldom possible, and never remotely probable. It leaves the argument for Mattioli unhurt in the essentials; and our belief remains unshaken that the Italian adventurer still holds the field.

THE MAGYAR ASCENDENCY.*

One rises from Mr. Seton-Watson's gloomy but capable study of racial problems in Hungary with a new perception of the capacity of one's fellow-creatures for collective insanity. It is a careful and accurate history, based almost exclusively on official documents, of the miseries to which the non-Magyar peoples in Hungary have been subjected by the dominant race, at the bidding of an extravagant ideal of national unity and identity. No element of suffering and wrong is lacking, from mere neglect and artificial stagnation to wholesale imprisonment, impoverishment, and bloodshed. The picture which gradually forms itself in the mind as one reads is of a gifted and spirited race deliberately setting itself to use the advantages of numbers, wealth, and aristocratic tradition in order to make life unendurable to a variety of less fortunate races, whose many talents and graces do not happen to include the indispensable hardness which makes a people too formidable for persecution.

It is a record of waste. The futile struggle to Magyarise Slovaks and Roumanians has injured the ruling and the subject races in almost equal degrees. It has made of Hungarian politics nothing but a barren struggle of race against race, delayed among the rulers the growth of any concern for humanitarian aims, kept the downtrodden races backward, ignorant, and poor, and armed the party of ascendency with an impenetrable pride, that hardly cares to justify its legal supremacy by a real superiority. For the most desolating aspect of the whole process is that one fails to detect in Magyar culture and Magyar political ideals any native element so rare and valuable as to justify its claim to impose itself upon these alien races. In saying this we are far from joining the detractors of an interesting and, in some respects, attractive race. The Magyars have a great if chequered past, and they exhibit to-day some of the characteristic virtues of every ruling race. But their language, rich though it is, is not the vehicle of a world-literature, and still less is it a possible medium for science or trade. Its forcible imposition on the whole population of Hungary would mean the creation of a linguistic island in central Europe, isolated and impenetrable. So little is it true that the Magyars are naturally superior to the subject-races, that their annals would be barren indeed were it not for the genius which they have absorbed and appropriated from the despised helots whom they govern. Some of the greatest personalities in their history, from Mathias Corvinus to the great Kossuth himself, were non-Magyars. Their foremost poet, Petöfi, was, like Kossuth, a Slovak, and the folk-music which we are pleased to call Hungarian is either gipsy or Slavonic. European civilisation, in short, has nothing to gain and much to lose from the success of Magyar levelling, and it would mean, ere it could at last succeed, generations of massive and complicated suffering.

Mr. Seton-Watson had in writing this book a two-fold object—to appeal to English opinion against the intolerance of the Magyar ascendency, and to add to our scanty knowledge of the Slovaks, a race whose very name is barely familiar to the average educated Englishman. The Magyars make war with complete impartiality on all the subject-races of their kingdom, but the Slovaks are for several reasons entitled to special commiseration. They are even poorer than the Roumanians and the Serbs; they have over the border no independent branch of their race to aid them, though the Czechs, to whom they are nearly allied, have often played the part of elder brothers. Moreover, they possess no national Church, a fact which exposes Catholics and Lutherans alike to the Magyarising efforts of the superior clergy of both these communions. Their psychology is clearly that of all the purely Slav races. They are sensitive and imaginative, by turns lively and melancholy, with little talent for organisation and affairs, capable of producing leaders who are spirited champions rather than competent strategists, but liable in the mass to a passivity which makes them the natural prey of a more grasping and practical people. Thanks to the Magyars the development of their natural talents has been thwarted at every turn, but the three chapters contributed by Slovak scholars on Slovak poetry, art and music, enriched as they are with admirable illustrations in color, vindicate their claim to be, on the aesthetic side, one of the most gifted branches of the Slav race.

Politically, the history of the Slovaks has been that of all the non-Magyar races in Hungary. Mr. Seton-Watson has no difficulty in showing that the famous Law of the Nationalities, which embodied the tolerant ideals of Deak, has never been observed either in letter or spirit. From the days of Kossuth downwards the Magyars have never been able to conceive of a Hungarian patriotism larger and broader than their Magyar racial pride. The State in their hands has become nothing but a machine for crushing out the racial self-consciousness of a helot population. To-day, after a long process of assimilation and absorption, the Magyars and their Magyarised satellites are in Hungary proper (excluding Croatia) a bare majority (51·4 per cent.), and, despite all their efforts, there is still a solid 40 per cent. of the population which is totally ignorant of the Magyar language. In spite of all the liberal provisions of Deak's legislation, Magyar, even in counties where 90 per cent. of the population are ignorant of it, has become the exclusive language of the courts and the local administration. It is also, save in some Kindergartens, the exclusive language of all State education, however elementary, and a constant warfare is waged, with only too much success, to crush the voluntary schools and to capture churches which the poorer non-Magyar races endeavor to maintain. The Slovaks, for example, who once had three gymnasia, have seen them all closed without redress, and are now quite without vernacular secondary education. It is not surprising to learn that 48 per cent. of the whole population of Hungary is still illiterate, that 24 per cent. of the children of school age attend no school, and that in fifty communes there are no schools at all, while in others teachers who know only Magyar wrestle with children who know not a word of a language which is probably the most difficult of all European tongues.

The intrigue and spoliation by which every effort of the Slovaks to combine for educational purposes have been thwarted are exposed in this book with an almost superfluous fulness of documentary evidence. One realises the full savagery of this linguistic war when one learns that the Municipality of Budapest prohibits the use of any language but Magyar on tombstones. The methods by which this tyrannous hegemony is retained are, perhaps, more familiar. The existing franchise is based on a high property or tax qualification. Only 6 per cent. of the whole population enjoys the vote, and of the electors 59 per cent. are owners of over eight acres of land. On this basis, it is not surprising that the poorer non-Magyars, numbering over 48 per cent. of the population, return only twenty-five deputies to a parliament of 493 members. There is in this book an elaborate apparatus of proof, which shows how the effect of this franchise is supplemented by governmental pressure and trickery. Voting is oral and public, the polling booths are few and remote, they are beset by armed troops, and when at last a Slovak or Roumanian voter is called upon to give his vote in the Magyar language, it is liable to be annulled on the plea that he has mispronounced a word, or that his own name is (probably wilfully) misspelt in the register. The arrest of a candidate is a common method of preventing his success, and the immunity of deputies is constantly suspended. A continual guerilla warfare is waged before Magyar judges and Magyar juries against the deputies, editors, and local leaders of the subject races. No fewer than 938 non-Magyars have suffered for political offences between 1886 and 1908, and, with few exceptions, the charge against them all was based on some purely verbal offence. "Incitement against the Magyar nationality" is the usual formula, and it covers almost any criticism of the methods of the ruling race, almost any protest against an act of injustice.

Of the future Mr. Seton-Watson writes with temperate hope. The process of Magyarisation is not succeeding, and sooner or later Hungary must follow Austria by conceding universal suffrage. He assumes that Francis Joseph will not sanction Count Andrassy's Bill—a scheme which retains public voting, and while it does in name concede a vote to everyone, cancels this concession by a "fancy" table of values, in which the illiterate peasant is allowed, in effect, one vote, and the middle-class landlord or proprietor no less than thirty. That is not a hope on which we should care to stake much, though undoubtedly Vienna no longer positively wishes to support the Magyar hegemony. The real security for the ultimate triumph of the subject races is that the Magyar proletariat itself shares their grievances against the ruling class. The Magyar peasantry has also been excluded from politics, deprived of education, and exploited by the feudal Magyar noble and his ally the Jewish usurer. The emigration statistics mark his despair, and the growth of Agrarian Socialism tells of his awakening. The Socialists suffer no less than the nationalities from the oppression of the most illiberal caste in Europe—their trade unions are suppressed as soon as they are formed, and in one year two hundred of their meetings were "proclaimed." Indeed, it becomes a nice question how far the motive of the Magyar "garrison" is really mere racial intolerance and how far under this pretence it disguises a determination to maintain its economic position against the Slav peasantry. Under any extended suffrage, the alliance of Socialists and non-Magyars, if their leaders show any tactical skill, must mean the end of this narrow caste rule.

Mr. Seton-Watson has performed his task in a spirit at once scholarly and judicial. He has spared no pains to master the languages of Hungary, its teeming controversial literature, and, above all, its official documents. He has carried his minute historical researches even into the newspaper files of the years before 1848. He writes in a restrained and temperate style, and, though his aim is to expose gross tyranny, he has never allowed a just anger to lead him into exaggeration or to obscure his calm handling of figures and facts. Indeed, his case would not be weakened if the very little in it which is based on sources other than public records and official data were to be omitted. His book will at once take rank as the standard authority on this immensely important subject—for, as he insists, it is probable that the Balkan question will be solved rather in Budapest and Agram than in Sofia and Belgrade. A frivolous or unleisured reader will prefer the slighter books of hurried travellers, but the serious student will have nothing but gratitude for its fulness, its objectivity, and its scrupulous avoidance of rhetoric.

AN UNEQUAL SATIRIST.*

Mr. Owen Seaman will not expect us to like the political views of one who, if we understand him aright, accounts the opponents of Lord Milner as > "The graceless sort that mix

> Their gratitude with mud and bricks."

With this curious blend we do not remember to have made acquaintance, nor have we supposed any gratitude to be latent under the missiles, if they be missiles, which Mr. Seaman names. With unwrung withers we reflect that obscurity of thought is not the best equipment for a satirist. Yet we own that as a satirist Mr. Seaman has an advantage over his brothers in the Liberal camp. He can flick the weaknesses of his countrymen with no fear that he will be dubbed unpatriotic, or charged with fouling his own nest. In criticism the advantage is with a Liberal who will allow no political prejudice to pass through the gates of literature. And we can meet Mr. Seaman on common ground when he tells us how little patriotism there is in those who

> "pipe a patriot tune > Mafficking round a monument," or how little it helps the country

> "that weekly half a million men
> (Who never actually play'd the game),
> Hustling like cattle herded in a pen,
> Look on and shout
> While two-and-twenty hirelings hack a ball about," or how little worth is the man who thinks that when he has invited Heaven to "save the king" he has done his share. We can have no quarrel with the sentiment, though we may feel that no man with any poetry in him could have written such a line as that which stands above in brackets.

All but two of those pieces have already appeared and been read in "Punch." Some of them should not have been revived, for when many stand together the reader is conscious of much tenuity in the thought and not a few defects in the expression. We remember other volumes of a like source, and are not minded to put this on the same shelf. Mr. Seaman is, perhaps, at his best in satirising the weaknesses of the wealthier classes, and happier in his treatment of women than of men. We all know the lady who is given up to Bridge, but we could not all describe her as well as Mr. Seaman.

> "Your face a little flush'd with red,
> Your eyes, perhaps, a thought too keen,
> Alert to seize the subtlest clues,
> Bold in assault, a stout defender—
> If you could only bear to lose,
> You might be almost any gender."

In the last touch Mr. Seaman shows why men to whom the game is a relaxation are loath to join in a cock-and-hen party, but the weakness is not confined to one sex. Nor is it clear that it is only a pushing widow who will pay for a paragraph announcing that she is to give "a little dinner for the Countess of ——'s dance," but in attacking Mrs. Ponsonby de Tompkyns Mr. Seaman prefers to pass the husband by.

A few of these pieces are parodies. Mr. Seaman is severe on Mr. Swinburne for treating such words as "livelier" and "satiate" as dissyllables. Why should he not? Not only do later poets, such as Tennyson, speak of a "livelier iris," where there are but two syllables to count in the word, but the sterner masters of an earlier time were of the same mind. Perhaps Mr. Seaman never reads Dryden. Dare we hint that we suspect Mr. Seaman of a pronunciation which we have been taught not to consider the best? Must we confess that we were bred in the old Whig tradition of speech, and that if in our boyhood we had given to the last letters of "satiate" the same value as to the last letters of "palliate" we should have suffered accordingly. Mr. Swinburne knows well what he is doing, and he could retort upon Mr. Seaman, who rhymes "ate" with "plate," a touch of Cokayne. Nay, Mr. Seaman, as the gander, rejects the sauce which he has made for his goose. How many syllables does he make of his last word but one in the line:—

> "I but rend the neighbouring air"?

What if Mr. Swinburne had followed Mr. Seaman in making but four syllables of "Samminiato"? Mr. Seaman's parody on the Poet Laureate is on surer ground, and may even, like some of the "Rejected Addresses," have the good fortune to outlive the lines which suggested it.

We do not like Mr. Seaman's politics, but, though we are going to quarrel with one of his political pieces, our quarrel will not be on political grounds. If we deal seriously with it, we have full excuse in the fact that here his touch loses its lightness. He is very angry with Dr. Macnamara for asking "whether a couple of hundred of very narrow-minded and entirely antediluvian country gentlemen . . . . were to stand in the way of the expressed wish of the people," indeed, so angry as not to see that the speaker chose his number and did not mean the whole House of Lords:—

> "My lords, I note your independent air
> Of men with none to say them Yea or Nay,
> Since no elector's favour sent you there,
> And no man's whim can pluck you thence away;
> Nothing to gain or lose!
> This makes you sadly prone to honest views."

Now, let us assume that Mr. Seaman's facts are correct, that no noble lord has anything to gain by legislation which favors the landlord, or to lose by legislation of another kind, that no noble lord has any shares in, much less the complete ownership of, a brewery. The satirist has a right to ask us to make this or any other assumption, if there be one, more at variance with the facts. We have a right, in return, to demand that his presentment of the facts as he assumes them shall be humorous or witty, or in some way amusing. Does not Mr. Seaman see that these lines of his are neither witty nor humorous, and that even the poor little touch of sarcasm in the adverb of the last line does not redeem them from the charge of brutal realism? That charge could be repelled if there were any grace of style, but we fail to see any. What was written in haste and in wrath might pass in a periodical, but should not be revived.

Mr. Seaman has many tags from other poets, of which some bear the marks of quotation, and some do not. We see no reason for the difference. To a very familiar phrase of Wordsworth, which should not have been borrowed at all, or, if borrowed, should at least have owned its author, Mr. Seaman adds lines which, though addressed to another, too consciously imply that his own advancing years

> "give the sense that solves
> What is of worth, and what,
> Upon the other hand, is not."

We hope that in making his next selection Mr. Seaman will show that he has attained to this sense. If he will give us only his best, we shall be less grudging in our praise. At present we have no choice but to call him an unequal satirist.

TCHEKHOFF'S STORIES.*

Five years ago, under the title of "The Black Monk," Mr. Long gave us an excellent selection of Tchekhoff's "Tales," and it does not surprise us to hear that while "since then Tchekhoff has remained a mere name in England," the English translation circulated chiefly in Japan! It is the fashion of English reviewers to talk unmeaningly when they are brought in contact with foreign masterpieces. Of Tchekhoff's incomparable art a journalistic critic writes: "They photograph the uncouth, barbaric, even childish emotions of Slavonic semi-civilisation. Crude would be a just word for the stories . . . inchoate and incomprehensible." Alas! the reverse is true. It is painfully evident that such crude criticism of a great artist, whose stories, as Prince Kropotkin tells us, have circulated by millions of copies among his countrymen, and "in numberless translations on the Continent, including a complete edition in German"—such blank and dead indifference on our part is painful evidence, we repeat, of our state of æsthetic barbarism. There is nothing difficult in Tchekhoff's art; his whole picture of Russian life stands before us marvellously clear, visualised unerringly and spiritually clairvoyant. For objective truth, firmness of drawing, and clearness of detail, Tchekhoff is not surpassed by Maupassant, and he is a greater master of the short story than England can boast. Yet his name is quite unknown in England, and for this we can find no explanation but our poverty in emotional sympathy. The gulf between the audience and any masterpiece of art may, of course, be painfully apparent. In the case of Whistler and his English audience, for example, it was evident that the average eye was not able to see, literally to see, his delicate tones and poetic harmonies. His pictures actually appeared to the uneducated eye as grey smudges of paint, mere daubs of drab or black. And just as people have to be trained to use their eyes, so it is necessary for them to train their minds and enlarge their human sympathies. The geologist, the antiquarian, and the farmer gazing at a landscape will each see totally different things in it, and the poet and the artist different things also. Similarly the mental outlook of people seems to fix itself and specialise on certain limited lines, according to character, occupation, and habit. Thus we see developed a mind which instinctively guards itself against art or literature that tends to weaken or break up its ideas and prepossessions. Whether our preoccupation with practical aspects, or our disuse of emotional expression, or mere puritanic woodenness be at the root of our state of æsthetic irresponsiveness we do not know, but it is very striking that the more humanly deep and the finer the shades of psychological truth presented by a piece of literature, the less does the modern Englishman seem to grasp it.

Tchekhoff's power of diving beneath the dull or confusing surface of life and laying bare the spot which holds its secret is well shown in the provincial sketch, "On Trial." An elderly peasant, Kharlamoff, a man with an apathetic hairy face, is being tried at the sessions on the charge of wife murder. He comes into the dock, guarded by a little insignificant soldier, who stumbles unexpectedly and half drops his rifle. The presiding judge, the assistant procurator, and the defending advocate chosen by the court, are all dull, listless, and bored. Four cases have already been hurried through and one postponed. The calm monotony and tedium of the legal atmosphere are all pervading. "The dark windows, the walls, the secretary's voice, the procurator's pose—all were soaked with official indifference, and exhaled a chill. . . . The narcotised peasant did not understand that his judges were as used to the dramas and tragedies of life as hospital doctors are to death, and it was just in this mechanical impartiality that lay the terror, the hopelessness of his case. For if, instead of sitting still, he had risen and begun to implore, to shed tears for mercy, to repent bitterly, to die of despair—all would have fallen as vainly upon numbed nerves and custom as waves upon a rock." The case against the prisoner is black. The witnesses, two peasant women, five men, and the detective, all fatigued with walking and waiting in the witnesses' room, agree that Kharlamoff lived with his wife "well," and beat her only when he was drunk. But when his wife was found in the shed attached to her cabin, with her skull beaten in and a hatchet lying near in a pool of blood, Kharlamoff had disappeared. They searched for him everywhere in vain, and two days later he turned up, pale, trembling, and tattered all over. Kharlamoff's explanation is that he has run away because he was afraid, and thought he might be accused. He has a spot of blood on his caftan, which he swears he got three days previously, when he helped Penkoff to bleed his horse. But Penkoff fails to remember that Kharlamoff was present then. This prisoner then denies that the hatchet found beside the dead woman is his, and declares that he possesses no hatchet. He has lost it.

> "That is not my hatchet," said the accused.
> "Whose, then?"
> "I do not know. . . . I had no hatchet."
> "No peasant can carry on his business without a hatchet. Your neighbor, Ivan Tiemofeitch, who mended the sledge with you, swears that the hatchet is yours. . . ."
> "I know nothing . . only this, that I swear before God"—Kharlamoff extended his hand and opened wide his fingers—"I swear before my true Creator . . . I cannot even remember when I last had a hatchet. I once had one like that, only a little smaller, but my son Proshka lost it. About two years before he was taken as a soldier he went to cut wood—he went playing with the children and lost it. . ."
> "That will do. Sit down!"
> The persistent distrust and unwillingness of all to listen at last irritated and enraged Kharlamoff. He blinked his eyes furiously, and on his cheek-bones appeared two bright red spots.
> "Before the eyes of God!" he exclaimed, stretching out his hand. "If you do not believe me, then ask my son, Proshka!" He spoke in a rough voice, and turned suddenly to the little soldier who guarded him. "Proshka, where is the hatchet? Where is the hatchet?"
> It was a terrible moment. All in court, it seemed, sank into their seats and dwindled to points. . . Through every head like lightning flashed one and the same terrible thought, and not one out of all of them dared to look at the soldier's face. Each did his best to discredit his own ears, to cherish the delusion that he had not heard aright.
> "Prisoner, you are not allowed to speak to the guard!" said the President hastily.
> No one saw the soldier's face, and terror flew through the court unseen. The usher rose from his bench, and on tiptoes, swinging his arms, went out of the hall. In half a minute came the sound of dull footfalls, and such noises as are heard when sentries are relieved.
> All raised their heads, and, trying to look as if nothing uncommon had happened, continued their work.

This is great art; but the same cultivated people who would eagerly devour, daily, any sensational newspaper account of such a scene, may pass Tchekhoff by as "crude," failing to see that each artistic stroke is unerring, and reveals the exact human import of what we are witnessing. In life few of us penetrate beneath the appearances of things, and when we do we grow speedily confused, at the mercy of dimly-seen forces, realising their drift without clear analysis or mental perspective. The true artist comes to our rescue, and recreates the scene so that we see round it and through it and into it, without bias or exaggeration. Tchekhoff's power of painting the thin veils of our fleeting emotional moods and relating them to past or present episodes of life is so exquisitely fine that to a superficial taste his stories may appear "trival" or "pointless." A good example is offered by "The Kiss," a story in which the nervous, diffident and timid little officer, Captain Raibovitch, is the recipient of a kiss in a dark room from an unknown lady who has mistaken him for her lover. "Only a kiss, and nothing else happens," the commonplace reader will exclaim. But in fact everything happens. The whole character of the man and the exact import of his life is flashed upon us by the contrast Tchekhoff draws between the two moods of Raibovitch, the first when he falls in love with and dreams of the unknown woman, the second when he realises his hope has fled, and his life seems again thin and colorless and wretched. But so delicately drawn are these emotions that to people who have no soul they will seem what the paintings of Whistler appeared to the British public. Tchekhoff's psychological range is, indeed, extraordinary. Whether, as in "Verotchka," he is painting the confusion of a man who is too dried up to love a woman; or, as in "The Runaway," the nervous terror of a peasant boy who is scared by night sounds in a hospital; or, as in "Women," the outrage against nature of the peasants' loveless marriages breeding hideous crime; or, as in "The Reed," the pessimism of old men who have had their day; or, as in "The Princess," the pure selfishness of a worldly woman who lives for her vanity; or, as in "The Privy Councillor," the delicious comedy of a household, a pure piece of genre painting—whatever he selects for treatment Tchekhoff places against the ironical background of nature's indifference and life's transitoriness. The frame of Tchekhoff's pictures is small, but what astonishing depths of human meaning are conveyed in the depths of his backgrounds. And that is where the Russian writers beat the English hollow—in placing the individual figure in relation to the vast scheme of life around us. It is almost a special faculty they possess. No art could be less trivial than Tchekhoff's, for he shows us the incessant change and movement of life set against the eternal irony of our human aims.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

THE Appendix added to the new edition of the third volume of Mr. Palgrave's valuable "Dictionary of Political Economy" (Macmillan, 21s. net) includes a number of new articles of considerable importance, written in nearly all cases by men of special knowledge and bringing facts and figures up to date. But it is hardly possible for such a treatment to be other than a provisional stop-gap. Since the publication of the main body of the work, so large an amount of new industrial and other economic material has come into the forefront of affairs as to demand a far larger space than is accorded here to bring their discussion into line with the plan of such a Dictionary. The rigid economy of space has compelled some issues of first-rate importance to politicians and practical economists to be somewhat slighted. This is the case, for instance, with old age pensions, the food supply of the United Kingdom, and trade unions. In the last named short article a quite disproportionate place is given to schemes of profit-sharing which do not properly belong to the topic. No article brings up to date the movement of modern capitalism towards trusts and other forms of business combination. On the other hand, we find extremely useful accounts of

"As I turn over the leaves and re-read the passages I have marked, I utterly despair of conveying within my appointed limits any inkling of the author's fertility of thought and illustration."—Mr. William Archer, in Morning Leader.

"The insight and wit with which this inquiry is carried out are remarkable as a deep-going criticism of modern science and philosophy, and must be carefully studied to be fully appreciated."—Mr. G. R. S. Mead, in Theosophical Review.

"A spacious mansion of delight. . . 'The New Word' is a book of rare enchantment, with something of the freshness of the world's youth about it. . . To him the infallible church of the Materialists is not substantially different from the infallible church of the Sacerdotalists."—Mr. Harry Jones, in Daily Chronicle.

"Almost every page is so full of suggestion that he almost lays himself open to the charge of 'Sowing with the sack.' It is a brilliant criticism of life and science and philosophy, at once scholarly and humorous. His chapters on 'The Story of Creation' are wonderfully clever and deliciously funny. He is a philologist, and makes merry over the jargon of new scientific terms."—Mr. A. E. Fletcher, in The Clarion.

"It is impossible to do Mr. Upward any justice by quoting him, unless we quote nearly the whole of his book, because it all hangs together, and it is all good. Neither is it possible to do him justice, but quite the opposite, by attempting to explain him. . . 'The New Word' is a book to add to the small store by the side of your bed. It is full of Scholarship and wit, and full of Hope."—Westminster Gazette.

HENRY OF NAVARRE.

A Romance by MAY WYNNE.

Author of "Maid of Brittany," &c. Frontispiece by H. M. BROCK. 6s.

The Story of Mr. William Devereux's Play, "Henry of Navarre," which is now being performed with unparalleled success at the New Theatre by Miss Julia Neilson and Mr. Fred Terry. "Henry of Navarre" bids fair to rival in success, both as book and play, the famous "Scarlet Pimpernel." On the occasion of the first performance of "Henry of Navarre" it was received with unbounded enthusiasm, there being no less than thirty-eight calls in the course of the performance.

HENRY OF NAVARRE.

First Large Edition Exhausted.
Second Edition Now at Press.

A stirring and dramatic story, the scene of which is laid in Paris during the eventful month of August, 1572, on the eve of the marriage of Marguerite de Valois to Henry of Navarre, which was followed by the Massacre of St. Bartholomew. As befits the times, the plot moves rapidly; the dialogue is strikingly good, and the pages are filled with intrigue, adventure, violence, and the love of woman.

HENRY OF NAVARRE.

A Romance by MAY WYNNE. With Frontispiece by H. M. BROCK.

BRANDED.

By GERALD BISS, Author of "The Dupe," &c. 6s.

The Standard says:—"Mr. Gerald Biss is making a genuine reputation as a writer of clean, wholesome, and stimulating sensational stories. He has not, it is true come to the front with any great flourish of trumpets, but he has been always content to let his novels advance on their own merits in public esteem, and now it seems to be certain that he will become one of the favoured half-dozen 'masters of mystery' whose books inevitably command a hearing and a success. Meanwhile, it would be a pity to confuse Mr. Biss with any of his contemporaries in the ranks of popular authors. He is never imitative, and, like another great pathetic figure in the public eye, he treads the furrows alone. He also possesses a deliciously natural style of his own, and his craftsmanship is occasionally almost brilliant, for he reverses the ordinary method of telling a story of sensation, and never scruples to let his public (but not his characters) know precisely as much about a mystery as he does himself."

A BREEZY AND UNCONVENTIONAL WORK.

Mrs. PENROSE'S PHILOSOPHER.

By HAROLD SIMPSON. 6s.

This book will appeal to all lovers of sound, healthy fiction. It is a charming love story, charmingly told. It is healthy without being affected. The author has grace and delicacy of touch. He can deal with nature without either botanising or being blatant. The people of whom he writes are real. They convince us. The Philosopher is a delightful character, and so is Mrs. Penrose—the woman who seemed to "change her moods as easily as her clothes." The book has truth, passion, and power, and there are no better things than these in fiction.

A MILLION A MINUTE.

A MAID OF HONOUR.

By ROBERT AITKEN, Author of "The Golden Horseshoe." 6s.

The author may be enrolled on the list of this century's group of young writers who are rapidly pushing their way to the front. Mr. Aitken's last romance, "The Golden Horseshoe," was extraordinarily successful both in this country and America, and the publishers confidently assure readers of "A Maid of Honour" that (though the phrase is hackneyed) they will not lay the book down until the last page is reached if they wish to learn how a fortune may be lost or won at the rate of "a million a minute."

Ask your Bookseller to show you a copy of A KNOWING DOG, written by E. HARCOURT BURRAGE, with delightful Drawings by "Yorick," and attractively got up. It forms an Ideal Gift-Book for all Dog Lovers, young and old. Price 2s. 6d. net.

GREENING & Co. Ltd., 91, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

the recent development of modern economic teaching and of economic libraries, while the articles which treat of finance and of official statistics are nearly always excellent. The same verdict may be pronounced upon several articles dealing with new controversial issues. The article on Socialism is a good and fair interpretation of the different currents in the movement, while no possible complaint can be made of the statement of the Tariff Reform case, except that a balancing article on the recent defence of Free Trade might, with advantage, have been added. A very compact and serviceable article on the income tax might, had space permitted, have been fortified by an adequate reference to the recent experience of foreign nations in developing this instrument of taxation. In one or two instances, however, important subjects have been entrusted to strong partisans who have abused the opportunity which has been afforded them. A notorious example is afforded in the article upon "Municipal and Government Trading" by a writer with the familiar initial "A." Nor is any purpose served by appending to a brief abstract of the taxing policy of the late Henry George the comment, "The danger of these operations has become more apparent as time goes on." But these, after all, are small blemishes in a large task performed with great industry, skill, and impartiality. The biographical portion of the work has been greatly strengthened, not only by short accounts of the work of writers who have died since the third volume was completed, but also by the addition of notices of a number of less known and "unorthodox" economists who had hitherto failed to obtain recognition.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning. Jan. 8.	Price Friday morning, Jan. 15.
Consols 2½ per cent.	83 5/16	... 83½
German 3 per cent.	84½	... 84½
Russian 5 per cent.	96 7/8	... 97 1/8
Erie Common	33¼	... 31¼
Union Pacific	185	... 182⅝
Rand Mines	7 5/32	... 7 5/16

After the failure of the Bank to secure gold in the open market on Monday shrewd people in the City began to expect a rise in the Bank Rate, and the price of money and discounts began to appreciate. Others argued that there was no necessity to do anything until after the flotation of the Russian loan, when plenty of gold would be available. The directors, however, prudently refused to leave their reserve to chance, and took the very proper step of raising the rate to 3 per cent. If this proves insufficient another turn of the screw may be necessary; but in that case the higher rate would certainly be of only short duration. In spite of this change in the money outlook, there has been quite a scramble to underwrite the English portion of the Russian loan, and the Baring firm must have done very well out of it. No doubt the handsome profits which the Russian Government always gives its bankers explains the enthusiasm with which its loans are received in Paris and London. But only a small amount will be taken here. English investors have never taken to Russian Government issues, and those who have tried participation in Russian industrials have been badly bitten.

Effect of Bank Rate on Stock Markets.

Cheap money has more effect upon trade than upon investment. It is probably the best cure for trade depression, because it encourages enterprise. On the Stock Exchange it does no doubt encourage speculation. But on the other hand it stimulates capital issues which naturally and inevitably depress the prices of existing stocks. Since the end of May we have had a 2½ per cent. Bank Rate; but capital issues have been on an unprecedented scale. Consequently, with the exception of the American market and Kaffirs, there has been no strong upward movement in Stock Exchange values. In Throgmorton Street the rise of the Bank Rate does not seem to be regarded with much apprehension.

City Views of Politics and Newspapers.

The City is never in love with politics, and just now it is rather nervous and irritable. On the one hand there is Mr. Wyndham, as spokesman of the Tariff Reform League, pouring contempt upon bankers and brokers and shipowners, and telling the country that it must decide between their interests and those of the producers. This is not very nice for London, which depends principally for its prosperity and existence upon its docks and banks and exchanges. Then, on the other hand, there is Mr. Lloyd-George, whose references to robbing henroosts and fleecing millionaires have been rather upsetting. The power of the City is enormous, and its individuals often exert themselves with effect in a given direction. But there is very little collective action. Anyone who tries to push himself forward to attract public attention becomes unpopular; though there are one or two city worthies, like the Lord Mayor and the Governor of the Bank of England and Lord Rothschild, from whom on fitting occasions speeches are expected. There has recently been some emigration from the "Daily Mail" offices to the "Times." A good deal of curiosity is felt just now as to the finances of our big newspaper trusts.

The Year 1908 in the United States.

As one of the favorite questions put to Free Traders since Fiscal Reform came upon the scene has been: "Why is America so prosperous?" I have been looking, with curiosity, at the excellent financial and commercial supplements of American newspapers which were issued at the beginning of the New Year. Here is an extract from the authoritative report of the New York "Journal of Commerce" on the Fall River cotton industry: "The year has seen the sliding scale of wages put to a severe test through the reduction of 17·94 per cent. in May and its acceptance by the operatives." A little lower down on the same page one reads that in North Carolina "most of the manufactories—that is, cotton and lumber mills—have been closed down for a large part of the year, due to the effects of the panic." Happily, most of them have recently resumed operations. On the same page, again, one reads that the price of blankets made of wool is "too high for consumers of moderate means," and that consequently cotton blankets are in request. Under the heading "Disastrous Carpet Wool Year," the New York "Journal" observes: "If the year 1907 was disastrous to all engaged in the carpet wool trade, 1908 was doubly so." People here who want to know what bad trade and unemployment are, should have lived during the last fifteen months in the United States.

Diary of the Week.

Cabinet Councils begin next week, but there is as yet no sign of a united decision on the question of the House of Lords. The speeches of Mr. Haldane and of Lord Crewe indicate a more advanced attitude than that of Mr. Churchill, both treating the question as at least the "dominating" debating issue. Speaking at Brierley Hill, Lord Crewe insisted that the question was whether the country wished to maintain its representative institutions, and that if a Conservative minority could act with the House of Lords so as to stop constitutional progress, the Liberal Party "could not go on." But with it would go Conservatism also, and there would be an end of the party system. Mr. Haldane, delivering at Lancaster a speech that the "Times," under its new management, reports to the extent of fourteen lines, declared that the Lords acted as a "barrier in the highway," and proposed three or four year Parliaments as a means of strengthening the unity between the mind of the nation and that of the House of Commons. He preferred this solution to that of the Referendum, which would, he feared, destroy the autonomy of the popular Chamber. The Labor Party, speaking through its Chairman, Mr. Henderson, appear willing to act strongly with the Government against the Lords, but they will certainly not act alone if the campaign is postponed till next year. Liberal feeling appears to be divided, and the Government is likely to commit itself to a waiting policy, apparently under the impression that the Lords will throw out the Budget—an almost unthinkable contingency

On this question of the Lords and the Budget, it is, we think, vital that the constitutional position should not be given away. The Prime Minister, and, we believe, every Cabinet Minister who has spoken on the point, have declared that the Lords cannot be allowed to dictate the time or the subject of dissolution. Unfortunately Mr. Churchill has suggested an exception in the case of a rejection of this year's Budget. We cannot think that such a view will be entertained for a single moment. The rejection of the Budget, if our "Junkers" dared so to violate the constitution of the land, would, of course, set the fiery cross going. But it is incredible that the Government would dissolve. Their first business would be to re-pass the Budget, line for line, comma for comma, through the Commons, and send it up again without an hour's delay. If the Lords again rejected it, the whole party would call on the Prime Minister to ask of the King the creation of a sufficient number of life peers to drown the hostile majority. But that we should dissolve without an effort to assert the historic power of the Commons over finance is unthinkable. If Gladstone could force the repeal of the paper duties on the Lords, after a single rejection, we can surely defeat an attempt to destroy the whole financial provision of the year. When the Government had driven the Budget through the Lords, they would, of course, appeal to the country, with the sure prospect of a verdict for sweeping the peers away. But not an hour before.

On this matter, the "British Weekly" writes with much point and vigor. It says:—

> Mr. Winston Churchill is quite right when he argues that the House of Lords have no right to force a Dissolution when they please. As we pointed out the other week, the "Spectator" of Hutton and Townsend maintained this as a fundamental article in the creed of liberty. But until quite recently nobody suggested that they had the power to force a Dissolution on the Budget; and now the Government have apparently been delivered into the hands of the enemy by Mr. Churchill's admission that they have the right, that they may use the right, and that they will be beaten if they use the right. We say there is no right.

In the absence of Mr. Balfour at Biarritz, the zealots who compose the fighting wing of the Protectionist Party have completed their plans for driving out the remnant of the Free Food Section and turning every Conservative candidate for the next election into a pledged supporter of Tariff Reform. This movement, which reveals the fact that, so far from capturing the country, the Tariff Reformers have not even converted the Conservative Party, was set on foot on Monday by the "Morning Post," acting as the organ of the "Confederates." The ground was that Mr. Balfour might have to form a Government after the next General Election with a majority of only thirty, and that, if this included the sixteen "Free-fooders" or "doubtfuls" now in Parliament, these gentlemen would vote against and destroy a Protectionist Budget. This seems a rather naïve way of suggesting that a Protectionist minority would have the right to propose a Protective tariff in face of an actual Free Trade majority. In any case, the Free-fooders and the wobblers have now received public notice to quit. The "Post" practically assumes the connivance of Mr. Hughes, the principal agent of the Conservative Party, who is called upon to falsify Mr. Balfour's refusal to make fiscal views a test of membership of the party.

The publication of the "Post's" "black list," which classifies eleven members as opponents of Protection and six as doubtful, has apparently broken the resistance of two members, Mr. Younger and Sir H. S. King, while in the case of a third, Mr. Bowles the younger, member for Norwood, the local Conservative Council have carried an adverse vote. It appears that a similar assault is to be made on Lord Robert Cecil, in spite of his close relationship to Mr. Balfour, and the great ability of his contribution to the work of opposition in Parliament. The Conservative Central Office, according to the Parliamentary correspondent of the "Times," declines to identify itself with the tactics of the "Confederates," but declares that it will only support candidates accepting Mr. Balfour's Birmingham definition of Tariff Reform. The Unionist Free Trade Club have resolved to defend the Free-fooders against electoral attack. But why do they not definitely ask Mr. Balfour whether in future all Conservatives must be Protectionists, and get from him an answer that can be published?

We observe that a "representative meeting" is to be held in the City, with the ostensible view of strengthening the hands of the Prime Minister in maintaining his recent declaration on the character of the two-Power standard. We hope that this meeting will define its terms. On the question of a strong Navy the country is agreed, and the matter is not one either for debate or for demonstration. But what we want to know is whether the City meeting is to be called in order to support Mr. Arthur Lee's version of the Prime Minister's answer, in other words in order to invite this country to build against America as well as against Germany, plus ten per cent. We know well that the Prime Minister repudiates any such interpretation. And we may add that it means in hard cash that we must spend about £52,000,000 a year on the Naval Estimates. On this we have only two remarks to make. The first is that the country will not do it, and the second is that it cannot.

The country has been enlightened as to the extent of its liabilities in the way of Old Age Pensions to the close of December, 1908. Up to that date, 596,038 pensions had been issued, a total covering about one person in seventy in the United Kingdom. The "Daily Chronicle" suggests that this means that nearly one out of every two persons of pensionable age is drawing this State allowance. The total cost works out at £7,450,000, of which six and a quarter millions will have to be found in this year's Budget. It appears that Ireland does best out of the pension fund. With only about ten per cent. of the population of the United Kingdom, she gets thirty per cent. of the pension money, while the far richer England and Wales, with seventy-eight per cent. of the population, get only sixty per cent. of the pension money.

On Sunday the Russian Government issued a statement as to the proposals with regard to Persia which have been laid before the British Government. "The traditional individual power of the Shah" must be maintained as "essential," but the Shah is to be persuaded to convoke a Mejliss "as a legislative institution on a clearly defined basis, corresponding to the requirements of the country, and not in the chaotic manner of the formation of the first Mejliss." The Shah is to have a loan—arrangements are already being made to raise it in Paris—but in return must admit representatives of the two Powers in the capacity of advisers to control the reorganisation of the country. A later amplification, likewise from St. Petersburg—it should be noticed that all the information comes from Russia—adds that Persian Constitutionalists, as well as the Shah's delegates, will be invited to "confer" with British and Russian representatives.

This last arrangement is, we suppose, intended to still British anxiety, but it does not conceal the manifest fact that the Russian proposals amount to the establishment of a condominium in Persia on the Egyptian model, with Russia playing the part of England and eliminating England from Persia as England eliminated France from Egypt. The Nationalists are in the highest degree apprehensive. Their sentiments are expressed by Sheikh Mirza Ali, one of the highest Persian ecclesiastics, who protests against the projected foreign loan and foreign control. Persia, he says, wants neither foreign gold nor foreign troops, but if there is strict non-intervention the Persian people will speedily restore the Constitution and put their house in order. The "Manchester Guardian's" special correspondent in Tabriz reports that that city is almost completely invested, and that an early attack by the Royalists is expected.

Lord Northcote, one of the most successful Governors of the Australian Commonwealth, made an interesting speech on Australia at a dinner given in his honor on Tuesday at the Royal Colonial Institute. He thought that the political loyalty of Australia to the Mother-land was unshakable, and was increased by the personal popularity of the King, that the Federal system was quite secure, and that the dominating Australian issue was the increase of its population. What would Australia decide to do with the half million square miles she owned in the tropical North, and for which she could only supply two thousand white settlers, who were not likely to rear permanently a healthy and virile race? He thought that Australia ought to facilitate the immigration of people of British race. He dealt a heavy blow at the Preferentialists by declaring that Australia was growing more and more Protectionist, that she was determined to protect her manufactures against all competition, and that it was impossible for Great Britain to conclude a Zollverein with her on a basis of equal access to Colonial markets.

Mr. Roosevelt, speaking at Washington on Monday on his favorite subject of the expansion of the white races, gave a very handsome testimonial to British rule in India. He thought our Indian administration the greatest feat of government of a mixed population by a European race since the break-up of the Roman Empire. British rule was unselfish, for England drew nothing from India for her purposes, but spent Indian revenues purely on Indian needs. All civilisation, therefore, would hope for the stability and permanence of British rule, and this was the verdict of American missionaries in India. Economically, too, the country was better off than it was before, and than it could hope to be if our Government were withdrawn.

The greater part of the text of the draft agreement between Turkey and Austria, which is now under consideration in Vienna, has been published. The new points in it are a provision for liberty of religion and conscience for Bosnian Mussulmans, who will be permitted to mention the name of the Khalif in the mosques; permission for Bosnian Mussulmans to emigrate to Turkey within three years; and a pledge by Austria to support Turkey at the forthcoming Conference. Apparently Austria is not expected to abandon her protectorate over the Albanian Catholics. Little doubt is felt that the protocol will soon be satisfied, and the Turkish Government is already taking steps to put an end to the boycott. Baron Burian, the Austrian Minister of Finance, says that a Bosnian Diet may be expected to meet this summer, and that it will be elected by curiæ of members of the three chief religions—Orthodox, Mohammedan, and Catholic. It is to be hoped that the Bosnian Constitution will be genuinely Liberal, for upon it will turn the future of the settlement and of the peace of the Balkans.

On Friday and Monday the French Chamber discussed the Government's Morocco policy. M. Jaurès asked the Government whether a secret report by Gen. Lyautey, the High Commissioner, recommending a triple line of armed posts and the occupation of a strip equal to one-eighth of Morocco bordering on the Algerian frontier and separating Fez from the Hinterland, represented the Government's policy. He urged that France should display sincere good-will towards Morocco, and, instead of lapsing into further adventures which would bring her into conflict with Germany, should make an effort to get on good terms with Germany. M. Pichon, the Foreign Minister, in reply, spoke amiably but without fervor of a Franco-German rapprochement. He insisted that Gen. Lyautey's report was merely a suggestion, though he refused to publish it and ignored the fact that M. Regnault, who is now on a special mission to Fez, had protested that it condemned his diplomatic enterprise to failure from the outset. The French Government, said M. Pichon, would organise in collaboration with the Sultan a joint frontier police and open markets, but would neither set up fortified posts nor occupy territory. He was anxious to come to a full understanding with Mulai Hafid, and M. Regnault's chief duties would be to settle the amount of the indemnity and the date and manner of the evacuation of the Shawia. France would not be exacting with regard to the amount of the indemnity. In closing the debate M. Jaurès professed himself satisfied if the Government's policy was carried out by its agents in accordance with M. Pichon's declarations.

On Tuesday Prince Bülow made a couple of speeches to the satisfaction of the not very exacting Prussian Diet. Prussian finances are in as bad a way as Imperial, and the Chancellor eloquently pleaded for new taxes and old-fashioned simplicity of life and economy to put them through. Prince Bülow got on to a pleasanter topic when he reverted once more to the part he had played in shielding the Kaiser and keeping the relations between Kaiser and people cordial, and he finished up in a glow of monarchical enthusiasm which strikes Englishmen as rather quaint. The passage, however, most to the taste of his hearers was his assurance that Radicalism and every bourgeois school of politics were respectable tabernacles for the civil servant, but no Socialist would be allowed in the official fold. The strength of the anti-Socialist spirit in the Prussian Diet even among the advanced Liberals had been illustrated the day before by the quashing of the elections of four Socialist members for Berlin on the ground that the voting registers had been incorrectly made up. There was precisely the same flaw in the registers of the whole twelve Berlin divisions, but six of these twelve were Radicals. These were passed over and the four Socialist seats which are thought likely of capture were emptied.

Mr. Roosevelt has been having another violent brush with the anti-Japanese section in California. The anti-Japanese party introduced into the State Legislature Bills for segregating Japanese into ghettoes, for making them ineligible to hold land or shares and directorships in limited liability companies, and for excluding them from the public schools. Mr. Roosevelt called these proposals "folly, bad faith, and iniquity," telegraphed to the Governor to delay their progress, and sent a letter saying that there was not a shadow of excuse for the course suggested, which might upset the agreement with Japan and open the whole question again. Mr. Gillette, the Governor, replied there was no chance of the Bills passing, and the well-informed New York correspondent of the "Manchester Guardian" says that Mr. Roosevelt has damaged the cause he has at heart by giving an unwarranted advertisement to a few agitators. According to this correspondent, the Bills which provoked Mr. Roosevelt's outburst are introduced in one form or another every session without any prospect or real intention that they should become law, and Mr. Roosevelt, by "butting in," has simply given the gutter Press of the United States and Japan the opportunity of warming up passions in either country.

The comedy of the Charlesworth case has come to its expected end. Miss Violet Charlesworth was identified as a lady who stayed at an Oban hotel under the name of Miss Macleod. She then openly joined her sister, and admitted her deliverance from the perils of the cliff and the motor car. She is said to have made excellent terms for interviews and to have been offered £100 a week for her appearance at a music hall. We do not know which journalist can claim this lady as the special victim of his bow and spear, but we are sure the Press as a whole is proud to be identified with this triumph of the detective art.

The new Russian loan, though eagerly competed for by London underwriters, has not attracted enthusiasm in this country. As a Stock Exchange writer put it on Wednesday: "New Russians have been ¼ premium, the price being somewhat nominal." Of course, the unfriendliness of the Jewish houses, both to the Russian and Finnish loan (for Jews are persecuted in both countries), has been an adverse factor. But the main reason why British investors hold aloof is that they regard Russian finance with deep suspicion. The political unrest and the constant news of torture and executions in all parts of Russia point to the possibility of another period of revolution and civil war. Moreover, the suspicion is growing that the Russian loans are not legitimate capital expenditure on railways, &c., in time of peace, but are merely intended to bolster up an incompetent Government. Without these loans (say people in the City) the Russian Government would default. And, as a matter of fact, the proceeds of the new Russian loan are to be retained in Paris by the French bankers, in order to provide this year's interest on the 400 millions or more of Russian debt which is now held in France.

Politics and Affairs.

THE TURN OF THE CONFEDERATE SCREW.

It is just a year since a member of the little group of Protectionist stalwarts who call themselves "Confederates," set forth, in the congenial columns of the "Morning Post," the amiable nature of their calling. They were "primarily an association of personal friends who have at heart the carrying out of the Birmingham programme," as laid down by Mr. Balfour. They had no idea of interfering with the choice of candidates by local Unionist Associations. But they were willing to assist electors, in constituencies represented by Unionist Free Traders who sought other candidates, "to find the men they want"; and they hoped that in due process of time "the small number of members who are at present standing outside the Party will see reason to change their views and to work in harmony with its declared programme."

A year has passed, to eager eyes a general election is drawing near, and still there are Unionist members so besotted as not to "see reason." The iron hand must now be shown beneath the velvet glove. So we have this week the "posting" of eleven defaulters and six "doubtfuls" with an open avowal of the intention of the Confederacy to put up a Protectionist candidate in every constituency where an impenitent should dare to stand. This declaration of the Junto is backed by an official announcement that the support of the central party organisation will be withheld from any candidate who does not explicitly adopt the "accepted policy" of tariff reform, upon Mr. Balfour's Birmingham basis. If this test were rigorously applied, it is argued that the Unionist party at the next elections would be purged of Free Traders, either by the enforced retirement of these bold, bad men before the poll, or by the victory of a Liberal Free Trader where a triangular contest took place. For though the heroic policy of refusing to press a Liberal candidature where a Confederate opposed a Free Fooder might, as the "Manchester Guardian" suggests, be practicable in some Lancashire constituencies, it could hardly be expected that this avowal of an issue more "dominating" than the House of Lords could be widely adopted. The Liberal Party must, after all, guard its own. It cannot go far towards helping a faction that cannot help itself, and professes its aversion from even the most moderate developments of the policy of social reform.

The Free-fooder is certainly placed in a difficult position. For the Protectionist set up against him would presumably be able to claim the official blessing (and cash) withheld from him, on the ground that he satisfied the party test. If this be so, it is nonsense to assert, as does the "Times," that the Conservative Central Office has no intention of interfering in any way with the selection of candidates by local associations. The logic of this coercive policy is, from the standpoint of the convinced Protectionist, unimpeachable. Protection has to all appearance been accorded the position of priority in the Conservative policy of the near future. It looks like the winning cause, or the cause on which least may be lost, and for the average party man this is usually enough. Nothing else is pushed; nothing regularly heard on the party platforms. The party organisation and Mr. Balfour have endorsed this view, and its acceptance may reasonably be required of candidates as a test of party loyalty. For though there are other important party issues, it is undeniable that the return of Unionist members who might overthrow the Unionist Government by a hostile vote upon their opening Budget is a peril against which the party must take every possible precaution. Even the provisional offer to resign after election, in case the Unionist Government should propose a fiscal measure which they were unable to support, is a precarious arrangement.

But though the prospect for the Free-fooders looks black, we are disposed to think that this brutal "clubbing" policy will arouse a spirit of resentment in the more independent constituencies. The dictation of the central "machine" has never been popular in the towns, and its operation by a conspiracy of masked assassins, marking down for political slaughter men whose courage and high principles are attested by the very charge on which they are condemned, is likely to evoke a rally in their favor. Though Norwood Conservatives seem disposed to give their congé to Mr. Bowles, we shall be surprised if Marylebone and East Herts readily acquiesce in the demand that they shall rid themselves of representatives so able and so personally popular as Lord R. Cecil and Mr. Abel Smith; while the three Universities whose members are on the prescribed list may be expected, with some confidence, to defend their independence of judgment against the new fanaticism.

For neither logic nor fanaticism is palatable in this country. The Confederates are committing the same error of tactics as the suffragettes. To press a policy to all its logical conclusions, disregarding all incidents of personality and of occasion, is a parade of principle offensive to ordinary British nature. It ignores the actual psychology of an electorate. The average voter does not want his politics sent down in a compact platform from a London office, with each plank assigned its proper place and valuation. He may be quite a hot-headed Protectionist, but it does not follow that he is prepared to reject on this shibboleth a man who has commanded his respect and admiration on general and personal grounds for many years. It is, therefore, at least likely that this assault upon the local independence of Conservatives may damage the central machine more than the position of the Free-fooders.

But one other weakness lurks in the Confederate policy. Even if they can coerce all Unionist candidates to toe the line of Mr. Balfour's Birmingham platform, what have they achieved? They are avowed Protectionists, but is Mr. Balfour? Has he bound himself to introduce in his next administration a definitely Protectionist tariff? No such thing. Even the Birmingham platform, though slightly more definite than his own free utterances, does not bind him. It does, indeed, "broaden the basis of taxation," and approve "powers of negotiation" and of "preferential commercial arrangements with the Colonies." But on the plain issue of protecting British industries, it only pledges him to "safeguarding our great productive industries from unfair competition." Now Mr. Balfour has never defined the term "unfair," and until he does so fully and unequivocally, no sensible Confederate can feel safe in his shoes. For it will be remembered that though Mr. Chamberlain has vouched for the soundness of Mr. Balfour's Protectionism, the leader of the Opposition has always repudiated the title. We commend to the Confederates a closer consideration of the following locus classicus from his speech of February, 1907: "I am, as I have often proclaimed myself, in the true sense of the word, a Free Trader. I am still, as I have always been, opposed to Protection in the true sense of the word—namely, the attempt, not to protect British industries against illegitimate competition, but the attempt to protect British interests against legitimate competition." Now, the interpretation of "illegitimate," as that of "unfair," has always been left open by Mr. Balfour. We all have reason to know that he is a past master of the art of illusive exposition. But, so far as he has given illustrations of unfair and illegitimate competition, he has always relied on instances of foreign bounties, cartels, and other instruments for sending imports into this country at less than a genuine cost price. He has never said that he will support Protection as it is carried out in the "scientific" tariff of the United States or Germany, in which no sort of successful foreign competition displacing home-made goods ranks as legitimate. In other words, there is no reason for supposing that Mr. Balfour holds that the successful competition of foreign goods, based on lower wages or more efficient methods or cheaper raw materials, is illegitimate. But the Confederates and the Protectionist party of this country certainly interpret "illegitimate" and "unfair" competition on American and German lines, not on Balfourian lines. Why, then, do they suppose that victory is secure for them, if they can force all Unionist candidates to swallow Mr. Balfour's slippery formula? They can only come to such a conclusion if they conclude, or have reason to conclude, that Mr. Balfour's platform exposition of his economic views is a mere blind, and that though he has left himself a door of escape from true Protection almost as wide as that of the Free-fooders themselves, he does not intend to avail himself of it. And that seems a perilous plank to stand on.

THE FATE OF PERSIA.

Unless the news which reaches this country from semi-official sources in Russia is seriously misinformed or intentionally misleading, we are now on the eve of a momentous intervention in Persia, which is likely to be consummated before Parliament meets. The essence of the scheme which M. Isvolsky has put forward is that a considerable sum of money should be lent to the Persian Government by Russia, a favor which it is to repay by accepting some form of foreign control. The Persian Government means in this context the Shah, for his Ministers are his creatures, and the Parliament, after its dispersal and the demolition of its buildings, has been solemnly condemned as an institution which the Shah will never consent to revive. The Russians do apparently propose to restore it in some maimed and truncated form. The franchise is to be altered, and its functions apparently confined to legislation. It is part of M. Stolypin's theory of Constitutional government that Parliaments have no concern with the acts of the Executive. The first Duma was dissolved for inquiring into a pogrom. The Persian Mejliss is apparently to be reduced to a similar impotence. As for the Shah, his "traditional individual power" is to be upheld, which means, we suppose, that though, like the Tsar, he is forced to tolerate a sort of Duma, he will remain in theory an autocrat. But the distribution of impotence between Shah and Mejliss is an academic question. The real control of the administration is to be vested in foreign "advisers," attached on the Egyptian plan to the various ministries. The published summary of the Russian note does not specify their nationality, but presumably they will be either Russians alone, or Russians and Englishmen. We are not clear whether this plan involves a military occupation. If the Nationalists continued to maintain their resistance at Tabriz and Ispahan, this also would be necessary. If, on the other hand, they disbanded their levies, the disciplined Persian Cossacks under Colonel Liakhoff and his Russian staff would remain the only real armed force in the country. In either event the finances, the administration, and the army would be in foreign hands, and Persia would have become in effect a Russian dependency.

It would be an affectation to express surprise at these Russian proposals. We have expected nothing less since the Convention was signed. Russia has for a century past steadily pursued her purpose of forcing her way to the warm waters of the Persian Gulf. She has removed the obstacle of British resistance; it only now remains to make an end of what is left of Persian independence. We are more concerned to inquire what Sir Edward Grey's attitude will be. The Russian newspapers assume that his acquiescence is already assured, and a leading article in Wednesday's "Times" proceeds on the same assumption. The "Times" also appears to think that it would be a perfectly correct proceeding to lend money to an Asiatic despot who is at war with his subjects. It does, indeed, stipulate for the restoration of the Mejliss, but it also demands a less democratic franchise and the acceptance of foreign "supervision." It is aware that such an intervention involves a departure from the policy to which England and Russia are pledged, for it reminds its readers that Sir Edward Grey and M. Isvolsky have expressed their "desire" not to interfere in Persia's "internal affairs to a greater degree than can be helped." That may have been their desire; their pledge was something much more binding. It was thus worded in a memorandum addressed by the British Legation in Teheran to the Persian Foreign Minister (September 14th, 1907):—

> "The object of the two Powers in making this Agreement is not in any way to attack, but rather to assure for ever the independence of Persia. Not only do they not wish to have at hand any excuse for intervention, but their object in these friendly negotiations was not to allow one another to intervene on the pretext of safeguarding their interests. The two Powers hope that in the future Persia will be for ever delivered from the fear of foreign intervention, and will thus be perfectly free to manage her own affairs in her own way, whereby advantage will accrue both to herself and to the whole world."

So far from "not allowing one another to intervene," the two Powers, if we may trust the newspapers which are in touch with their Foreign Offices, are about to support each other in interfering. So far from allowing Persia to "manage her own affairs in her own way," England and Russia, on the Isvolsky plan, will be "controlling" or "supervising" her affairs, and even dictating to her what precisely her franchise shall be. The reasons which the "Times" advances for such a breach of faith are so flimsy and, indeed, so ignorant, as hardly to deserve mention. It cannot even allege the conventional pretext, usual on such occasions, of some outrage on British subjects. But Persia has become "an intolerable nuisance," and even a "potential danger" to her "civilised neighbors," and "affords openings to the ambitions and intrigues of unscrupulous outsiders." We learn for the first time that Persia has civilised neighbors. Are they the Afghans, the Baluchis, the Kurds of Turkey, or the wild tribes of the Russian Caucasus? What danger threatens from a State without an army, wholly absorbed in its internal quarrels? And who are the "outsiders" strong enough to challenge the dominant positions of Russia and England at Teheran?

That Persia is in a state of anarchy and civil war is, unfortunately, indisputable. But it is not, as we read the news, a hopeless anarchy. It came about because Russia supported the Shah. It will continue only so long as she supports him. The "Times," indeed, virtually admits this when it suggests that, failing his acceptance of a loan on the Anglo-Russian terms, the Shah should at last be told that he "will be left to his fate." There, inferentially, is an admission of the central fact of the present chaos, which is, we imagine, as well known to the "Times" as it is to ourselves. In the past the Shah has not been "left to his fate"; he has been supported. The real origin of the present crisis was the decision taken by both Powers at the time of the Reval meeting to support him. The leaders of the Persian Parliament were officially informed of this decision on the eve of the Shah's coup d'état, and warned that if they resisted him a foreign occupation would follow. That is why the coup d'état was successful and provoked at first no organised resistance. That is why Colonel Liakhoff, an officer on the Russian active list, was allowed to destroy the Parliament House and praised for his conduct on this occasion in a Russian official communiqué. The support of Russia did not stop here. Professor Browne has published documents which prove that Russia supplied cartridges to the Royalist forces at Tabriz, and there is evidence, less absolutely conclusive, but still impressive, to show that both before and after the coup d'état the Shah was financed by the official Russian Bank. In other words, the anarchy of which the Powers complain is the deliberate work of one of them. Russia enabled a savage Asiatic despot, who tortures and beheads his opponents without a pretence of trial, to destroy the one force which made for order and progress in Persia. Because it is evident that he cannot much longer hold his own against the united influence of the Nationalists and the clergy, she now invites our assistance in an intrigue which must for ever destroy all but the name of Persian independence.

It is probable that Persia will require not only a loan, but the services of European experts. But this country will be false alike to her sympathies and her interests if she facilitates any loan save at the request of a restored Persian Parliament; nor can Persia retain her effective independence unless the Parliament is free to choose and control its foreign experts, and to fix its franchise for itself. Until a Parliament, freely elected on the old basis, invites our assistance and can control the Minister with whom we negotiate, we have no status in the internal affairs of Persia, and no right, moral or legal, to intervene. The problem which the Persians have to solve is admittedly difficult, but it is less complicated than that which confronts the Young Turks. Nothing but the unscrupulous hostility of the Russian bureaucracy can make it desperate. In the Balkan crisis Sir Edward Grey took his stand as a friend of the Constitutional idea in the East, and the champion of legality and international good faith. Every argument which told against Austrian policy in Bosnia militates with equal force against Russian policy in Persia. We desire efficiency in Persia, but even more precious is the ideal of self-government. Nor can we believe that Russian rule would be even moderately efficient and humane. Russia has a definite Imperial object to serve in absorbing Persia on Egyptian lines. We also have interests in Persia, and we have treaty rights. Both authorise us to veto the Russian advance. Subservience to Russian policy would damage our prestige throughout the East, ruin our good name among Mohammedan reformers, and expose us to the criticism of our new friends in Turkey. It is a still more fatal objection that it would destroy a promising experiment in popular government, and enslave an intelligent and spirited race which has deserved a better fate.

THE CASE FOR AFFORESTATION.

The Government is, we think, highly fortunate in having before it at the present moment a scheme of economic and social betterment at once so simple and practical, and, at the same time, so generally popular, as that presented by the report of the Erosion Commission in favor of national afforestation. The reform in itself has never attracted the opposition of any party in the State, and the slight character of the reservations which a high Tory like Mr. Stanley Wilson attaches to his adoption of the Commission's report is welcome evidence of that fact. Afforestation has found friends with Moderates like Mr.

Munro Ferguson and extremists of the type of Mr. Keir Hardie; and all the while a small but very competent body of experts, headed by Professor Schlich, have incessantly preached the economic value of the German, French, and Belgian experiments in sylviculture. The ground, therefore, has been well prepared, and there is a special reason why we should begin to cultivate it without further delay. The question has suddenly become an urgent one. The world's supply of suitable timber is rapidly giving out at the moment when its newly acquired passion for reading, combined with a change in the method of paper-making, has enormously increased the demand. Nearly all the great timber countries are now fully conscious of the need, and have woke up to the necessity of renewing their rapidly dwindling store of trees. The United States and Canada are keenly alive to the necessity of conserving and re-stocking their forests, while Germany has for a hundred years maintained an admirable school of forestry, the rich fruits of which can be seen to-day by any traveller through the densely wooded slopes of the Black Forest. We alone, with a climate better suited to afforestation than that of central Europe, have neither done nor attempted anything worth the name. Save for naval shipbuilding we have hardly tried to grow trees for use. We have grown them to round off a garden pleasance, or to give dignity and variety of outline to park land, or to provide cover for ground game, and we can, of course, show many interesting examples of the culture of single trees. But though we possess some of the most beautiful stretches of woodland in the world, they present in the main examples of deformed and extravagant growth. Short boles, bent wood, knotted wood, wood over-encumbered with branches, trees too thinly planted and too much exposed to the sun's rays, stunted trees, and trees with too tapering stems—are the outstanding characteristics of our few national forests. One of the most delightful of them—namely, Windsor Forest—was the despair of the little school of Indian forestry which was driven from Coopers Hill. The Forest of Dean was long an example of nearly every fault that the skilful forester should avoid. Such a task as the use, care, and replacement of our timber stores has never been seriously undertaken.

The proposal of the Commission would bring this state of things to an end, and is a definite plan for the formation of a State Department, furnished with the resources necessary for the development of a practically untapped source of natural wealth. The scheme would in due time increase the area of our State-owned forests to about a third of that of Germany, and—on the assumption that 9,000,000 acres in Great Britain and Ireland, now subject to poor forms of pastoral culture, but suited to afforestation, were all wooded—would enable us to dispense with the twenty millions pounds' worth of foreign-grown timber which we import every year. This, in its turn, involves a scheme of compulsory purchase and management which only a central department of State could initiate and control. No private owner could provide the continuity of management required for the development of a forest area, save in rare examples, such as appear on the Holkham estate of Lord Leicester, or could afford to wait for forty years before his investment became self-supporting, or for eighty years till it reached its full commercial value. The Commissioners contemplate an investment which at the end of eighty years would yield the State a return of about $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. for its money, and present it with a property worth £562,000,000, with an income of $17\frac{1}{2}$ millions. Clearly it would not be fair to lay on this generation the whole burden of building up so enormous an asset, which would only begin to be remunerative by about the time that two generations of men had passed away. The cost of afforestation must be provided by a Treasury loan, the first annual charge of which would be £90,000.

This is the purely economic view of the Commissioners' scheme; but they have added to it the half-social, half-economic, purpose of dealing with unemployment. Here, again, we think that they will carry with them practically the whole public that matters. On afforestation Mr. Burns is in entire agreement with the Labor Party. Afforestation entirely escapes his objections to what he picturesquely calls "doss-house philanthropy," and Mr. Ivor Guest and his colleagues do not propose any application of it to unemployment which would deprive it of its self-supporting and finally profitable character. It is also a new industry for these islands, and therefore represents a direct addition to the volume of employment, as well as an indirect addition in the shape of subsidiary trades for sawing and splitting wood, and preparing it for the market. It does not permanently divert industry from any of its accustomed channels, and it happens to fit in with the crux of the unemployed problem—namely, the distress arising in the winter months. These chance to be the planting period, and though later on a regular forestry staff would be required, if a system of periodical planting and continual tending is adopted, there will always be a call for special work from the end of October to the middle of April.

A problem of some difficulty does unquestionably arise as to the character of the labor to be employed. Most of the acreage suitable for tree-planting is situated in the north of England and in Scotland; that is to say, in districts remote from the capital, and from some, though not all, of the usual centres of distress. And it is improbable that the more skilled forms of labor required could be recruited from the more demoralised or the physically feebler class of the unemployed. But the Commission believe, on the strength of a large body of evidence, that for the unskilled work, such as digging and clearing the ground of weeds and undergrowth, considerable numbers of the unemployed are fitted without training, and that for the more difficult labor, such as actual planting, the State, in its own interests, can afford a little preliminary training. In the whole transaction, indeed, the State has the advantage of the individual capitalist. He requires quick returns, the State can recoup itself with slow ones. He has no time to concern himself over-much with the morale of his laborers; for it, with its unending life and developing responsibilities, the maintenance of a good human stock is of the essence of its business. But even if we abandon the element of direct and immediate moral and physical improvement for the unemployed, the scheme stands good. Though only some of the 18,000 men whom the Commission propose immediately to employ—a body growing, as the scheme develops, to 90,000—were taken direct from the ranks of the unemployed, there would arise an immediate spur to the labor market in the provision of a new industry, eminently fitted to stop the drift to the towns, establishing a new set of rural trades, and finding work in the open air for about ten times the pastoral population which afforestation could possibly displace. We may even take some discount off the Commissioners' estimates, and conclude that they have presented the country with a "business proposition" which no enlightened, or even moderately efficient, community can reject.

THE CONTROL OF THE MOTOR CAR.

A VIGOROUS article in the current number of the "Quarterly Review" bears testimony to the growth of public feeling in regard to comfort and safety in street and highway. The supineness of the Press, which reports the daily accidents without comment, and almost without description, the extraordinary quiescence of the British public in all matters that do not touch the interest of sect or party, the dumb patience of the rural laboring classes which suffer most, confirm motorists in an unreal sense of security, and foster the illusion that there is no body of opinion strong enough to effect the changes required. But no doubt can exist in the minds of careful observers that the past two years, and especially the last twelve months, have witnessed a strong and rapid growth of opinion. Far from being the prejudice against innovation which motorists declare it to be, the indignation against the recklessness with which the freedom allowed them by the Act of 1903 has been abused has steadily grown from year to year. On the first appearance of the motor car, all people were ready to welcome it as a new invention pregnant with the greatest probabilities of development. These possibilities remain, and we believe that to this day there are few, if any, who could strictly be called anti-motorists in the sense that they desire to see the motor abolished. But little by little people discovered that what was exceedingly useful and enjoyable to its owner could be a source of recurrent danger and constant annoyance to the general public. For a long time the majority of people were good humouredly prepared to put up with discomforts and inconveniences which they took to be necessary incidents of a new mode of locomotion. It was only the multiplication of cars, and the deliberate and persistent abuse of the extended powers given by the Act of 1903, which very slowly brought men over, one by one, to see that something very drastic has to be done if the pedestrian, the cyclist, and the horse-drawn vehicle are to remain upon the road, if children on the way to school are to enjoy reasonable safety, and if the slow and infirm are to be allowed out of their homes except under penalty of imminent risk to life and limb. With every cheapening of the cars the peril increases. It is not uncommon to read of a couple of inquests in the same day's papers. In almost all cases juries refuse to find a verdict against the driver. He is doing but what other men do, and what the law allows him to do. As long as he does not evince palpable inhumanity by running away without enquiring into the fate of his victim or endeavoring to repair the injury, there is a reluctance to impute personal blame. Over and over again the newspaper paragraphist advertises the benevolence of the motorist in picking up and conveying to the hospital the man he has run over, or in expressing sympathy with his relations and defraying the funeral expenses. One is almost tempted to think that the honor of being conveyed to a mortuary in a magnate's car is to be taken as ample compensation for the insignificant incident of death, and we have seen cases of a coroner's jury recording their sympathy with the family of the motorist along with that of his victim as if the two stood at least upon a par.

Nor are motorists quick to abate their claims. One still sees the argument urged in newspaper correspondence that the roads were made for "traffic," as though our ancestors had prevision of petrol and sixty miles an hour—that children must learn not to play in them, but walk sedately to school, and that, as for the old or infirm, they are nothing accounted of in days when the survival of the fittest has become a watchword. The dangers of the Embankment between tramcars on the one hand and taxicabs on the other have become familiar to all London. Yet Lord Montagu of Bealieu protests in the "Times" against the erection of any more refuges in a street which it has become an acrobatic feat to cross in safety. It matters not a jot to Lord Montagu that thousands and thousands of Londoners must cross the Embankment to get to their cars. What has he to do with mere pedestrians? The road must be kept for fast traffic, for those wealthy enough to own a motor car, or, at least, sufficiently well-to-do to depend on the taxicab. As to the foot pasengers, they should cross by subway. Underground is good enough for them. For those who cannot afford the means of fast transit in the open air there are already tubes and subways and underground railways, and for these no doubt a subterranean future is reserved in the coming Utopia of the motorist when the horse will be visible only at the Zoological Gardens, the last bicycle be preserved at South Kensington, and pedestrianism on the motorists' highway will be stigmatised as a crime.

The "Quarterly Review" is unsparing in its plain dealing with the motorist. It brushes aside the ordinary plea that the only offender is the "road hog" with the round assertion "that the vast majority of motorists, being persons of law-abiding habits apart from their motor cars, habitually disobey that part of the existing statute which prescribes a speed-limit, and feel no shame when they are caught and punished." In other words, the motor class is, as such, a lawless class. The statement is true, not of a mere handful, but of a large proportion, probably of the great majority. The reviewer is, in our opinion, less happy in his suggested remedies. We agree that the first thing necessary is an infinitely firmer and more equal administration of the law, the complete disuse of the futile police-trap system, and the stern and rigorous punishment of reckless driving without regard to the speed-limit. But these changes are easier to desire than to enforce. The administration of the law is in the hands of the motor-class, and a bitter experience shows the difficulty of all legal control over the favorite amusements of the classes in power. A radically vicious standard has been set by the speed-limit prescribed by the Act of 1903, the effect of which, as the reviewer shows, has so often been to breed the thought that no speed below twenty miles could be objectionable. If we were legislating anew, we should avoid all mention of a speed-limit. But since the existing limit has given rise to a false standard, we see no way, in spite of the reviewer's criticisms, but to replace it by a more reasonable standard. The limit of ten miles an hour for urban districts and frequented tracks, we venture to say, makes a real difference to the comfort and safety of anyone driving or cycling, for example, in Richmond Park. It is a limit far more easily judged by the eye than the higher speed of twenty miles an hour, and in prescribing it the law should be so framed as to render all the machinery of traps and stop-watches unnecessary. A speed which, in the opinion of two or more credible witnesses, is distinctly in excess of ten miles an hour, is too great a speed to be ordinarily safe for a large vehicle moving in the middle of street traffic and among pedestrians. Doubtless the motor is controlled with greater ease than some vehicles, but the repeated evidence at inquests that a car going at only six or seven miles an hour could not be pulled up quickly enough to avoid some turn on the part of a pedestrian shows that if motorists are to be believed, their capacity to check their cars is by no means unlimited. With regard to the dust we should rejoice, with the reviewer, to see the liability for all damage caused thrown on the motorist who raises the petrol-laden cloud that marks his path. But we have less sanguine hopes of the operation of the law, and until separate motor tracks are laid down we expect no respite for such dwellers as are still to be found along the main roads.

But the first thing to be demanded is a complete change on the part of the Local Government Board. Hitherto it has operated to keep in check local authorities who were already far too slow. Both by administration and legislation the positions should be reversed. A minimum of precaution for the safety and comfort of the public should be made the universal rule, and the Board should stimulate localities not only to enforce the minimum, but to go beyond it. They should have powers to enforce locally such regulations as are locally necessary, and the Board should see that they fulfil their duties. Similarly, if coroners' juries fail, as they are failing, Home Office inquiries should be held to ascertain the causes of accidents. The question is one which will not diminish in importance. It will loom larger year by year with the growth of the traffic till some Government is strong enough to deal with it. If the "Quarterly Review" is somewhat sanguine in declaring in the present tense that "the mind of the public is irrevocably made up," we have very little doubt of the near future.

Life and Letters.

THE BEAUTY OF A NATIVE TONGUE.

Once upon a time there came a young master to an ancient English school, and his heart was full of love for the beauties of English literature—full of pride in what he rightly called the glory of our greatest national inheritance. Having secured the head master's indifferent consent, he set aside one afternoon hour a week for the study of English masterpieces with his form, which was the highest but one in the school. Overflowing with zeal and knowledge, he devoted special pains to make that hour a success, and his lesson was all that the teaching of English literature should be. The boys thoroughly enjoyed it. To them it was what a field-day is to a soldier fresh from bloody war, or a feather-bed to a prisoner after the plank. An air of go-as-you-please pervaded that chamber hoary with ancestral Greek. Some did Iambics, some speculated on the sports; all revelled in the ease of relaxation and unchartered freedom—all but the "sap" of the form, who said he objected to being treated like a girl. And they called the lesson indifferently "Shakespeare drivel" or "the Bodger's rot."

It was discouraging and impolite, but perhaps a vein of true instinct lay at the bottom of their tolerant contempt. Partly they were trying to express what Freeman meant by his condemnation of English literature teaching as "chatter about Harriet." But the actual lessons were far beyond chatter, and what the boys really missed was the feeling of something hard and definite—something to bite on—such as almost any Greek or Latin passage gave them. It seemed so soft and easy to be reading a language they all understood—a language in which there was no need of rules, or exceptions, or irregularities, no need to ask what words came from, or what was the form of the perfect passive, because everybody knew. As to the meanings of words, no one struck half-a-dozen in the hour that wanted looking up, and to get the sense of a passage one had only to turn the order upside down, because it was poetry. To be sure, the Bodger was for ever stopping to point out some beauty of thought or delicacy of expression, or parallel with another poet. But that was where the "drivel and rot" came in.

The remembrance of those delightful hours was called up by the conference of the English Association in the Gower Street College the other day. The objects of the Association are to maintain the correct use of English, to recognise English as an essential element in national education, to discuss the methods of teaching it, and to encourage the advanced study of our language and literature. Undoubtedly, these objects can be gained. They are for the most part gained in France, where the accurate study of the language and literature has helped far more even than the Academy to keep up the peculiar purity of French. Perhaps it has given the language a rather rigid fixity also, but purity and definiteness are well worth the cost. English cannot compare with French in those qualities, and American is still further removed. As to accent, which the English Association also tries to correct, there are various accents in France, and there is even a bad Parisian accent, but we doubt if there is anything quite so hideous to a fastidious Frenchman as the accent of a Cockney shop-assistant is to our fastidious educated classes. To hear a Board School class in a genteel neighborhood reciting "The Chawge of the Laht Brigide" in unison would fill the heart of the Association with desolation and woe:

> "Into the meouth of 'ell,
> Into the velley of death
> Rowd the six 'undred!"

All these errors may be corrected—errors of grammar, phrase, the use of words, and even of accent, if the teacher has a true accent himself. The doubtful thing is the teaching of literature. For in literature beauty is implied. We quite admit that the instance of failure we have given may be exceptional. The public schools are encased in centuries of tradition, and as boys and masters never leave all at the same time a clean start is never possible. That particular school since the reign of Edward VI. had regarded Greek as the only study worthy of the human mind, and when at last, under the clamor of commercial parents, a "modern side" was introduced, the school looked upon chemistry or whatever else the duffers of the modern side played about with, in just the same spirit of contemptuous tolerance as they had shown to the beauties of English literature. We know, too, that in the West End there is a shop where the superintendent always applies for her assistants to a certain East End Board School, because she knows a girl from that school will probably share the admiration for Wordsworth which she herself learnt there. And so in that little colony of disciples the love of the poet most remote from fashion lurks half-hidden from the eye among millinery and chiffons.

It is a strong instance of what one teacher's personality can accomplish. But in general a girl's sense of beauty is awakened earlier than a boy's, and we rather pity the enthusiast who tries to teach the beauty of English literature to an average class of boys under eighteen or twenty. At the best, the teaching of beauty too often ends in the repetition of second-hand criticism, which is about the lowest form of second-hand knowledge. Take an examination in English literature, and when it comes to appreciations, you will find the answers nearly all exactly the same. They are the teacher's opinions learnt by heart, and as far as the illumination of the soul goes, blank ignorance would be more hopeful. The sense for beauty in word and thought is very rare in childhood, and even when it is present it is better to leave its growth alone, giving it the chance of discerning beauty for itself amid its natural surroundings. For beauty, like happiness, is a kind of miracle. It comes and goes as it were by accident, and, like happiness, it vanishes if you pursue it deliberately.

That brings us to the interesting subject raised at the Conference by Professor Ker. He discussed the decline of romance in the modern child's upbringing. He showed that, while the eighteenth century had despised romance, the nineteenth century, in spite of its romantic outburst, had cut off the supply, so that, as Wordsworth said, children were being deprived of their inheritance. It is true that the past century has produced tellers of the most beautiful fairy-tales and stories of adventure. Some of the finest are writing now, as anyone can see who chooses out the half-dozen best books at Christmas. But a child reading even Hans Andersen or "Treasure Island," in a suburban flat, while in the darkening street an organ grinds out, "I love a lassie," is not the same as the child by the hearth upon a darkening moor when its mother began the old familiar words:—

"It fell about the Lammas tide,
When muirmen win their hay."

Nor is it the same for the child when the nursemaid sings "Alas and alack! She's come back, With a naughty little twinkle in her eye," as it was when the song began, "A poor country maid up to London had strayed."

There is not much to be said against our music-hall songs. They give a great deal of pleasure where pleasure is very much wanted. There is nothing to be said against the writers of our beautiful tales, or against the Society for telling fairy stories in Board Schools. These are the bright and hopeful things in modern life. But when it comes to Professor Ker and the teaching of romance, we wonder how it will be possible to recapture the awe with which children under the wintry roof must have listened when one of them had died and the mother and father kindled the wicks and chanted the dirge beginning:—

"This ae night, this ae night,
Every night and all,
Fire, and sleet, and candle-light,
And Christ receive thy saul."

By what art could we now recapture the terror and pity—the savage and tender intermingling of animal with human life that the child who was our ancestor learnt from 'The Three Ravens"? Or what passion do we now hand on from generation to generation like that of the ballad beginning:—

"As ye came from the holy land
Of Walsinghame,
Met you not with my true love,
By the way as you came?"

There is a land where the wan Solway ebbs and flows like a faery sea between mountains on either side. At the head of the water a broad stretch of bog and purple moorland separates two nations proud in arms and despising the life and death of peace. Immemorial walls and towers and shelters for women and cattle are piled along both sides of that windy estuary and moor; and from every heap of stones, every burn and hill, comes the echo of half-forgotten battles and desperate passion and the wild enchantment of unseen things. The air still seems to resound with shouting and lamentations. On the one side the White Rose hung on Carlisle gates; on the other side, only a day's march up among the hills, lies Yarrow. A child in that country, while sun and shower passed over those very scenes, or in the evening when he just saw the moon or thought he saw it like a ghost among the drifting clouds—think what it was for a child in that country to catch even a line or two of "Kinmont Willie," or even a verse of that lament, the most beautiful remnant of Yarrow's almost forgotten grief, that ends:—

"But think na ye my heart was sair,
When I laid the mould on his yellow hair?
O think na ye my heart was wae
When I turned about, awa' to gae?

Nae living man I'll love again,
Since that my lovely knight is slain;
With ae lock of his yellow hair,
I'll chain my heart for evermair."

It is a land where Scott himself, who knew it well, becomes commonplace in comparison with the reality of its romance, and how by any imaginable teaching in our streets and County Council schools can we seek to restore the inheritance that its children had? In some degree there is a similar change, a similar deprivation, throughout the whole of our country. We shall find other forms of beauty, and childhood finds its own. But this that was there is now for good or evil gone, and the most chivalrous efforts will hardly restore it.

ON THE MARGIN OF LIFE.

The Tramp life, the underside of the world, generally appears in writing in exaggerated sunshine or gloom. Some who have lived through it—notably Mr. Davies—have written sincere and truthful reminiscences of adventure in England and America. They set themselves, in union with a great company, to "cheat Admetus": to live on the industrial populations, just as the idle rich live on the industrial populations, without giving back any adequate return. They performed this feat, partly by begging, partly by stealing, partly by grudging spells of special and not unenjoyable labor highly paid at certain seasons of the year—such as fruit-picking, cotton-gathering, clam-fishing, and the like. When they grew tired of the open road, they took to the railway, accepting free passage hidden in the goods van or riding upon the front of the engine. They had their experiences, also, of society's reprisals, in occasional spells of imprisonment, not altogether disagreeable in the more humane cities of America. The general impression conveyed is of a life of adventure and considerable physical satisfactions, of health in the open air, of a variegated and colored experience along the great ways of the world which is denied to the assiduous and driven laborer of machine and factory. That is one side of the picture. The other is given by Government reports and personal investigations by such observers as Miss Higgs and Mr. Ensor, of the casual ward, the common lodging-house, and all the race who have eluded or been squeezed out of the meshes of regular toil. And here there is impression of degradation and permanent discomfort, dirt, squalor, and misery, a broken, shambling, discouraged rabble of creatures that once were men and women. Those who have scrutinised the wreckage of humanity which collects in the so-called "able-bodied" workhouses, or can be seen drawn up on cold nights in ragged regiments on the Embankment waiting for the midnight dole of soup, will be more inclined to believe in the degradation than in the adventure. Yet the few persons who have gone forth without prejudice to know the despised, broken persons—tramps, criminals, prostitutes, unemployed, unemployable—who shamble through the darkened ways of the City, have no such experience of universal collapse to record. Those who come as learners rather than teachers—with a sense of humor, of friendliness, an ultimate reverence for anything human, above all, with acceptance rather than with criticism—are perpetually astonished at the resistance which humanity is able to present to the most calamitous of outward circumstance.

Mr. Neil Lyons, in "Arthurs" (John Lane), has taken for the scene of his inquiry a London coffee-stall "somewhere between Brixton and the obelisk in South London." "This is an ambiguous direction," he declares. "But then we night seekers are jealous of our ill-fame, and the fear of the Oxford movement is strong upon us." Round this coffee-stall, attracted like moths to a candle, gather in the heart of the sleeping city those to whom sleep is denied. Night-workers seeking refreshment mingled here with women of the streets; an occasional drunken sailor, a thief making a rendezvous with a thief, tramps and wastrels, foregather for a moment within the circle of light before drifting out into the darkness again. There are some who are regular customers, who develop a kind of comradeship, exchanging tales of misfortune; and from these the author weaves a tragic or pitiful or romantic story of human lives. For all the permanent elements of romance are in this underworld, only with the values distorted and modified. Here also are sudden vicissitudes of fortune, passionate human affections, love of woman and of child, fear of violence and of death. It is life lived close to the margin, in perpetual familiarity with the reality of common things; darkness and cold, hunger and despair. It is life lived, that is to say, as perhaps the majority of mankind are living it to-day; never so far removed from the possibility of privation and of danger as to be able to settle down tranquil in a universe of security. The common impression, amongst those who do not dwell in such a universe, is that existence under such conditions must reel back into savagery or apathy—into a kind of numbness before all the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune, or into the fierce fight for existence of the sinking ship or the crumbling earthquake city. But experience is quite otherwise. Comradeship, desire, human affection, kindliness and pity, all here survive amongst men so shabby and twisted as to appear scarcely human, and women with painted faces not pleasant to look upon. Nay more, a certain attitude of cheeriness and enjoyment seems to be bred out of the very extremity of fortune. There is a rich humor in all Mr. Lyons's sketches, for much of which, indeed, the onlooker and recorder may be responsible, but some of which is native to the original character. Sometimes it assumes the form of verbal exaggeration and comments in which all working-class London is so ready, the most reputable product of the industrial metropolis. Sometimes it finds satisfaction in the jollity excited by drink, as in the experience of the drunken sailor who uplifts his voice in the ballad of "Joe Golightly." Sometimes it has the peculiar, reckless insolence of the defiance, out of extremity, of all time's revenges; the reckless insolence of the "seven men out of hell" in the story of the "Bolivar" who have "euchred God's almighty storm" and "bluffed the eternal sea."

There is here, however, none of the idealisation, the roseate visions of sordid and ugly things suddenly seen through a mist of make-belief which fills with an intolerable sentimentality the works of many popular writers of fiction. "Arthur's" clients, having plumbed the bedrock of life, are suffering no illusions concerning it. They are emphatically convinced that dust is dust and mud is mud, and that a spade may justly be called a spade. Outside the coffee stall itself, in the small hours of the morning, there is continual necessity for the suppression of rowdies and marauders and those who exhibit anarchic tendencies in a civilisation remote from our own, but with very definite standards. In that civilisation kindliness and good fellowship stand at the summit of the hierarchy of virtues, and a large tolerance replaces the negative prohibitions of the accepted commandments. And in all that company of children, bewildered and confused in a world which they have never learned to understand, the acceptance of a certain level of honor and of order is more clearly recognised than amongst those who, reaching towards the enforcement of austerer limitations are, perhaps, less successful in attainment. "Sometimes," says Mr. Lyons, "a sailorman in the throes of a fever may form our circle. Arthur will then arise in his might, peer over his spectacles, and lifting a withered forefinger say, 'George, I'm surprised at you. Be'ave yeself.' And George, if he be not very drunk, will subside instantly, saying, 'Righto, Guv'nor,' or he will ask respectfully for another cup of coffee and a thick 'un. at the same time challenging the company to deny that Arthur is a gentleman, or he himself a Briton."

So that amongst incidents seemingly trivial—a crying baby, a meeting of a tramp and his pal, the attempt of Arthur's soldier son to choose between two rival candidates for his affection—there is revealed a whole depth of human helpfulness and human sympathy which is not helpful, but exceedingly desirous to be so. In one of Mr. Lyons's exuberant evenings a man with a baby in his arms wearily drifts to the coffee stall, waiting for the belated all-night tram. And at once this company of nightbirds and homeless populace become absorbed in one overwhelming problem—how to stop the baby crying. "Arthur" himself starts the enterprise, "I ain't no amatoor at this business," he cheerily remarks. "Soothin' down babies is one of my specialities." So he makes grimaces, shouts, "Oy! oy! oy!" at the unfortunate infant, emits shrieks to imitate a locomotive in "a performance very unusual and distressing," bays like a bloodhound ("trying the dawg on him," he calls it), imitates various other animals—with disastrous effect. Arthur's "man" then steps into the breach. "I know a dodge about babies," he remarks. "First of all," explained the specialist, "you turn 'im over on 'is chest. Then you say, 'Hups a daisy! There's a little man!' and thumps him on his back. Then you give 'im a fork or sich like to play with. Then you say, 'Did 'e 'ave a dirty blackguard of a father then?' (No offence to you, sir, only it's the custom), and then you jerk 'im up an' down, and' 'old your breath till 'e falls asleep." This also fails. The owner of the infant meanwhile imparts reminiscences of his life, his sister and the baby, full of intimate detail, to the friendly company. A "certain old drab," half starved, is stuffed with coffee and sardines and promised "tuppence" to stop the child's "'ollering." She immediately succeeds. The tram arrives; the father and child vanish in the night. It is twenty minutes past one o'clock—in a submerged, undistinguished corner of six millions of sleeping people. But all human life is in it—the stupidity, the gravity, the generosity, the ready companionship and sympathy under misfortune which may be common to all, of half-lost, undistinguished people who normally travel through mean streets to no profitable ends.

They quote poetry—sentimental maunderings, the humorous ditties of the lower-class music-halls, or bloodthirsty, recounting how "Joe Golightly" "stabbed 'im in the spine." They crack their little jokes, and score off each other and off themselves, when in the lowest depths of poverty—with nothing between them and ultimate destitution. When prosperity comes they share with each other, standing "treat" in "cawfee" and sardines and hard-boiled eggs. There fall down to them occasionally visitants from another world, like the falling of the products of the surface zone into the abysses of the ocean floor. Now it is a "gentleman" killing himself as speedily as possible with drink and sordid adventure, on the way between prosperity and death. Now it is a "benevolent idiot" desiring to see the "darker side of London life," whose comments are received with marked disfavor by the normal members of this queer twilight world. He sees a universe which fills him with dismay. "The company, besides ourselves, numbered some dozen. There was a sailor, with vine leaves in his hair, singing love songs to another sailor, who had removed a boot, which he was laboriously polishing by means of natural moisture and a coat-sleeve. And a gentleman in a mauve squash hat was undertaking to explain to another gentleman in a fawn squash hat exactly why the harness-buckle industry had left Birmingham for Belgium. . . . Another group consisted of Trooper Alfred and Miss Hopper and Kitty and her spouse and a poor verminous old tramp: and a vain, half-witted, resentful little drab," with whom "a drayman begins to exchange witticisms,an occasion which the drayman's boy made use of to exchange coffee cups, to his own advantage, with the drayman." It is the accepted "dregs" of the City life: the product which is the despair of philanthropist and reformer, which civilisation, as Socialistic ideas develop, is going to regiment, classify, subject to medicinal and penal treatment in various forms of "home." Till that blessed day arrives it is good to think that amongst these broken people the observer can find human kindliness, and "that sweetest of all gospels—the gospel of tolerance"; and no inconsiderable amount of the happiness which comes from life lived dangerously—always just eluding the forces which make for destruction on the one hand, for good citizenship and ordered, regulated life on the other.

A NEW YEAR ENTERTAINMENT.

Not since the famous days when we were "locating" De Wet has the nation enjoyed such a riot of sensational romance as during the fortnight of the finding of Miss Violet Charlesworth. Possibly the demand for some "relief" against the fearful realism of the great Sicilian tragedy may have helped the St. Asaph mystery in its earlier stage. But the general and absorbing interest of its unravelling deserves closer consideration. Treated as a mere story its artistry would have commanded the admiration of the great American master whose genius we have just been commemorating. The writer of "The Purloined Letter" and "The Mystery of Marie Roget" might have lifted the Charlesworth episode almost intact from life to literature, and have explained the secret of its making as he feigned to do the composition of "The Raven." The staggering audacity of the original incident, the sudden midnight disappearance of a lady, young and handsome, flung through the glass screen of her motor car down a cliff into the sea, was needed to arrest the public mind torpid with Christmas and sated with earthquake. No detail in the physical environment of mystery was lacking, and the full potentiality of the motor car as an instrument of modern romance was here first utilised. Then with what admirable firmness and resource the history unfolded itself day by day in the columns of the Press as soon as the pristine simplicity of the accident was "blown upon!" The lady of the red cloak with the St. Bernard dogs, the diamonds, and the motor cars, who took great country houses, filled them with luxurious furniture, appearing and disappearing no one knew where, but from her mien and bearing evidently "one of our conquerors," was all that could be desired for a heroine. With what consummate ceremony the early hints of suspicion were pressed, gently at first, then more firmly as the clues appeared and the fond mind of the public began to settle down to disbelief in the accident! Not until then did the real zest of the hunt begin. Backwards and forwards the writer worked, probing for traces in the past, interviewing humble relatives, ransacking hotel books and the records of stockbrokers, and marking the bright outlines of a meteoric ascent from the dingy shop parlor of a Midland industrial town to the giddy heights of a plutocracy which floats from one resort of fashion to another, spreading the glory of their patronage among hotels and confiding shopkeepers, and using their stately homes as occasional places of entertainment. And how excellently did the minor characters—the sister, the chauffeur, and the friend of the family—play up to the heroine! Their firm reiteration of the original story, their masterly reticence in the face of gathering evidence, the barricaded mansion with its horde of baffled spies, the lightning visit to London, the authoritative declaration of the solicitors—what a consummate understanding of the emotions of suspicion and suspense the details of the episode appear to exhibit. It seems hard to believe that the entire play was not preconcerted and rehearsed, including the half-glimpses of the missing lady, travelling South, crossing the Irish Channel, and scattering her trunks at various railway cloak-rooms, to be duly discovered whenever the scent was beginning to grow faint. And yet the undesigned co-operation of our Press must not be denied its meed of praise in the elaboration of this famous game. For in such dramas the up-to-date reporter plays the joint parts of Chorus and Messenger in Greek tragedy. By cryptic commentary he feeds the mind of the spectators with the irony of the situation, he bandies words in rapid dialogue with the chief actors by question and answer, offering sage commonplace advice and receiving small doles of truth or falsehood for communication to the audience; he organises the slow process of discovery, retarding the premature dénouement and getting out of it the full length and variety of sensationalism, which the episode demands and admits. In the end it is he who as Messenger exhibits himself in the full pride of his garrulous impudence, telling how, disregarding every decent social convention, he managed to get on the straight track of events as they neared the climax, how he himself, as instrument of destiny, brought about the inevitable end, for the special benefit of his "halfpenny newspaper." "I have tracked her through blizzard and snowstorm across mountains and streams to the West Islands of Scotland." Then gather the secondary characters on to the scene and in accordance with the more complex economy of our modern stage no simple disclosure rings down the curtain, but instead we are left to grapple with a repudiated recognition, "She is not my sister!" a denial partly required by psychological consistency, partly dictated by a sense that the profitable possibilities of the romance may not yet be exhausted.

We have here treated the episode as a typical modern drama of notoriety, for it works out excellently upon this hypothesis. But the story is hardly less instructive if we take the more naïve supposition that Miss Violet Charlesworth and her friends conspired to get rid of her and her debts by a concocted accident, and that they were so "innocent" as to believe they could succeed by so clumsy an expedient. For the lighter self of our people has been so amply fed upon the detective novel that it is difficult to suppose that anyone capable of planning such a disappearance should not have recognised the certainty of failure.

Superior persons are busily denouncing in their superior manner the folly and sensational frivolity of the Press for its interest in such a case. We are familiar with this denunciation. But, apart from the retort that "every nation has the newspapers it deserves," there are two pleas of extenuation or explanation. The first consists in a scepticism of this superior attitude. Our experience shows that this superiority commonly consists in an emotional duplicity which first sucks the full sensational enjoyment from these vulgar episodes, and afterwards, by a backstroke of peculiarly Anglo-Saxon psychology, denounces the enjoyment got out of them by others. This is not hypocrisy in the proper meaning of that word, but belongs to that genius for getting the best out of both worlds that is so interesting a fruit of British respectability. The truth is, of course, that such a "real" story as that of Miss Charlesworth's disappearance is intrinsically exciting to every human being. It stirs a number of those most deeply-rooted instincts and emotions which are the real stuff out of which the energy of the great human drama is constituted. The passion of the hunt still survives in a thousand forms, sometimes retaining or simulating the crudest and fiercest lusts of the primitive struggle, sometimes elaborated and purified into the most refined intellectual pursuits. Hunting in packs intensifies the individual zest by a most powerful appeal to the gregarious instinct. There is no doubt something brutal and contemptible in the seething mobs that surge round the hotels and stations for a glimpse of their quarry: even the far huger crowds which follow, in sympathetic imagination, through the columns of the newspapers might be "better occupied." But it is no use quarrelling with the nature of man, or pretending he "ought" to be very different from what he is.

Such incidents as this are really serviceable touch-stones. The ordinary quiet citizen in our civilised City life has shed from his own direct experience most of the bolder mysteries and hazards in which the foundations of human nature were laid, and these disused cravings blossom in an irrepressible demand for crude romance. Much injurious satisfaction is doubtless rendered by an irresponsible Press through vulgar tales of crime and passion. But occasionally there emerges in the annals of sensational realism the comic episode of a Kœpernick or a Charlesworth case, which furnishes a rich fund of really innocent excitement. Why should it be grudged? Nor do we feel disposed to fall heavily upon any delinquencies which may attach to so entertaining a career: we rather feel that such magnificent audacity and resource have won some degree of immunity. It is, perhaps, the remnant of a Christmas mood in most of us craving entertainment, and full of gratitude towards those who please us. For the Charlesworth mystery is of a far higher order of comedy than is contained in the single romance of the motor-car. There lies a whole humorous sociology in the possibility of such a career. Trace its by-paths and secret supports, and the full complicated irrationality of our higher civilisation is exposed, with its absurd canons of social reputation, its aimless squandering of unearned resources, its wasteful ostentation, and the childish folly of that famous "credit" system which is the boast of modern economic science, and can yet be twisted to meet the pecuniary needs of a clever girl. We are thus indebted to Miss Charlesworth for a very pretty Christmas game which is not only entertaining but very educative.

THE WINTER GARDEN.

We are not about to write of hot-house flowers. They live a summer life in the midst of, but away from, the winter. More estimable are the flowers that brave the assaults of frost and snow, and the still more trying east wind, and present us with beauty in the midst of desolation. The winter blossom is as precious as it is rare. The daisy that opens now at our feet, or the catkin that swings on the bough, secures complete attention, which summer congeners usually fail to obtain. In the garden we can with care ensure, immediately after Christmas, a display of bloom that astonishes those who live in the belief that flowers belong only to the summer. It is a keen pleasure to take the uninitiated to our long border where the genus Helleborus is invited to flourish. Chief of them all is niger, with pure white blossoms of astonishing size and delicacy, and a great bundle of yellow stamens to lift it out of its order and justify the name of Christmas rose. But there are others, each with its own note of beauty, each marked in flower and stem and leaf with delicate distinction. H. angustifolius droops its head more, and has the back of its petals purple, and we have usually to tilt up the flower in order to see that the inner face is a green that seems trying to become white. The Caucasian hellebore is almost as white as the big Christmas rose, but wears its flowers two or three on a common stalk. In shape they resemble the Maréchal Niel rather than the Gloire de Dijon. Another from nearer home is orientalis, which grows in Greece, and reminds us a little more closely of our own setter-wort, now blossoming in the wood. None is prettier than that same setter-wort, and none resembles it in its almost armful of winter growth of blossom-like green, whence the perfectly proportioned and daintily colored flowers open smilingly to the keenest winds.

The long border of Christmas roses is further whitened just now with snowdrops and snowflakes, of which L. hernandesii is the earliest. And it is splashed with the warmer yellow of aconite and the purple of colchicum, with more orthodox crocuses galore to take up the running long before the present display is finished or tired of. There is blossom in the Alpine garden too. The chief of the groundlings is the Manchurian Adonis, pushing up great blossoms like a brighter and larger colt's-foot, but destined to unfold a leaf finely cut as parsley and huge as plane. The earliest of our rhododendrons has been blossoming for nearly a fortnight, and its branches are still lit with startlingly bright mauve flowers. It is R. dauricum, still too little known, and the most cheerful shrub that can grace an English garden. R. compactum follows closely after it, the buds already bursting their cerements, and by its side the especially precocious Magnolia, well-known as stellata, daily expands its hare's-foot-like buds under the pressure of the flowers within. Eyes, descending to earth once more, are greeted with the full fire-blue gaze of an anemone that, under the shelter of a warm oolitic rock, has opened its astonishing petals. Blue as hepatica, which will soon join it, this rejoices in the name of angulosa, earned, no doubt, by some quality not apparent in the flower. There are no leaves yet, as is the case with most of the very early spring flowers. It enables them to make a splash on the bare soil that is far more effective than that of even the most solitary of summer blossoms.

The flower that we would like most to welcome in our Alpine garden as early in the year as this is the papery Soldanella, which at home is the earliest of the Alpines, yet sleeps in its English rockery even to the time of bluebells. If some year we may have six inches of snow on the ground for three or four weeks, we shall expect to see Soldanella come up as in Switzerland, as soon as ever the snow vanishes, or even making a little cave for itself under the frozen crust. But, paradoxically, our mild English winters seem too severe for many of the Alpines, and they keep time not by temperature but by length of day. We must go south for our precocious blossoms. It is thence that we have got our early brooms, that are now showing their cream-colored, folded butterflies among the small but wonderfully sheltering leaves. Thence, too, the winter blossoming heathers, of which the best known are mediterranea and carnea. Every winter gardener must have these. They are a floral joy at the bleakest time of the year, and tender nurses just now to the bulbs that in March will shoot through their branches and use them as a pretty foil for their broad, clean blossoms. From further south still comes Erica lusitanica, a taller plant, now decked even more generously than carnea with creamy, almost rosy white, flowers. Beneath them is blossoming an early purple crocus that is labelled imperati. The shelter is evidently not necessary, for the same gem blossoms, this year at all events, on a higher and more exposed corner.

Flowers are not always the brightest things in the garden. Gardeners who deem it necessary to choose between winter and summer blossoms must at least have their winter berries. The brightest of them all are those with which Skimmia japonica plentifully decks itself. They are almost as clean and bright as the fruit of the wild guelder rose in hottest autumn and, thanks to their nauseous quality, now known to the birds, their number is intact. And the tips of all the branches above them are full of little flower buds eager to present us with a further crop. Better still do we like the cottager's favorite, cotoneaster or rockspray, of which there are over twenty varieties, and the pyracanthus, but, as Kipling would say, berries are another story. A beauty more nearly floral because it is vernal is that of the cornel, whose twigs are now blushing with sap till at a distance they look like bushes of bloom. They are coral. A rich yellow of the same origin is supplied by Forsythia suspensa, which is, moreover, almost prepared to deck itself in those trails of yellow bloom that make the whole shrubbery seem in flower. It is beaten in time if not in intensity of tone by Hamamelis mollis, which is, this week, easily the pride of the garden. Every little bush of it has the bare branches crusted with the rich gold. The uncalyxed petals do not stand so thick as the later, though only slightly later, daphnes, but thicker on the stiff branches than the trails of Forsythia.

The sacred Glastonbury thorn is usually accounted a thing unattainable by ordinary garden lovers. Yet science knows it under the prosaic name of "var precox," and it is not unlikely that a nurseryman would undertake to supply it. If the right variety is obtained it can be relied upon to blossom about the first week in January in fair profusion. This season it was forced out in November, and those shrivelled blossoms now accompany the haws of last summer on the tree. But now it is on the verge of opening fire again. The buds can be counted as easily as on the more usual variety in the middle of April, but, unlike that, precox blooms now without the preliminary of putting forth leaves. But with the mere mention of the calmias and of Lonicera standishii let us finish with the winter flowers in the more generally accepted sense of the term. Call them flowers or not, we cannot enjoy our garden without the rain of long, green catkins with which Garrya elliptica covers its brilliant evergreen at Christmas. And we are glad to see from the window, though not strictly in the garden, the soft silver buds that the willows and sallows are turning into gold for the ecstasy of the bees. Those who are for the spring stimulation of brood cannot have sallow catkins too near the hive, and, for other reasons, if they were not so common in the woods, most gardens would be proud to have a bush of them for spring flowering. The same or even more is to be said for fragrant colt's-foot or winter heliotrope, whether we have seen it in our own woods or sheeting a glacier's bank in Switzerland. Earliest of them all, it is a most grateful blossom; far too rarely found in gardens; not merely a pleasure to the eye but, with the exception of "winter sweet" (Chimonanthus fragrans), delicious Berberis bealii, almost the only winter flower that is scented. So winter heliotrope, last but not least of the blossoms here set down, shall bloom in our garden while the garden lasts.

Contrasts.

THE PRINCESS AND THE MESSENGER BOY.

It was long past midnight when Miss Dorothy, a fairy princess in sheeny satin and shoes of silver, swept down the staircase of the house in Onslow Gardens. The dance was still in full progress, and the music of the violins throbbed from the open doors of the drawing-room.

"You are going early," said Dorothy's last partner. "May I not see you home?"

"No, thank you. My protector will have come for me. Ah, there he is!"

The cavalier in question was on a chair in a corner of the hall: asleep. He wore the badge and belts of a District Messenger, and was fifteen years old though he looked younger.

"Mother is not well enough to take me to dances," Dorothy explained; "and father won't go. So they send a messenger-boy with a taxi to bring me home. Would you mind waking him, while I get my cloak?"

The Messenger Boy rubbed his eyes and looked up sleepily when the young man shook his shoulder. He was very tired. He had been running about through many hours; and he was rather hungry, for his supper, taken some time ago, had been light. Consequently he was less impressed by the beatific vision of Dorothy, with her golden hair, and her golden cloak thrown back from her white bosom, than by the glimpse of tables spread with food seen through a half-opened door. Then he sighed and touched his forehead and applied himself to his responsibilities.

He went out and sought the taxicab and held the door open while Dorothy got in. She lay back and thought of her dances while the vehicle hummed smoothly through the streets. The Messenger Boy sat on the seat beside the chauffeur and thought—of bed.

When the cab drew up by the curb in Warwick Square he jumped down and rang the bell and offered a hand to help the young lady out. But Dorothy shrank from the grimy touch on her garments and passed by him up the steps and into the house. Somebody came out and paid the driver and gave Dorothy's chaperon the sum of eighteen pence.

The cab glided away, and the Messenger Boy was left standing alone on the damp pavement. He put the money in his leather satchel, and began his journey to Walworth where his parents lived.

He strode sturdily along, though with dragging feet, through Lupus Street, and across Vauxhall Bridge Road, and down through narrow and darkling ways in Westminster, till he emerged under the gleam of the electric lamps shedding their white radiance upon the vacant spaces of the Embankment and the dusky levels of the river. As he turned to cross the road, a horrible figure, slouching along in filthy rags, lurched against him. "Garn, you young limb!" said a voice, hoarse from bronchitis and drink. "What d'yer mean by shoving a honest working-man? Get out of my way, you ——" But the volley of blasphemy was lost on the Messenger Boy, who put on a spurt across the bridge to catch the County Council tram waiting at the other end.

The car was already full inside with late workers going home, and the Messenger Boy shivered in the dank air as he dozed on the roof. He was chilled and stiff when he descended, and dragged himself wearily through some back streets to that one of the row of shabby cottages which was his Home.

With his latch-key, for his profession required him to possess this token of emancipation, he opened the door, and stole as softly as his thick boots allowed into the little chamber he shared with his two younger brothers. But a baby cried in the next room, and a woman's voice was heard soothing it, and he knew that he was not the only person awake.

"Mother!" he called through the thin partition; "I am so hungry. Ain't you left nothing out for me?"

"No, Tommy; your father come in late, and he hadn't had nothing since his dinner, so he ate up all the bread and cheese. Go to sleep like a good boy, and I will get out in the morning and bring you in a kipper."

Tommy sighed once more. Then he kicked off his muddy boots and piled his uniform on the broken-backed chair already encumbered with the vestments of his brethren, and got into bed, and drew the patched counterpane over him: and presently there descended upon him the infinite blessing of Sleep. But to his unawakened young soul there came no vision of the Fairy Princess in satin and silver. Instead, he dreamed of a raised pie seen through the open door in Warwick Square, and of a great dish heaped with pink and white pastry and small delicious tarts.

It was past ten o'clock the next morning when Tommy, white and wearied but with a good appetite, consumed the kipper and a big hunch of bread anointed with margarine. Being on evening duty he could permit himself the luxury of a late breakfast. It was about the same time that the maid entered the warm and fragrant little room in which Dorothy reposed, drew back the window-curtains to let in the wintry sun, and placed a tray by the bedside. The girl sat up and yawned and stretched round white arms from her frillings.

"I have brought you your breakfast, miss," said the maid. "Your mother said that you had better have it in bed. I hope you enjoyed the ball."

"Oh, it was all right; rather a dull lot, and some of the men couldn't dance a step. Will you pour out the tea, please, and give me some of that omelette? I must be getting up soon Let me see. Yes: Mummy and I are lunching out, and after that we shall be rehearsing for those theatricals all the afternoon, and then, you know, we have some people coming to dinner. I shall have quite a hard day."

SIDNEY LOW.

Open Questions.

THE FUTURE OF ENGLISH LAND.

THERE are many things in Kropotkin's "Fields, Factories, and Workshops," that have never yet received all the consideration they deserve from constructive politicians. Kropotkin claims that England could feed her own people, and adduces a vast array of facts to prove his contention. In summing up he puts his case very moderately indeed, considering the collection of evidence in the book. Briefly, if Kropotkin's evidences are of any value at all, the British people could be fed from the produce of a very much smaller area than that of their own land. The United Kingdom, though Kropotkin fails to draw the moral of the fact, is not too small, but needlessly large for its present population. With a thoroughly scientific agriculture, we should be able to live on the product of our own land, and yet have as many millions of acres lying waste as we have at the present day.

I do not think that land reformers as a class have quite realised the importance of this. We frequently hear, for instance, from advocates of land reform, complaints, not only of the difficulty of obtaining allotments or opportunities for more modern methods of culture than those of the present-day tenant farmer, but of the millions of acres landlordism has allowed to remain undeveloped at all. Such complaints are justified if we are really short of land; but how if, scientifically worked, we could raise all we needed on the land already under tillage? One market-gardener known to me, employs so much labour on twenty acres of land, that his pay-bill amounts to £30 a week. As he is a prosperous man, he must, one would think, raise no less than two thousand pounds' worth of produce annually from his twenty acres. At that rate, the whole population of the United Kingdom might be fed on an acreage not greater than that of Yorkshire! No doubt, the staple food-stuffs, corn and wheat, could not be raised to the same value on a given area; but, when one thinks of what Kropotkin has to tell about Mr. Hallett's corn seeds, and the prodigious amount of cattle food raised by scientific agriculturalists in various places already, even that hardly appears impossible.

We have now taken the first really valuable step in the direction of land reform, and the Small Holdings Act of last Session may be the beginning of a new time of transition, during which our soil will be transferred from private landlords to the people. Nay, more, the old conservatism of agricultural method may give way under better land laws to a thoroughly scientific system of culture. Then, if the evidence collected by Kropotkin and others counts for anything, we shall be able to feed our people on a small portion of the soil of England, leaving millions of acres free, if we choose to use it so, for other purposes. No doubt science could make, of our wastes and heaths, gardens as fertile as those of Essex or Kent. In my own part of the country, there are many districts yet called "moors," where the land has been under the plough for generations. Here and there, perhaps, a solitary heath plant cropping up among the grasses, may serve to remind the visitor that the fertility around him is due to the industry of man, and not to the generosity of Nature. But such instances are rare indeed, and these "moors" resemble the fields and pastures around them perfectly enough.

Land reformers, forgetting their Kropotkin, and failing to realise how much they may reasonably expect from a better land system, snatch at such illustrations eagerly enough. How many peat lands have been brought under the plough during this last generation? And how long will it be, if the present land system continues, before our mountain ranges are made to yield the food that might conceivably be raised from them? So long as we import half our food-stuffs from abroad, every unused piece of land appears as a visible condemnation of landlordism to those who know that such land might support many people. The parks of country gentlemen, as well as the deer forests of Scotland, come in for vigorous criticism, and our millions of acres of uncultivated land are part of the land-reformers' stock-in-trade of invective.

But this, as I said above, is only justifiable if we allow ourselves to lose sight of the higher possibilities of culture. Landlordism has got many sins to answer for, but that of leaving a vast part of the country untouched by the spade or the plough is not one of them. The fault is in the antiquated and imperfect cultivation of the area already reclaimed; for that acreage ought to be amply sufficient for all our needs. That landlordism has left a large part of England waste may readily be its one redeeming virtue in the eyes of posterity, who will be less desirous of more land for culture—on a very small acreage they will know well how to raise a very large quantity of food—as for recreation. Science may enable us to get an indefinite increase in the yield of an acre used for raising food-stuffs; but, in no way, can it increase the size of a given area devoted to health and pleasure.

If, by a reform of our land system, we can reorganise agriculture so effectually as to be able to raise from our present pastures and plough lands enough to feed our people, enlightened humanism will have better uses for our mountains and heaths than to plough them up also. Our great mountain ranges are the natural parks of the British people, though we have not yet learnt to understand our need for such things. It is only within the last generation that our manufacturing towns have come to feel the need for recreation grounds and parks for their inhabitants. In a pitiful way, they have tried to provide their peoples with places where the children may play on Saturday, or where their elders may take a walk in the summer evenings. Some towns, indeed, whose populations run into hundreds of thousands, which are, in consequence, collectively almost as rich as a duke is individually, have public parks as good as the private one of a wealthy country gentleman. In the smaller towns, unless open spaces have been inherited from a more leisured age, when land had not risen to famine prices, the parks are depressing enough, hardly better than nothing.

Fortunately, the age of landlordism has not found it profitable to break up the greater commons of England. From Cheviot Hill to the Peak stretches a vast natural park, not much short of two hundred miles long, dividing the busy industrialism of North-Eastern and North-Western England by miles and miles of breezy heath land. Further westward again, rise the peaks of the lake country, from the summits of which you can look across the sea, almost to the Snowdon range—another magnificent natural park. Dartmoor, with its red deer, is yet another area, ready formed by Nature for the recreation ground of the peoples of Bristol and Plymouth. These lands have at present very little money value; and if we introduce scientific culture into the lowlands, never need have, even under the most perfect and effective land system. The food of England may be grown, and the people of England scattered upon the intervening space, with room enough and to spare for their daily work, leaving this natural heritage for other national purposes, as important as money-making.

We want places where, not only the favored few, but, in turn, all the hard-working people of the nation, can spend, not a Saturday afternoon, but a long holiday in communion with untamed, ungardened Nature, without overcrowding. We shall want, even in the highest civilisation, at least the possibility of occasional solitude, if only to learn the value of human fellowship. These things the preservation of our heaths and mountains in their wild state can alone provide. The vision of an England cultivated, from the coasts to the top of Skiddaw, is a vision possible enough, perhaps, for science can do greater wonders than that; but it is a vision of an England whose inhabitants must live an incomplete, because too regular a life, unless they can afford the time and money for that commune with Nature only possible abroad. We should preserve our national parks, in order that our future citizens may grow up, not Philistines, but complete and humanised men and women.

It seems to me that enlightened progressivism in the country demands, not only policies of the town and of the country, but of the waste also. Our mountain lands are not, indeed, useful only as parks. The lower slopes of the hills should be made practically useful as public forests. Private enterprise will always lag behind in the matter of afforestation; for private enterprise does not like to wait until trees grow for a return on its investments. Yet we import millions of pounds' worth of timber yearly; and are likely, as the forests of the world shrink, to have to pay very dearly for this in the future. Again, the mountain ranges are the gathering grounds of our water supply, a thing done in a very piecemeal, unsatisfactory fashion, alike by private and municipal enterprise. The national water supply should be a national undertaking; neither a private company nor a corporation should have the power to exploit for its own use, irrespective of the needs of other districts, the rainfall of any of our large mountain gathering grounds. The whole thing should be organised from the centre, and the water needed for every town and village distributed evenly, as it is required.

Advanced politicians should cultivate a vision of the England they desire to build. To me it seems that the sort of society we may be able to create with a generation of successful effort is something like this: More scattered and varied towns, with houses rarely or never more than twelve to the acre, almost insensibly passing into suburbs, and then into thickly peopled country lands, connected everywhere by electric rail and tramways. As we passed from town to country, we should be conscious chiefly of a reduction in the number of shops and business places, and of an increase in the size, together with a certain change in the general character of the garden lands. There would be in the larger gardens, a greater proportion of room for vegetables, and a growing tendency to devote strips of suitable land to the growth of carefully selected wheat, from seeds bearing from 500 to 2,500 grains each, and yielding sixty or seventy bushels per acre. Here and there, heavy crops of beet or other cattle food would be keeping two head of kine to the acre; until, as we got further from the town market for vegetables, the greater proportion of the land would be utilised in this way, and the population would have been reduced by insensible degrees, from fifty or sixty to the acre, to about one.

Behind all this, however, would still stretch the great playgrounds of the nation, inhabited permanently by only four classes of people: woodmen; those who warded the herds of red deer and other harmless animals, which it might be the study of the nation not to hunt, but to preserve; the workmen and officials of the national water supply; and those who had charge of the numerous guest-houses, temporary or permanent, in the clearances of the forest or the solitude of the moor. For these national parks would contain a numerous enough population of visitors, though not crowded as they are in the watering-places of present-day England; for the area over which they would be spread would suffice to bear a million visitors at a time, without spoiling the quiet, for the sake of which they had left their homes.

Letters to the Editor.

"WHY?"

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I did not see the letter in THE NATION, of January 9th, headed "Why?" and signed "Fiat Lux," till late in the week, and then felt sure, as it has proved, that many would feel impelled to write of other aspects of the case, beside that of the terror and dismay which are the first natural feelings of us all in face of so awful a catastrophe.

A friend who lived through similar terrors in the earthquake of 1887 on the Riviera, wrote of the strangeness and the desolation around him, while above the terrible scene "stretched the clear still heavens and the fading morning stars, which gave no answer to the human question 'Why?' No answer? None there, because the answer is so wide, and long, and deep."

But, sir, as many writers have suggested in your pages, there are other considerations. And one is—that the natural forces which, at times working according to their own laws, make havoc on the earth's surface, are the very same forces which have brought into being the wonder and the beauty of this fair world, in which we live, and love and suffer. Again, is it not the magnitude of the scale on which we see these natural forces act in such a disaster as an earthquake, which appals our imagination, and blinds us for a moment to the spiritual invisible world, of which the world we see is but a garment?

The everyday experience that the fire by whose warmth the little child plays merrily, can also, by its natural forces, consume in a moment that happy innocence if unguarded, this does not appal us in the same way, because of its familiarity. But it is a problem to which the huge disaster in Calabria is only a parallel. Is not the thought which alone has power to dispel the terror of the ruthless natural forces under whose laws we live as physical beings, this—that in them we do not, cannot see, for they are not there, the spiritual forces whose laws operate in their own sphere, where man lives as a spirit? It is in that sphere that man may dare to say he knows God—the God who is the "Father of spirits." And it is surely possible to believe that in the horrors of earthquake, no less than in the lonely agonising sufferings of disease or in the fiery torments of the martyr at the stake, the immortal spirit is sustained and borne through the awful hour by virtue of its eternal union with God. This faith should quiet us, by reminding us that when we speak of the life of the spirit, we speak of that which is eternal by its very nature, since "God is not a God of the dead, but of the living." In other words, the existence of God carries with it the continued existence of those who have lived for His service. —Yours, &c.,

LUX IN TENEBRIS.

January 20th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the discussion aroused in your columns by the Messina disaster as to the compatability of Divine omnipotence with Divine love, two facts may claim to have weight.

First, no prophet was needed to proclaim in 1908 the dangers of the Messina region. Of those dangers merciful warning has been reiterated by past experience.

Secondly, men are not compelled by Divine omnipotence to live amongst predicted dangers; to question the Divine mercy, therefore, as permitting the Messina holocaust appears as little just as it would be to lay the blame for a shipwreck on the hoister of the storm-cone.—Yours, &c.,

(MRS.) A. S. BEVERIDGE.

Pitfold, Shottermill, Haslemere, R.S.O.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Is not the question of "Why the Messina Earthquake?" mere pother, arising from man's self-complacency arrogating to him a preposterous place in creation?

The universe is known to be boundless, all that that word involves in its simple nakedness. Joshua's command to one sun to stand still was meekness itself in comparison with the claim that this transcendent machine should go out of its way in evolution for the convenience of a few thousands of human beings, during a very limited period!

Man uses Nature merely for his own immediate advantage, without any pretence of altruistic or higher aim. The lower animals are allowed no regard at all where this is concerned. But the interval between the Author of Creation and mankind is infinitely greater than that between man and the worm (of one sort or other) that, for a mere whim, he crushes to accidental death and torture beneath his motor-car wheel.—Yours, &c.,

M.

January 16th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—"Fiat Lux," in his sincere and pathetic letter of January 9th, utters the cry of all men to whom life is a deeply serious concern, and to whom reverence for the highest and holiest is a necessity. It is pathetic because it is the cry of all humanity, in its fullest development, and because it is as the cry of a suffering child to whom nothing we can do will afford relief.

But the great catastrophe does not appear to me to be more than one of the infinite number of events in human experience which present the same unanswerable enquiry. The mere quantitative gravity of the event—the massing together of tragedies by the thousand—is nothing more than the presentation, at once, of all the tragedies which at any moment are being enacted over the whole world, and they are not less significant because they are separate events. Those who at this moment are dying slowly and inevitably from some dreadful disease are suffering torture which is tragic.

Why is it so? I agree with the writer that there is no complete answer which we are able to give. The obvious reply, and, equally obviously, the insufficient reply, is because this great population was housed in a region where the crust of the earth is too thin, and liable to crack. The answer is the same as that which must be given if it were asked why those skaters on the Regent's Park water years ago were suddenly immersed and, many of them, drowned: They ought not to have been there, if safety from death by drowning were the supreme object for them.

But are we bound to form a more complete answer in order to maintain a standing ground for our faith in God? It is beyond question that such a faith implies a sphere of action entirely beyond our narrow limitations. Centuries ago an event such as that which has just occurred was attributed to the direct action of God in punishment of wickedness. In the same history, recording a much later event, the wholesale destruction of the opponents of the Hebrews was represented as commanded by God. Another aspect presents itself to-day. We require an answer to the question raised because we have an ideal by which we judge the event. It seems a gross failure of justice in the light of this ideal. But from what source have we obtained our ideal? Is it not from the spirit of reason and justice which is God's gift to man? Was it not from the life of One who suffered in a manner, which, judged from our limited standpoint, involved all the horrible injustice of tragedies, whenever they occur; and from such as He who have been God's messengers to us, to teach us a more righteous judgment than the judgment of the ancient Hebrews? The enquiry from this point of view involves the question: "What, then, is the source of our enlightenment—of our inspiration?" How does it happen that there is a clearly observable evolution in the character of man with a constant tendency to develop higher traits, and to assert the superiority of the spiritual to the merely physical? Any answer dependent alone on a tendency to find the way of life which is most convenient, and produces the least friction, is wholly unsatisfactory. We do not invent our system of thought—we discover it: the truth was always there, but at first unseen. Man finds himself in his true character when he recognises that which is divine as his true self. It is the revelation to him of absolute reality, otherwise undiscoverable.

Thus the problem is not to find why life is filled with suffering, is tragic, but to determine whether we have a sure ground of faith. Suffering seems to need justification because our ideal which it offends is so full of beauty and happiness. To us suffering is an offence; but in the coarser world of the ancients it presented no problem such as it presents to us.

Clearly the way towards solution is in the direction of our Faith. A fuller knowledge of how the spiritual elements in our being involve all its ultimate issues may bring us harmony. The denial of our Faith is utter and hopeless discord—the pure negative. It is the belief that life has no meaning, no end, that, although everything in the universe has its position of relative sufficiency, life, in its highest forms, is without any justification.

But is not such a denial really unfounded in fact? Is there not good reason for believing that the whole course of development is from and through the physical upward to the spiritual? All science is an expression of existence in terms of reason, always tending to the negation of every diversity in some greater unity. And are not the laws of the spirit world—the special sphere of man—in like manner a development; every negation being resolved in a greater affirmation right up to the conception of the absolute—the idea, as Hegel terms it?

We have before us now a terrible presentation of the negative side of life. We, as yet at any rate, cannot resolve it satisfactorily with the knowledge we have. It is precisely here that the demand for Faith comes in. Faith is the acknowledgment—the worship of that which is infinitely good, and the absolute surrender to it. Its object—the supremely good—is not destroyed by difficulties which we are wholly unable to solve in any completely satisfactory manner.

In history we have never found that suffering has destroyed faith—often enough, both in individuals and in States, ease and luxury have done so. The destruction has been not only of the Faith, but also of those who have been faithless. Faith can always appeal to its fruits—from it comes the fullest possible life and vigor.

But it will be said the basis of the argument is sentiment, not hard fact. To such a criticism I will only suggest an indirect reply. If one appeals to intelligence or looks for appreciation of any pure sentiment, and finds no response, he may be annoyed, he may be pitiful, he will certainly be sorrowful, but he will not think himself the one who is to be counted as wanting, or the others as being the more reasonable. And if this is so in simple things, is it not equally so in the highest, even right up to the sense of the presence in human experience of the supreme reality?—Yours, &c.,

WALTER HOWARD.

Croxley, Weybridge,
January 16th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The writer of the letter signed "Fiat Lux" in your issue of the 9th inst. has my sincere sympathy, for I suffered for many years more or less as he—in contemplation of the Sicilian disaster—now does.

I can only recommend him to study and to adopt—not necessarily as facts, but at least as "working hypotheses"—the Eastern beliefs of Re-incarnation and Karma, and he will find his difficulties disappear like mist before the rising sun.

That these doctrines are explicit or implicit in the inner teachings of all the great religions of the world should be good evidence of their truth; but still better evidence, to my mind, is the fact that they "justify the ways of God to Man" as our modern orthodoxy cannot hope to do; that they explain numberless mysteries of life, from the puzzles of heredity upwards; that they harmonise with all other truths; and that they show the world to be after all a sane world, pervaded by Love and managed on principles of the strictest Justice.—Yours, &c.,

FIAT JUSTITIA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The simple answer to the question of "Fiat Lux" is that men who choose to live on an earthquake belt must bear the risks. But your correspondent raises again the questions which man in the presence of pain and death has been for ever asking, and the answer in its complete form is yet to seek. But is it true that there is no answer to these questions? Surely there are aspects of the problem, points of view, from which it is possible to descry some more or less distinct vision of a balanced whole.

"Fiat Lux" half grasps a clue in saying, "Go and tell it to the orphans and the widows . . . . to the maimed and crushed and dying, and see what their answer will be," only to miss it. The problem of pain was just as acute before Messina as after. In London and Italy, in every home, in every life there is, or is to come, a great burden of suffering, mental and physical. It is fair to say the earthquake has not greatly altered the sum of pain in the world—and with pain I, of course, include unhappiness—one way or the other. Many victims of the disaster have found a blessed relief; certainly many have learnt new truths giving new hope, faith, purpose in life. Go to those who have suffered, not to-day, but to-morrow, and ask them of the road God has led them; aye, "go to the orphans and the widows, to those who have lost their all . . . to the maimed and crushed and dying, and see what their answer will be." If experience is worth anything, few of those who have spiritual life will fail to say that the pain was good; and those who know God by experience best will be clearest in their testimony. Those who remain most like animals will fail to see good; they may fail to get it, but that is another question.

The issue is confused if we try to think in big numbers. If we could add together and consider the pain among 200,000 people in any one day anywhere we should be appalled. But if we think of them as individuals, we realise that they are but as we are—men "born to trouble"—and we see with greater or less clearness that the school in which we live and learn, suffer and grow strong, lose and become thankful is the school which also suits the individuals who make the world's millions—I write only of those who have living faith in God; I do not expect others to answer the question, "Why?" Who is there who has put his trust and his life in his Maker's keeping who does not believe that any sorrow far enough behind to be seen in perspective was a blessing? May we be saved from failure when our next trial comes, lest, being tried, we are found wanting! Let me quote lines written recently by a wise and good woman: "The longer I live, the more I feel that all will be well in everything, even though it seems hard to understand—and that God has a wonderful way, not only of leading us when we suffer through no fault of our own, but of turning even our frailties and wilfulnesses to good, and bringing the whole ugly world into harmony with His being."

Has "Fiat Lux" tried to picture the world of men as they now are with pain absent? That problem, if fairly tackled will, I believe, go far to answer the "Why?" And in the search he may find that it is not of itself "sinful to question or to doubt." A father expects to be asked questions by his children and some he answers.—Yours, &c.,

HUGH LEADER.

THE DOMINATING ISSUE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As one of your constant subscribers, I have read with interest your powerful article on "The Dominating Issue." I should much esteem the privilege of a little of your valuable space for comment.

Like many other hardworking Liberals, I have advocated a limitation of the powers of the House of Lords to reject Bills sent up from the Commons, and I consider that limitation a necessary preliminary to some of the most important and necessary reforms; but I look upon the House of Lords as a general would look upon a strong fortress—as a stronghold to be attacked by mine and parallel and with powerful batteries, and not as a place to taken by direct assault.

For many years I have considered how the Commons can gain the victory, and it appears that there is only one way, and that is by means of the Royal prerogative.

I have no doubt that prerogative will be exercised as desired by the Commons when it becomes evident to the Sovereign that the steadfast will of the people is on the side of the Commons.

Hitherto, such evidence has not been forthcoming. In 1868 the people elected a Liberal House. After six years of the best government this country had hitherto known, the people returned the Conservatives to power—a party which "thanks God for the House of Lords." In 1880, aided by the matchless eloquence of Gladstone, the Liberals again came into power. In 1886 the party that "thanks God for the House of Lords" was again returned with a large majority. In 1892, thanks again to Gladstone's eloquence, the Liberals came in with a small majority. In 1895, in response to Lord Rosebery's appeal to the nation to return him to power with such a majority that he could curb the dominating spirit of the House of Lords, the nation instead returned the opposite party to power with an overwhelming majority. This majority was repeated in 1900, and up to that date, at any rate, it must have been evident to the Sovereign that the House of Commons did not desire any limitation of the powers of the Lords. In 1906 at last the people, well led it is true, but without the inspiring eloquence of a Gladstone, returned the Liberal Party with an unprecedented majority in the Commons. But is this one election enough to satisfy the Sovereign that he must modify the Constitution in a most important matter? I hardly think so. I do not think the King would be justified in making a change in the Constitution simply upon the results of one election. I think he would justly say, "Let me see the result of the next election. If after six years of Liberal Government, upon appeal to the nation, the Liberal Party is again returned with a large majority, then I may consider that the electors are steadfast in their desire to limit the powers of the House of Peers, and I will then use my prerogative to give effect to what is obviously the will of the nation."

Let the Liberal Government continue to use its great majority in the Commons for such good work as it can effect. For my part, I consider that it is a happy thing to live under such a Government, as compared with the Government that preceded it. Most of us are prepared to fight when the next election comes, and, for my part, I think we shall win, but I am quite sure the electors do not desire perpetual turmoil. They sent this Government to power to do what it could. Every person of common sense knew that the House of Lords would reject many measures passed through the Commons, but I am quite sure those who worked to put the present Government in power never did so with the intention that they should spend their forces in a contest with the Upper House before this Parliament had run its proper course. We wish to see if the nation can be steadfast. If it cannot be—if there is to be a perpetual wobble—on what ground can the Sovereign alter our ancient Constitution?—Yours, &c.,

ARNOLD LUPTON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Is it not very problematical that the scheme proposed by the late Prime Minister can pass through the Lords? And even if the Lords accepted that scheme, we should still have a great hindrance to be overcome. And if the power of the Lords is taken away, we might just as well do without a second Chamber altogether. Are the people ready to end the Lords by a revolutionary movement? If not, we may adopt the theory of J. S. Mill: that in this democratic country the Lords will never oppose anything that they judge the country really wants. So that if the country can be got to go on voting against the peers, we shall in time get things done, as, in fact, things have been done in the past. The peers are really helped by voters turning from Liberals into disappointed mugwumps. Mending the Lords is a slow and not a sure finish to their power. To end them is a revolution, and some of us are ready if the thing is to be really put through to a settlement. There are certain great reforms that people say we shall never get until the Lords are ended. If we are not ready to exercise the amount of force necessary to end the hereditary chamber, then we ought to slowly kill it by steadily voting at by-elections and general elections against Toryism. May I suggest that Progressives all over the country adopt this slow poisoning, by means of steady voting, if we cannot have our revolution as in the days of the Stuarts.—Yours, &c.,

MR. SEAMAN'S PRONUNCIATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In to-day's NATION you say that you were trained in the Whig tradition of pronunciation, and that, therefore, you cannot allow that "the last letters in 'satiate' have the same value as the last letters in 'palliate.'"

I, too, am a Whig pur sang; but for the life of me I cannot imagine any difference in sound between the termination of "satiate" and the termination of "palliate."

The other instance which you cite—of "Ate" made to rhyme with "Plate"—of course is shocking. The Whigs pronounced "ate" as if it were "et"—and so, I imagine, did everyone else.—Yours, &c., G. W. E. R.

PUBLIC OPINION AND THE DEATH PENALTY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—You must have relied on the statement of some imaginative reporter when you said last week that "the Parisian population turn out in multitudes to cheer" the executioner. No such incident has been heard of in Paris. A crowd of no very large dimensions assembled at the station to meet Deibler when he returned from Béthune, but the cries of "Vive Deibler" which were raised by a few persons were not taken up by the crowd, composed (as may be imagined) of not the best elements of Parisian society. I have been out on the boulevards to find the postcards of Deibler with the guillotine which you say "are selling like wildfire in the streets of Paris," but cannot find them, and nobody whom I have asked has seen one. Very probably there are such postcards, but I do not think that they are selling like wildfire.

The truth is that public opinion is so hostile, at any rate, to public executions, that the authorities are gravely embarrassed by the protests of every quarter of the city against the erection of the guillotine in its midst. So much so, that they are considering the expedient of holding an execution without any notice, before the inhabitants of the favored quarter have had time to show their resentment.

It is most improbable that the reaction in favor of capital punishment, which has been worked up by the "Matin" with the assistance of the Conservative press, will be of long duration. Before long we shall again see juries finding "extenuating circumstances" in almost every murder case, in order to prevent a capital sentence. The result, as before, will be that murderers will be executed in a few departments, such as Seine-et-Oise, and not in the others, unless, as before, the President intervenes. What is wanted in France is not capital punishment, but some corrective of the vagaries of juries, which make it a matter of chance whether a criminal will be convicted at all. If the people who have been clamoring for blood had directed their energies towards working up an agitation against the practice of acquitting every murderer whose crime can, by any stretch of imagination, be called a "crime passionnel," they might have done some good.—Yours, &c.,

"SUFFRAGETTE HISTORY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Some time ago you kindly published a letter I wrote under the above heading. I am now the fortunate possessor of a treatise entitled: "The Sphere of Man," from which I am informed Miss Pankhurst derives some of her most startling "facts." It is an historical work from the pen of a Mrs. Stopes, and to do it full justice would require a Macaulay in his most vitriolic mood.

It appears that the rights of woman are really founded on the provisions of Magna Carta, which Mrs. Stopes spells "Charta," and to which she assigns the date 1214! In this document we are told the word "homo" includes woman as well as man; and the rest of the book is devoted to proving the "hominal" rights of woman. The only ground for this translation of homo vouchsafed by Mrs. Stopes is the statement that, in Magna Carta, "vir" stands for "man, not woman," while "baron and femme represented husband and wife." As a matter of fact, the word "vir" only occurs once in the Charter, and there it is used (clause 54) in the sense of "husband." The Norman French word "feme" (not femme) used in later legal documents does not occur in Magna Carta at all; and "baron" certainly does not mean husband. I presume that Mrs. Stopes would translate clause 21 "Comites et barones non amercientur nisi per pares suos" as applicable to earls and husbands.

The assumption that "homo" includes woman is difficult to accept. For example, in clause 4, where wardship is to be entrusted "duobus legalibus et discretis hominibus." The legal woman was unknown to the thirteenth century, but that was far before the era of Mrs. Stopes. Nor, again, can the provisions as to "homo" and "liber homo" in clauses 23 and 27 be reasonably supposed to include woman as well as man. Woman under Magna Carta enjoyed, we are told, "all the privileges of men." This statement is based on clause 40, which Mrs. Stopes says is the "main clause"; although Stubbs—poor ignorant man—thought clauses 12-15 the most important.

Clause 40 reads: "Nulli vendemus, nulli negabimus aut differemus rectum aut justiciam"; and "nulli," according to Mrs. Stopes, includes woman.

But alas for the chivalry of our forefathers, since clause 54 enacts "Nullus capiatur nec imprisonetur propter appellum foeminae de morte alterius quam viri sui."

A very proper restriction no doubt; but if woman was to enjoy all the privileges of man, it is curious that she was not allowed to bring any criminal charge except concerning the death of her own husband. And this is the only reference to woman in the Charter, except in the character of "vidua" or "uxor."—Yours, &c.,

EQUAL WORK FOR EQUAL WAGES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Women, I suppose, ought to read with gratitude the concession, granted in quite the "Spectatorial" manner by THE NATION this week—that any wage court or tribunal for determining wages ought to be endowed with a discretion to make equal payment to women employees wherever positive evidence is brought, that she does in point of fact act as the chief wage-earner.

It is rather disheartening to find that a leader writer in a paper of democratic and Radical idealist sympathies fails to state that this principle of equal pay for equal work done is wider and deeper than anything suggested by him in that article. His misconceptions ooze out even in his counsels of perfection. It is the woman, we notice, who must bring the positive evidence that she is the chief wage-earner, before she may receive equal pay for the equal service rendered to the employer. We suppose that the woman who is straining every effort with a view to support her mother and to relieve her elder sisters of their burden in the near future (and there are such cases) is to be told that she must remain content to receive less pay than her work is worth according to the male standard of value. However, she might possibly be kindly permitted to take—if she could get them—equal wages with a man if she explained her ideals and intentions to the Wages Board, presumably composed of men. It is at this injustice of sex-discrimination, of which your leader writer has gratuitously invented a fresh instance, that the advancing women are now tilting with all the force that absence of effective political significance leaves them. It is not sex antagonism, on the contrary, it is the liberating movement for a removal of artificial barriers based on sex distinctions.

The discovery that the application of the principle, equal pay for equal work done, will lead to a displacement in employment is, after all, not so new to the "advancing," we are glad to note the adjective, woman as apparently your writer thinks. After all, common sense and discoveries are monopolies of no one sex. But it has occurred, further, to some of us that the principle we support leads to efficiency and suitability as the tests of employment. And we would be glad to merge the question of sex in the wider considerations of efficiency. Whether the displacement of employment caused by the application of the sole test of efficiency would be confined mainly to men or mainly to women is a question to which no certain answer can yet be given.

It is an old, old story, though we had hoped to have been spared it as a sublimation of the advanced Radical mind. Every alternative is utilised and every contrivance invented rather than admit the woman's point of view. If women ask for direct Parliamentary influence they are told that Royal Commissions sometimes receive the evidence of women, and if they ask for economic equality, the question (to be applied solely to women) is sprung on them as to how large a family do they keep. It all heaps emphasis on the contention that the women's point of view can never be voiced properly except by women and can never be effective in action or debate until they gain their share in the common denominator of political action. Until that be won they can never have means to accomplish what they may will or hope or dream of political good.—Yours, &c.,

"THE HOME LIFE OF JESUS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your excellent article on "The Home Life of Jesus" fails to notice an inference which, I think, may be fairly drawn from an undoubed fact, and is in itself note worthy. This fact is that when Jesus paid his first visit to Nazareth after beginning his public ministry and causing considerable excitement at Capernaum, his fellow-townsmen were altogether unprepared to recognise him as a prophet or a distinguished rabbi. The inference we may draw is that during the years that Jesus lived at Nazareth he did nothing to lead his friends to expect that he would thus distinguish himself. The boy of twelve who aroused much interest among the learned men at Jerusalem returned to his home and devoted himself entirely to his duties. Nor was there any change when the boy became a man so long as home claims were paramount. He did one thing at a time. He did not practise preaching. But, as your article well points out, the experience of home life and the doing of home duty furnished him with the material which formed the vehicle of his subsequent religious teaching. He was prepared for his prophetic work, though Nazareth was not prepared to expect it. May I add that the scenes described in Mark III., when his friends declare he is out of his mind and endeavor to lay hold of him, when his mother and his brethren come seeking him, and Jesus, looking on the multitude around him, declares of them, "Behold my mother and my brethren!" are a touching indication of the sorrow which must have marked the close of that happy, loving, home life at Nazareth. It was joy and peace while it lasted, but it had to be given up when yet higher claims of duty made themselves heard, first, through the preaching, and, then, through the imprisonment of John the Baptist.—Yours, &c.,

OLD AGE PENSIONERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I ask for further figures than those you give on January 2nd as to the working of the Old Age Pensions Act? Your commentary—that in the case of Ireland "there was obvious fraud," has set me trying to fit in your statistics with those of the census of 1901, and also leads me to ask your readers to look at any mere figures by the light of actual conditions of life in Ireland.

The total of claims is stated by you to be 690,000, but that would not represent even the lowest of the percentages you name on the Blue-book total of persons of 70 and above, even minus those in receipt of relief. I ask myself whether 690,000 can mean, allowing for other omissions, the total of claims from Ireland? For that might represent a possible 128 per cent., and, further, any comparison naturally should be based upon the respective totals, seeing that the number of persons of the stated age in Ireland is, roughly, to those of England and Wales as 7 to 5. But there are other things that occur to anyone who knows Ireland. For instance, the common poverty. Thirty pounds a year is not a large sum, but it is more than a great number of the middle-class, not to speak of the poor, can look to in old age—at least, as regards women. Further, applications were asked for in October, and certificates were not to be had immediately, if at all, so the age had to be filled in according to the applicants' recollection of some event—the "night of the big wind," or a memory of the age he or she was "in the bad times," or of the age that a relative long dead had sometime said that he or she was.

Such condemnation as yours has been already often made by persons who do not reflect that they accuse not only the poor, but also those persons in positions of trust often equal to their own who were witnesses to the applications. But it is for the poor I write, who should be given the benefit of any doubt, since they cannot defend themselves, and to whom the Act was known as "The Charity"—a word which, I think, has among themselves often but one limit, that of absolute inability to help.—Yours, &c.,

Zo, I've been to Saunders' Well
And spoke a word wi' Nanny Hart,
And I've a got a sartin spell
To meake yon little messan smart.
The yarbs and roots was long to search;
But one thing more and 'twill be good.
O Zunday next, to Hinton Church,
I'll dra' a drop o' Susie's blood.

I got a niddle on my chearm:
A long'un wi' a sharpened p'int.
Just vit to stick droo Susie's arm
An inch below the elbow j'int.
'Twill warm my heart to hear her squeak;
But when behind her she do look,
I'm zittun there zo meek as meek,
Wi' both my eyes upon my book.

And when the spell be mixed and made,
Like craiping fire 'twill bite and gnaw;
And cut her like a reazor blade,
And nip her like a partan's claw;
And vear and vret her day and night,
And break her sleep wi' ugly drames,
Till she do wake in awful vright
And rouse the neighbors wi' her scrames.

And when she can no more endure,
Then she shall come and beg and pray
Vor just one word her pains to cure:
But that one word I'll niver zay,
Till she be on her dyin' bed
And gives me back my vancy man.
And Geargey Moon and me will wed
The day they bury Susie Ann.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE recent prize competitions for novels have called into existence a huge crowd of manuscripts which now threatens to cause some embarrassment to publishers and their readers. One of the firms offering a prize for the best novel sent them received nearly four hundred manuscripts, and allowing for an equal number having been called forth by other competitions—a very moderate estimate—we have a total of eight hundred new novels aspiring for publication in addition to the normal supply which comes from practised writers of fiction. Most of the writers who failed to gain a prize are now offering their manuscripts to other publishers, and we have heard of one reader who received four large boxes filled with manuscript fiction in a single week. One publisher suggests that the best way of dealing with the congestion is to have a central office in which all readers' reports might be filed for reference.

UNDER the title "Oxford Lectures on Poetry," a selection from the lectures delivered by Dr. A. C. Bradley while Professor at Oxford will be published shortly by Messrs. Macmillan. There are to be twelve lectures included in the volume, four on Shakespeare, two on Wordsworth, and one each on Shelley and Keats. The titles of the remaining four are "The Long Poem in the Nineteenth Century," "Poetry for Poetry's Sake," "The Sublime," and "Hegel's View of Tragedy." Holders of the Oxford Chair of Poetry have given us some fine criticism, among which must be reckoned Dr. Bradley's former work on Shakespearean Tragedy. In the meantime we may ask when is the next instalment of Professor Courthope's masterly "History of English Poetry" to make its appearance? The fifth volume, which brings the work down to the end of the eighteenth century, was published in 1905. We hope that Professor Courthope will soon complete a work which, within its limits, is one of the ablest contributions to literary history made by the present generation.

A BIOGRAPHY of the Rev. Thomas Short, the famous Vice-President of Trinity College, Oxford, has been written by Mr. C. E. H. Edwards, and will be published immediately by Mr. Elliot Stock. In his entertaining "Reminiscences of Oxford," the Rev. W. Tuckwell tells some delightful stories of Short, who was a noted talker in days when conversation was cultivated at Oxford as a fine art. Short himself used to say that the Oriel men, including Whately and Davison, habitually crammed for after-dinner talk. His own colloquial felicities showed no signs of preparation. When asked to furnish a motto for Rugby in the days when the school was ruled by Dr. Wooll, a small man with a great belief in the cane, Short instantly answered, "Great cry and little Wooll." Once, when examining in the Schools, Short asked an undergraduate what mention is made of Marriage in the Articles. The reply given without hesitation was, "That it is a fond thing vainly invented, without any warrant either in antiquity or Scripture." Another story told by Mr. Tuckwell is that Short, arriving late at a house where he usually could count on a rubber of whist, learned that Hugh McNeile, the famous Evangelical preacher, had unexpectedly come upon a visit, and that whist was to be supplanted by a Scripture reading and exposition. Very cross, he sat down to endure. The preacher read a passage from the "Acts": "They knew that the island was called Melita." "The d—— they did!" was heard from Short's corner. Newman was one of Short's pupils, and when the future Cardinal was being examined for the Oriel Fellowship, which practically determined his career, he went to Short, saying that he had broken down completely, and it was useless for him to go on with the examination. Short gave Newman a good luncheon and advised him to persevere, with the result that the day following Newman was elected Fellow of Oriel.

A HISTORY of "Social Life at Rome in the Age of Cicero," by Mr. W. Warde Fowler, will be published in a few weeks by Messrs. Macmillan. Mr. Fowler believes that his book will fill a gap, for although "the society of the Augustan age, which in many ways was very different, is known much better, and Professor Dill's fascinating volumes have familiarised us with the social life of two several periods of the Roman Empire," still there is "no book in our language which supplies a picture of life and manners, of education, morals, and religion in that intensely interesting period," the age of Cicero. This is all the more remarkable considering that in the Ciceronian correspondence there is abundant material for such a work. There is, however, an English translation of the late Gaston Boissier's suggestive and very scholarly "Cicero and His Friends."

"THE BRITISH TAR IN FACT AND FICTION" is the title of a work by Commander C. N. Robinson and Mr. John Leyland, which Messrs. Harper will have ready for publication early next month. The book is designed to show the large place which personal influence has always held in naval warfare, but there are chapters dealing with the sailor in fiction, drama, and song, which promise to be of special interest since the subject has never been thoroughly dealt with. The sailors of Defoe, Smollett, and Marryat provide plenty of attractive material, while "The Sea Language and the Dramatic Poets," "The Sailors in the Restoration Drama," and "The Evolution of the Nautical Play" are all interesting headings. Most English novelists have drawn their sailors as kindly and engaging, though superficially rough and fond of horse-play, though Fanny Burney is a marked exception. "The more I see of sea captains," she wrote, "the less reason I have to be ashamed of Captain Mirvan . . . I quite rejoice I showed the book to no one 'ere printed, lest I should have been prevailed on to soften his character."

THE manuscript of "Goethe's Conversations with Eckermann" has been recently discovered among the archives of the publishing firm of Brockhaus at Leipzig. It differs considerably from the published text, and an edition showing the variations will be published in German during the present year.

MR. HEINEMANN has acquired the English rights of the "Chronique de 1831-1862" of Talleyrand's niece, the Duchesse de Dino, the first volume of which was published some weeks ago in Paris. The "Chronique" bristles with "indiscretions," many of them relating to the leaders of English society and politics during the years covered by the Duchess's frank reminiscences There is a vivid, though rather spiteful, account of Lady Jersey, and Brougham fares even worse. The Duke of Wellington is almost the sole personality in English social and political life against whom the Duchess does not aim her shafts. All this makes her diary lively reading; it is full of anecdotes, and the English translation, when it appears, may count on a big crowd of readers

MR. F. A. MACNUTT, whose edition of "The Letters of Cortes" won him a place as an authority on America in the early sixteenth century, has just finished a biography of Bartholomew de Las Casas, the historian of Spanish America and champion of the Indians against the tyranny of their conquerors. Mr. MacNutt is at present working on a "Life of Cortes," which will appear in the "Heroes of the Nations" Series. Both books will be published by Messrs. Putnam.

"THE LIFE OF THE SPIRIT." *

THE position of philosophy in the present age is questionable and precarious. For centuries it claimed to have answers to all the questions most important for human life; to tell us the truth about our relation to the external world, about God, and about the nature and immortality of the soul. The Greeks asked and answered these questions, in different ways, it is true, but with perfect confidence in their power to attain true results. Christianity, though it claimed a special revelation, derived from a source superior to human reason, still, in Scholasticism, left to reason a real place and power. The Renaissance, if in Protestantism it discredited philosophy, yet inaugurated that modern movement which, from Descartes to Hegel, in spite of the scepticism of Hume and the relativism of Kant, affirmed the competency of the mind to deal with these ultimate problems. But after Hegel there is a debâcle. The method calling itself scientific has set itself in sharp antagonism to all methods calling themselves philosophic. Driven back from point to point, philosophy has dwindled to logic. Part of its old field has been occupied by science, the rest is relegated to agnosticism. The problems of God, of the soul, and of the Universe are problems which science does not profess to be able to solve, which it denies the competency of philosophy to attack, and in which, indeed, it is hardly willing to admit that there is any sense or meaning. Never in the history of the world has the human mind, in the midst of its triumphs in particular fields, confessed to such a bankruptcy in respect to all ultimate questions.

Of this situation philosophy appears to be only just becoming aware. For philosophy is peculiarly capable of "dogmatic slumber," and continues to hug what it holds to be the truth long that after that treasure has been stolen from it in its sleep. For some years past, however, even in England, there have been signs of an awakening, and we begin to be aware that philosophy is endeavouring to re-establish itself as a separate discipline with a method of its own.

What is that method? It is, perhaps, premature to formulate it, for it is only in process of elaboration. But broadly one may say that the attempt is being made to discover, or to throw into relief, a special kind of experience as an object for philosophy and a special way of handling it as its method. A prominent example of this tendency is the work of Professor Eucken, who, it will be remembered, has gained a position so distinguished in the world of thought that he was recently awarded the Nobel prize, and whose "Life of the Spirit," now published in an English translation, will make the trend of his ideas generally accessible to readers in this country.

Professor Eucken starts from direct observation of the inner effort of life towards ends. His method, however, is not simple observation. That would give merely a psychology of religion, of ethics, or of art, such as has long been endeavoring to come into being in many volumes by many sociologists. Professor Eucken's method is not merely to describe the phenomena of the inner life, but to evaluate its essence. His thinking involves and presupposes a practical laying hold of, a believing in, and a furthering of the experience he is analysing. It is only, he would say, when the experience is so handled that it shows what it is; it can only be comprehended in so far as it is embraced. Philosophy thus becomes the intellectual aspect of religion. It implies not observation only, but sympathy and effort; it issues not in prevision, but in prophecy. "The struggle for truth," Professor Eucken says (and the word "struggle" is symptomatic), "rests on the craving after a life which partakes of the essence of things"; and thus "it cannot possibly divest itself of all strong emotions and become an affair of quiet contemplation and selfless resignation."

What, then, is it, in Professor Eucken's view, which is the object at once of philosophy and of religion? It is, as we said, the effort of life towards ends. Professor Eucken calls it the inner, or spiritual life. This life he finds to be common to all men, in the sense that it is operative on all and that all have access to it. He finds it manifesting itself throughout history, and undergoing, in our time, a peculiarly difficult and complicated crisis which it is the business of philosophy to help us to surmount. If we ask for the content of this experience we are referred to the course of events in which it is represented as progressively manifesting itself; and from this point of view Professor Eucken's work is a philosophy of history. But further, we are told, in general terms, that it is a life which is "new," which is "complete" and "independent," and which "transcends time." The implications of these terms it is not very easy to discover, for Professor Eucken's language suffers from the pedantic obscurity traditional in German philosophy. It appears, however, that when he calls this life "new" he is opposing it, on the one hand, to nature, as distinguished from human nature; on the other hand, in man, to his spiritual, as distinguished from his natural life. This point is cardinal in Professor Eucken's vision. A man who lays hold of the life recognises it not as part of, but as above and independent of himself. It is something that somehow comes into him from without. And for this reason it is called "complete" and "independent," in contradistinction to the life of the natural man, so limited, so transitory, and so imperfect. Further, this life is somehow also the life of the universe. For that reason it can lay hold of and transform both the Man and the phenomenal world. That is our guarantee that we may trust ourselves to it and that it will lead us to victory—a victory which will be an eternal life; for the spiritual substance, though it manifests itself in time, nevertheless transcends time, and points to a satisfaction free from temporal limits.

These propositions may seem to be very vague and general; but, if true, they involve important consequences. For they guarantee to us an objectivity in our standards of Good and True, and a successful issue to our struggles to impose them on the World. And this, in brief, is the sum of what men have demanded ever since they began to reflect.

Are the propositions true? It is clear that no cut-and-dried answer can be given to this question. It would be difficult to refute Professor Eucken, partly because he leaves so much vague and undetermined, partly because he appeals not to a definite fact or facts, or a definite series of inferences, but to what he affirms to be a growing experience. Certain questions, however, inevitably arise in the mind even of a sympathetic reader, and will be ruthlessly pressed home by opponents. How can it be demonstrated that an individual comes into touch with a Substance and a Life which is universal and eternal, and operative not only upon him but upon all men? Professor Eucken, it is true, appeals to a particular interpretation of history, whereby it appears as an unfolding of this life. But the interpretation itself would have to be regarded as a merely subjective view, unless the underlying verity were presupposed. How, then, are we to escape from the objection that this postulated spiritual life may be a subjective construction by the author out of the facts of his inner consciousness, an "idol" and not a real fact at all? To this objection there can be no answer except an appeal to the consciousness of the objector—"Do you, in fact, not find as I do, that you come into touch with such a life?" If the objector replies in the negative, there is for the moment nothing further to be said. But can there be any doubt that a large number, that the immense majority of people would, if they could understand the question, reply in the negative? It is, indeed, precisely Professor Eucken's complaint that the "average man" does not get hold of this spiritual life. Is that fact, then, a refutation of his philosophy? Hardly! For he will, of course, reply that the life is in them or above them, whether they know it or no; and will point to their discontent, to the sense, chronic or occasional, of emptiness in their life, as testimony to the presence of that which they cannot perceive. The object of his work, indeed, is to bring this new life to consciousness. In so far as he does so, he has accomplished his demonstration; in so far as he does not, he has failed. But there is no logical compulsion upon him to regard his failure as proof that the object of his study and propaganda does not exist.

Objections of a different order arise from the very general and indefinite character of the conclusions we are asked to accept. We are told, as we saw, that the life with which we come into contact is "independent" and "eternal." What precisely does this mean? Does it mean that there exists eternally a Consciousness embracing, or being, the whole universe? In that case, why is this Consciousness endeavoring, through blood and tears, to realise itself somehow in a world of time and space? Or is this eternal Being something only potential which acquires real existence only through and in a temporal process? In that case it seems a misdescription to call it "eternal" and "independent."

* "The Life of the Spirit." By Rudolph Eucken. Translated by F. L. Pogson. Williams & Norgate. 5s. net.

Again—what for men is a more urgent question—what is the kind of life towards which this philosophy encourages us to strive? It is said to be a timeless life; and though it includes happiness, its happiness is sharply contrasted with that of the mere natural man. What, then, are we promised? A perfect society here on earth? What, then, will be the form and content of that society? An eternal life elsewhere, a kingdom of saints? Is, then, the individual soul immortal, or is it not? What answer, if any, has Professor Eucken to give to these questions? Perhaps he has none. Perhaps, if he were perfectly candid, if he could disentangle himself from a vague jargon and say exactly what he thinks, he would say something of this kind: "If human life is to have any meaning and any greatness, if it is to be saved from mere materialism, mere pleasure-seeking, mere scepticism, and the despair that ultimately comes of these things, it is necessary to believe that our pursuit of Truth and Good is destined somehow to be crowned with success; that the history of Mankind and of the individual soul is significant, in the sense that it is a process leading towards perfection; and that the course of the world, of all that we call Nature in distinction from man, is at bottom somehow contributing to that process. To this belief I myself have attained, and I believe that you will attain to it if you try. I believe further that it is consistent with, not opposed to, all our positive knowledge; that, indeed, without this belief, all our knowledge is hollow, all our history futile, all our effort vain; and of this I can convince you, if you will listen to me. Perform with me this act of faith and a new world of truth will open to you which will include, not omit or conflict with, all that you now call knowledge. There will open also a new world of action which will complete, not repudiate, all the achievement of mankind up to this date. Philosophy depends and is built upon this act of choice. Make it, and I will guide you further. Refuse it, and I can only leave you alone."

Something of this kind appears to lie behind all Professor Eucken's reasoning. And if that be so, he is to be classed among the "Pragmatists," although, no doubt, he would refuse to identify himself with many of the tenets of what is not so much a school as a tendency. The tendency is of the utmost importance. It inaugurates, in a sense, a new era of Faith. That word, however, is ambiguous, and is not Professor Eucken's. It may too readily be taken to mean a belief in a special revelation interpreted by an ecclesiastical organisation. To "faith" of that kind Professor Eucken gives no support. No one could be more explicit and uncompromising than he in repudiation of the mediæval system which the Roman Catholic Church exists to maintain. Professor Eucken is the champion of religion, but not of ecclesiasticism or of dogma. He appeals to a growing experience, about which, indeed, definite things may be said, but which is always more than what is said about it, so that the "theology" of this religion demands a constant and progressive revision. For any given age it may be interpreted more or less by philosophy; but some passages in this book suggest that, in the author's view, better interpreters may be the musicians and the poets.

MR. LECKY'S POSTHUMOUS ESSAYS.*

Mr. Lecky had begun to make a collection of his contributions to magazines and reviews before his death, and this volume, which includes also two presidential addresses, has been prepared by his widow in fulfilment of his design. The subjects are those that one would expect to find in such a volume, and the same may be said of their treatment. In some respects the most interesting essay is that entitled "Formative Influences," which describes how the historian of European morals started life with the less ambitious prospect of a family living near Cork, and was drawn aside by his studies of Butler and his association with Whateley. If we remember rightly, when forty years later Mr. Lecky became member for his University, there were some complaints about the religious opinions of the historian who had originally been destined for the Church. One incident in his early literary career is not mentioned in these reminiscences. When Mr. Lecky was twenty-two he published anonymously a series of biographical studies under the title of "Leaders of Irish Public Opinion," discussing Irish history in a spirit of passionate nationalism. The tone of this youthful volume was a good deal softened in the later editions that appeared in 1871 and 1903. Among the historical essays now republished we may mention as particularly interesting those on Sir Robert Peel and the fifteenth Earl of Derby. Mr. Lecky was able, in spite of his Irish sympathies, to do justice to the statesman who was for six years of his life the chief support of the Anti-Catholic Party in Parliament. Lord Derby, a politician who "when a Conservative always represented the Liberal, and when a Liberal the Conservative wing of his party," was an eminently congenial subject, and the essay on him is written with admiration and sincere feeling.

The addresses on the "Political Value of History" and "Thoughts on History" would probably have been found disappointing if Mr. Lecky had not supplemented his earlier historical work by so colorless a book as the "Map of Life." Mr. Lecky was at the time of his death the greatest living English historian, but many a historian with infinitely less knowledge and much less culture would have displayed a larger reach and compass in dealing with that subject. These addresses are characterised by the lack of distinction and originality that marked all Mr. Lecky's non-historical writings, and the reader who remembers that Mr. Lecky is unsurpassed in particular as the historian of opinion, wonders again on taking up this volume that when the historian turns to speculate or moralise he should have so little that is of interest or importance to say. His contributions to contemporary questions are animated, and for a man of contemplative tastes a little vehement in tone. They are interesting as showing how completely the particular eighteenth century atmosphere in which Mr. Lecky's mind was steeped had dominated his outlook on all questions. In his address on "Thoughts on History," he warned his readers against "the fatal and very common error of judging the actions of the past by the moral standard of our own age." Perhaps the disposition to look at modern facts through the ideas of an earlier age is less common, if not less truly fatal, to sound conclusions. Mr. Lecky's ideal Ireland, for example, the Ireland governed by the eighteenth century gentry, has disappeared, and Mr. Lecky shows his loyalty to that lost régime by refusing to see anything good in the Ireland with which we have to deal. Yet the modern statesman, confronted with the Ireland that we know, is not likely to make much way with his problem by mere fulminations against the course of events that have sapped the powers of the Irish landlords. The essay on Old Age Pensions again illustrates very well Mr. Lecky's incapacity to escape from the world he lives in to the world of reality. Take this sentence: "No form of State Socialism is more dangerous than the doctrine which has been countenanced by Prince Bismarck, and which is making many disciples in England—namely, that an industrious man who has pursued his course in life with perfect independence, made his own contracts, chosen his own work, and been paid for it by stipulated wages, is entitled if he fails in obtaining a sufficiency for his old age, to be placed, as a 'soldier of industry,' in the same category as State servants, and to receive, like them, not on the ground of compassion but of right, a State pension, drawn from the taxation of the community." Mr. Lecky writes in this passage as though the English working-man can survey the situation, and make his choice with something of the independence with which Mr. Lecky himself weighed the rival attractions of the family living in Cork and an historian's career, beginning with some years of study in the libraries of Europe. But this picture of working-men as free agents in a world where everyone's responsibilities are separate and definite, has been rudely destroyed by the experience of the actual conditions of industrial life, and Mr. Lecky still writes as if all the easy and comfortable generalisations of the laissez faire school were still accepted. Mr. Lecky lived in these illusions, and thus it happens that whereas many men who have studied any given age bring a mind enriched by their special research to the study of the affairs of their own times, Mr. Lecky's great services to thought and knowledge end very definitely with the age which he had explored with such patience and success.

THE NAVY FROM WITHIN.*

Mr. Yexley is an old coastguardsman with the pen of the ready writer, the heart of a reformer, and the nose of a born journalist. The present book deals with the inner life of the Navy so far as the lower deck is concerned. If Mr. Yexley has not enjoyed recent experience in sea-going warships, as "Editor of the Fleet" and the "Log" series, he is in close touch with the British bluejacket, and may be considered a faithful exponent of their opinions and desires.

Mr. Yexley's work is not without value to the future historian. Into the past four years have been crowded the reforms of a generation, and in re-organisation and change in material and in the classification, training, and duties of the personnel, more has been done by the Admiralty before the first decade of the present century has expired than during the whole of the nineteenth century. For a hundred years previous to the accession of Sir John Fisher to High Office at the Admiralty, the Navy as a Conservative body shunned reform, was always in a state of quiescence, and worm eaten with artificial rules and conventions which obliterated the idea that a navy exists for war and nothing else. The notion that naval gunnery required reform was regarded as rank blasphemy, and when it was proved that ammunition was habitually thrown overboard in order to save the trouble of firing it, the dry bones were stirred in a way that would have made St. Vincent gasp and stare.

A quaver arose from every bath chair from Bournemouth to Cheltenham, and every ex-Admiral who had ever hoisted his flag or commanded a squadron, deplored with tears in his voice the abolition of mast and sails. The reformation of the dockyards was a Herculean task which had broken the teeth of successive Governments for eighty years. But the reform of the dockyards was accomplished.

While these reforms were coming along it was discovered that the discipline of the lower deck was a relic of the eighteenth century. Intelligent officers quickly appreciated the impossibility of punishing men as an inducement for quick hitting with modern big guns. The operation of firing 12-inch guns requires the synchronous and intensive effort of sixty-three men. The whole operation is thrown out of gear by the indifference of one unwilling member of the band. The smartest officers accordingly laid themselves out to draw from the men willingness to excel, leaving to the public opinion of the lower deck the punishment of shirkers.

Mr. Yexley's book is not a happy one; at least it does not leave a happy impression upon the mind. He candidly admits that the bright side of Service life does not appear largely in these pages. All was not well with the Navy in the days just gone by when the public had been lulled into a false sense of security. The average Briton thought then what many think now—that the expenditure of money on the Navy is the only thing needed to buy security. If money was spent on buying ammunition which was thrown in the sea, the matter was hushed up until it was almost too late to stop it. Millions and millions of money have been wasted on bricks and mortar for no earthly purpose as far as the Navy is concerned. The waste of money in Gibraltar and Malta by the late Government is appalling since the naval strength of Britain is in no wise increased thereby.

Mr. Yexley entered the Navy under an illusion:—

> "The 'Impregnable' at Devonport was the one chosen, and when Sergeant —— saw us off from Paddington on the appointed day, he wished us well and comforted us with the assurance that when we arrived at our journey's end a nice hot supper would be awaiting us. He even went into details, and mentioned beef-steak pie and sundry other choice viands. What a romancer that man was!"

But he quickly discovered the truth for himself:—

> "As late as 1903 an admiral who had held the position of First Sea Lord objected to the abolition of masts and sails because:—'You have got an established system and a time-honoured one, so why alter it?' To-day that admiral is on the side of those who object to recent changes. He would be! But is he a safe guide to follow?"

Even a few years ago the men of the lower deck were swindled right and left by contractors for provision.

Here is a letter from a Maltese firm anxious to secure the canteen custom of a battleship:—

> "To Ship's Company—H.M.S. 'Hibernia.'—
> "Dear Sirs,—I most respectfully solicit your votes on behalf of my firm Our terms are unequalled for best goods supplied at 5 per cent. discount Six men to insure good attendance Boat furnished all knows its use fullness. We are born in the business and knows better your wants; the old 'Hibernia' was one of our first instalation of canteen being Irish named ship; in addition to the proposed terms we should like to commemorate St. Patrick's Day 17th March by allowing free dinner not exceeding 2s. 6d. Our prices are to be those lowest quoted by other competing firms and so much each man monthly or yearly as agreed. Testimonials in possession from every ship served. Wish you a happy new year and commission. I thank you one and all."

Even such obvious reforms as the punishment of these persons and the abolition of a system by which similar scandals could recur, were opposed by the retiring admirals who loom large to-day as naval authorities.

The reforms in which Mr. Yexley has had a share were invariably opposed by naval officers on the retired list who were accepted by the public as experts. When a gunboat went down with all hands off the coast of Vancouver Island, the abolition of mast and sails was an inevitable reform. The gunnery chapter in this book is interesting, but not well informed. Mr. Yexley evidently knows little or nothing of the currents or influence that convulsed the Board of Admiralty when the battle of reform was being fought, and he claims more credit for the share in that reform than rightly belongs to him. When the time comes to record the history of gunnery reform, Mr. Yexley will deserve his share of praise, but he would be the last to deny that he does not belong to the class of reformer who is unrewarded.

We have no space to deal with Mr. Yexley's excellent chapters on the tyrannous and unintelligent regulations affecting the dress and comfort of the lower deck. The old Navy had its good points, but between 1814 and 1904 an immense fungus of ritual and false discipline grew up. The worship of uniformity was Chinese in its stupidity. The evolutions were stupid and artificial, initiative sank to zero, competition was ignored, and full seamanship encouraged. It is only to-day when we are still in a state of naval evolution that people are waking up to the idea that everything from an admiral to a button is contributory to the quick hitting of the gun on a floating platform called a warship.

A MODEST EMPIRE-BUILDER.*

It is, perhaps, not curious that our Imperialistic fever of ten years ago yielded no response in literature from the Colonies. The thrill of kinship flashing between the Mother Country and the "daughter nations" which brought Australian and Canadian contingents into South Africa did not produce, so far as we are aware, a fine piece of literature throughout the whole of the British Empire—one that could survive the disillusionment of the end of the campaign. The patriotic impulse was genuine and sincere, but the foundation of private and national profit-hunting that underlay the whole political issue could not inspire any fine mind to any genuine expression—save, indeed, the chilling disdain voiced by Sir William Butler before his recall from South Africa. The Briton at home, or overseas, is not, indeed, addicted to literary expression of the faith that is in him, but the inner weakness of Imperialism is attested by the paralysing lack of interest shown by the British public in the life of their kinsmen overseas. The drum was beaten bravely by Kipling and

TRAGEDIES OF THE MEDICI.

By EDGCUMBE STALEY. Author of "The Guilds of Florence." With 52 illustrations and hand coloured photogravure frontispiece. Cloth gilt, Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Few families have exercised so great an influence upon the destinies of the great world at large as have the Medici of Florence. At the same time few families have experienced greater vicissitudes or exhibited more vividly the varying passions of mankind.

Helpless children and beauteous women have fallen victims to the malevolence of their kinsman. Love and benevolence are intermingled with intrigue and murder, until the history of this famous house is like the "noble cloth" of the Arte di Calimala—woven with scarlet strands and gold.

Henley before the war; but what did we harvest afterwards in literature but the modest narratives of a few officers and war correspondents, such as Captain March Phillips and Mr. Nevinson? Modesty was, perhaps, the literary quality most called for after the blare of the politicians' brass. And yet there are plenty of writers, men and women, who could instruct the British public as to the actual life of their cousins overseas if this inertness of our imagination did not block the way. We have the faculty of being mildly interested when a product of Pall Mall or South Kensington, transported to Khartoum or Lhassa, records its typical sensations, but we cannot pretend to any interest at all when the genuine voice of Sydney, Bombay, or even Cape Town is transmitted to us. It does not, in fact, succeed in reaching us. Mention the name of Henry Lawson, the genuine spokesman of one of Mr. Kipling's "daughter nations," to an educated Englishman, and he cannot tell you from what quarter of the British Empire Lawson hails. If you ask him whether he knows of any good novel in English by a Hindu describing native life from the inside, he will be offended. As though a Hindu's account of his own countrymen were of any special value! We do not desire to know; that is the truth of it. And it is probable that this blank indifference on our part will lead more and more to an accumulation of long-delayed but very disagreeable national surprises.

Mr. Bindloss's modest talent is all the more to be welcomed by intelligent people, because it has not yet been stimulated by public approval to give us of its best. More than ten years ago, Mr. Bindloss, in "A Wide Dominion," wrote an admirable narrative of an English settler's rough life in Canada, but he did not bang away lustily on the Imperial drum, and, consequently, his work is as little known to his countrymen as is Mr. Morley Roberts's "A Western Avernus," which contains a similar record of enterprise and manly endurance. And yet Mr. Bindloss, in the tone and temperament of his writings, is a more typical Englishman than Mr. Rudyard Kipling. He lacks the latter's magnetism, genius, and vulgarity. He does not shout loudly of Providence: he is, we must confess, as lacking in audacity of verbal imagery as in emotional coloring. But he is genuine. Mr. Bindloss merely represents, so far as a critic of his work can judge, those qualities of doggedness, love of roving, and ability to worry through disconcerting situations, that have brought the British Empire into being. There is always something a little touching in the literary work of a man of action, on whom necessity, bearing hardly, has begotten necessity of utterance. He is too good, in a sense, for the dubious job of putting into cold print the realities he has endured. His best qualities are called forth by action, not by talking of what he has seen and known. And Mr. Bindloss seems to write with the mental hesitancy of a sailor who shifts his quid and spits when he has to bring himself into the story. And that is what is interesting in "Thrice Armed," "The League of the Leopard," and other of Mr. Bindloss's novels: his heroes, traders, ranchers, sailors, explorers, who knock about the world, are really Englishmen of the best type, staunch, reticent, hard workers, with a great distaste for the picturesque limelight and Kipling orchestra. "All the pride of Empire, all the intoxication of power, all the ardor, the energy, the masterful strength, and the wonderful endurance and death-scorning pluck" which, according to the "Daily Mail," "are the very bone and fibre and marrow of the British character," are no more conspicuous in Mr. Bindloss's pictures of colonial and oversea life than they were in Miss Mary Kingsley's. His heroes do their best, say very little, and have their share of human infirmities. In "Thrice Armed," his hero, Jimmy Wheelock, a Naval Reserve man who comes back to British Columbia to look after his old father, Tom Wheelock, the owner of a trading schooner, the "Tyee," is simply concerned with fighting and breaking the monopoly of the sleek and scheming business man, Merril, who is squeezing the life out of his father. The story is simple, and rather naïve. Jimmy falls in love with Miss Merril, and we have the usual emotional perplexities incidental to this time-honored situation. But we do not go to Mr. Bindloss for a love story, which we suspect is inserted to please the taste of his British audience. We go to Mr. Bindloss for quiet and truthful descriptions of open-air life, in the bush, on the forest trail, and of handling a thirty-ton cutter in the teeth of a hard gale. Whenever he speaks of the practical aspects of rough pioneering life he commands our respect, for though his gift of language is not remarkable, there is a convincing realism in his descriptions born of actual experience. And few of our novelists have a first-hand acquaintance with the life of the rancher, the sailor, the engineer, and the road-maker overseas. It is a pity, indeed, that Mr. Bindloss should be turning out regulation pieces of fiction, for he ought still to be leading a roving life, and only at intervals ought he to sit down and narrate his travel experiences in the simple form which he adopted in "A Wide Dominion." If, indeed, the lack of interest shown by the British public in the actual conditions of the life of their Colonial kinsfolk were not so paralysing, some publisher might commission the author to hump his swag on fresh explorations, east or west, with a view to our gaining a fresh travel-book from Mr. Bindloss every two years.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

THERE is scarcely a country on the globe which Mr. Archibald R. Colquhoun has not managed to visit, and the recollections of his roving career given in "Dan to Beersheba" (Heinemann, 8s. 6d., net) make excellent reading. Travel has been the main interest of his life, and aptly enough he was born on board ship off the Cape of Good Hope some sixty years ago. He went out to India in 1869, where he served in the Public Works Department, but the chance of his life came ten years later in the shape of his appointment as head of a forest mission to Siam. From Siam he made the famous journey through Southern China into Burmah which he has described in "Across Chrysé." That book established Mr. Colquhoun's reputation. It won him the gold medal of the Geographical Society, and led to his being sent as special correspondent of the "Times" in the Tonking Campaign of 1883. Thenceforward Mr. Colquhoun's history has been a history of travel with intervals of rest, during which he wrote the many excellent books that stand to his credit. Mr. Colquhoun's travels brought him into the company of several of the famous men of his time, and he gives us vivid glimpses of some of them, from Dickens and Richard Burton to Li Hung Chang and Cecil Rhodes. Of Rhodes he holds the view that "no man of our times has exercised the same domination over men of all degrees," though many people will be surprised by Mr. Colquhoun's further statement that Rhodes was not "the type of man who is constitutionally brave." At a time when so many people who have little or nothing to tell us and no special gift of telling feel it encumbent upon them to publish their recollections, it is pleasant to come upon a volume of memoirs so fresh and full of interest as this.

IN writing the life of his uncle, "John Pettie" (Black, 20s. net), Mr. Martin Hardie has performed a service not merely to an individual artist, but to a group whose importance in the annals of modern Scottish painting has hardly been sufficiently realised. This group included, besides Pettie and others, Messrs. Orchardson and W. McTaggart, the Grahams, the Faeds, and George Paul Chalmers; and it owed its origin very largely to the teaching of one man, Robert Scott Lauder, of the Trustees' Academy. The Scott Lauder school, as it may be termed, was contemporary with the English pre-Raphaelite movement, and the two were alike in this respect, that the ostensible aim of both was a return to Nature; but the development of the one differed very materially from that of the other, the Scottish painters avoiding the archaistic mannerisms of the Southern school, and, as regards their figure-painters, being "literary" only in that they sometimes went to modern history for their subjects. Their main characteristic was virile color, and their principal reform the introduction of atmosphere into figure-subjects, which had previously been treated in accordance with the lifeless Academic formula that enjoined attention to correct drawing, and little else. Pettie is one of the most brilliant and most popular exponents of this school. His technical facility, acquired in the first instance by

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—Daily Chronicle.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."—Daily News.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—Westminster Gazette.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—Morning Leader.

prodigiously hard work, was equal to Millais'. His success, after he migrated to London, was extremely rapid, and although in his later years his market suffered from the reaction against any picture that told a story, he never wholly lost his hold upon the public. Constrained to paint more portraits towards the end of his life than he would have done if the fashion had remained the same, he acquired reputation in this branch, though his portraits have not the subtle appreciation of individual character that marks the master. Surface characteristics are, however, faithfully observed in them; and in all, particularly in the costume portraits which he specialised in for a while, the strong pictorial idea shows the individual quality of his genius.

That genius, beyond a doubt, is seen at its best in the historical genre of the kind represented by his diploma picture, "The Jacobites." With a keen sense of drama, he loved most to paint the dramatic episodes of our history. He was specially fond of rendering vehement movement, of visualising plot and tragedy, in a vivid and dramatic color scheme. The Great Rebellion and the Jacobite up-risings of the eighteenth century provided him with a great number of subjects, and his impressive interpretation of these never fails to quicken the imagination. Mr. Hardie's book is an excellent summary of the painter's powerful and curiously frank and sincere art. The complete descriptive catalogue of Pettie's works is a valuable feature, and the reproductions in color of several famous pictures help to recall an artist whose very exuberance, apart from the draughtmanship of which he was a master, and from his innate pictorialism, has a peculiar fascination even for the rigorous devotee of low tones and intricately subtle harmonies. Oddly enough, neither Edinburgh nor London possesses a really good Pettie of its own. There is no example at all in the National Gallery of Scotland, and "The Vigil" in the Tate Gallery, though clever enough, is not as representative as the "Jacobites," or as two or three others that were owned by the late Mr. McCulloch. This deficiency seems to call for attention.

The New Canadian Loan.

The most interesting emission for a long time past, and, indeed, an absolutely unique one, is the new Canadian loan. I have long wondered why neither the English Colonies nor the Home Government has made any attempt to popularise its securities for the small investor. The Irish Land issues might have been taken up with enthusiasm by the Irish peasants if Mr. Wyndham or Mr. Bryce or Mr. Birrell had seen that small bonds, with coupons attached, were provided. However, Mr. Fielding, the able and astute Finance Minister for Canada, has led the way, and the loan, which is being issued to-day by the Bank of Montreal, will be in small as well as large denominations, in fact, in ten pound bonds with coupons attached. So that anyone who buys a ten pound bond will get about 7s. 6d. a year in interest, as the loan yields 3¾ per cent. The debt, like that of the new Prussian Fours, is irredeemable for ten years. Altogether one hopes that thousands of small investors will become aware of this opportunity and seize it. Instead of 2½ per cent. in the Post Office savings bank they will get 3¾—a very considerable attraction. The loan may be recommended to anybody who has money to invest.

Other New Issues.

Besides these six millions of Canadian debt, the Grand Trunk Pacific wants more money, but that is a very different proposition Grand Trunk finance is highly unsatisfactory, and there is a growing feeling that the London board has not done well. A big Argentine loan of ten millions, largely for armaments—to build "Dreadnoughts" in competition with Brazil—is also said to be impending, and there are various railway issues in Argentina and Mexico. Considering that capital issues last year reached a record, I would not be at all surprised to see all these new loans causing a general shrinkage in Stock Exchange values. The premium on the Russian loan has dwindled, and the six millions issued in London, though three times over subscribed, were only at a premium of ⅛ the day after the issue. I am told there has been very little investment. The Paris premium dropped from 3 to 1½ on the day of issue. Russia is suspect just now, while Japan, thanks to her policy of retrenchment, is much in favor. The strength of Japanese bonds has been quite a feature in the last few days, and on Thursday the budget figures telegraphed from Tokio were received quite enthusiastically on the Stock Exchange. Yet trade is very bad, indeed, in Japan, though the worst has probably been passed.

"The Three Bad Taxes."

The Japanese Chambers of Commerce are agitating against what are called the three bad taxes—the recent addition to the sugar duties, the salt duties, and the transit duty. The price of sugar has been forced to such a height that the people have begun to use malt as a substitute, and consumption has declined heavily. Sugar is said to be dearer in Japan than in any other country in the world. But the Japanese Government is bent upon maintaining a large sinking fund, and it is not disposed to make further reductions in armaments. There is already a heavily graduated income tax; so the country being poor and ambitious, the people will probably have to grin and bear the three bad taxes as best they can. Anyhow, they are much better off and much better governed than the Russians.

Banking and Discounts.

At the meeting of the London and Westminster Bank, Mr. Sturgis, who presided, rightly described the past half-year as a particularly bad one for bankers, as low rates of money have been combined with bad trade. But he spoke with welcome emphasis of "signs of improvement in trade," which, however, might be retarded by political complications or dear money. The "Frankfürter Zeitung," the leading German authority on finance, in its annual review sums up the past year in Germany as "a year of unemployment." It evidently has not heard of the prosperity which Mr. F. E. Smith and other Tariff Reformers attribute to the Fatherland. Nor is the outlook in Germany now so hopeful as it is here. Though our banks have done badly, the London discount houses have prospered owing to the handsome margin between discount and deposit rates. I see that Mr. Doxat, on Wednesday, described this year's balance-sheet of the National Discount Company as "the best for many years past."

CANADIAN TYPES OF THE OLD REGIME (1608-1698).

By C. W. COLBY, Professor of History in the McGill University, Montreal.

In this book the author has brought the writings of French authors to bear on the English position, and vice versâ, as no other writer has attempted to do. The result is a clear and authoritative view of the period of French influence in Canada, written by a Canadian who thoroughly understands the attitude of French-Canadians towards their own past.

The Week in the City ... 690

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The week's Cabinet Councils are understood to have revealed a preponderant opinion in favor of passing over the rejection of the Licensing Bill and, therefore, declining or postponing the battle with the House of Lords. This course is suggested and faintly excused in an article in the "Westminster Gazette," which nominally rejects the policy of "ploughing the sands," and declares for concentration on what it vaguely calls "measures of social reform which the Government has a fair prospect of carrying through both Houses." Questions which are likely to cause conflict with the Lords are to be "reduced to a minimum," and "carefully selected and deferred." This inspiring policy—to be pursued by a party with a majority of nearly 200 votes on capital issues—is to be extended to the Budget, which is also to be drafted on lines of avoiding "a quarrel with the Lords." The opinion of the Liberal Press, however, inclines decidedly to more courageous tactics, the "Daily News," the "Morning Leader," the "Star," the "Manchester Guardian," and, with great emphasis, the "British Weekly," all insisting, in the words of the "Manchester Guardian," that the Government, instead of evading causes for conflict, should welcome them when they are good and fair ones.

Meanwhile, a tactical difficulty of the first importance at once presents itself. What is to happen to Welsh Disestablishment? On this, it is said that the Cabinet has as yet come to no decision. But an elaborate scheme has been drawn up by the Campaign Committee of the Free Churches of Wales, and presented to the Cabinet for consideration. What will the Government do? If Mr. Asquith's pledge is insisted upon, the Government, it is thought, will introduce a Bill. But to do so without a promise that its rejection or mutilation by the Lords will be followed by an instant production of an Anti-Veto Bill, is to invite Parliament to enact a farce. If the Government take this course, they must pursue it right up to its electoral consequences. If they decline it, and refuse both the Bill and a fight with the Lords, the Welshmen will probably revolt. Either course, however, would have a measure of reason and consistency behind it. Neither one merit nor the other belongs to the idea of once more deliberately yoking the Ministerial team to the business of "ploughing the sands."

Sir Edward Grey made a speech at Coldstream on Friday week, which, in spite of some German coldness and criticism, has contributed to peace. He hoped not only that there would be peace in the Near East, but a state of greater confidence among the Powers which had worked for it, among which he properly mentioned Germany. He rightly and with perfect truth repudiated the charge of British malevolence towards Austria. He said of the Navy that the post of a British Foreign Secretary would be intolerable from the moment when the fleet ceased to be safe against any "probable combination," which is exactly the right formula. The cement which bound the colonies to this country was liberty; as to Protection, with it the purity of public life must disappear.

Contrary to expectations Sir Edward Grey said not a word at Coldstream about Persia, and official statements issued in London and St. Petersburg on Sunday have not been reassuring. The London communiqué professed the loyalty of Russia and England to the principle of "non-intervention," but explained that the two Governments were going to "advise" the Shah to introduce a "practicable form of representative government to assure the realisation of indispensable economic, financial, and administrative reforms." The St. Petersburg communiqué omitted the word "representative," and it is obvious that "non-intervention" is barely distinguishable from an extreme form of "intervention." Meanwhile in Persia the collapse of the Shah's authority becomes more and more complete every day. Khorassan, the Caspian provinces, Luristan, as well as Azerbaijan and Ispahan, are in the hands of the Constitutionalists, who likewise control the South, and are active even as far as Baluchistan. The Shah rules only in Teheran, and his military expedition against Tabriz has again failed lamentably. An exchange of telegrams between his War Minister, the Emir Djeng, and Satar Khan shows that the Shah knows that the game is nearly up. The Emir Djeng offered Satar Khan a free pardon, a Khanate, and the stewardship of the Royal domains if he would lay down arms. Satar Khan returned thanks, but repeated that all he and his followers wanted was a Constitution. If that were accorded they would lay down arms and kneel at the Shah's feet.

In the course of his Coldstream speech Sir Edward Grey welcomed the "appearance of some blue sky" in the Near East, but on Monday the blue was blotted out by the announcement that Bulgaria had resolved to mobilise the 8th Division, to prevent a Turkish coup de main. The Bulgarian Foreign Minister explained to his Parliament that Turkey had been suggesting to certain Embassies the advisability of rectifying the East Roumelian frontier north-west of Adrianople, and that his Government feared she would execute the suggestion. It is admitted that the idea of demanding territorial concessions as a substitute for part of the monetary compensation is being played with in Turkey, but the Bulgarian Government cannot have seriously feared armed aggression. Bulgaria's partial mobilisation is doubtless intended to induce the Turkish Government to come to terms. Since Kiamil Pasha told the Turkish Chamber that the settlement with Bulgaria should be left to the Conference, no step towards an agreement has been taken. The difference is purely financial. Turkey wants £5,000,000 compensation, which is universally recognised as excessive, and Bulgaria offers between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000, which is probably as much as she can afford. The Powers have at last acted, we think wisely, through a Russian initiative. A Russian circular Note suggests representations to both parties against military demonstrations and a refusal to allow changes in the boundary lines.

The South Africa Closer Union Convention was expected to finish its work last week, but after settling harmoniously the big questions, it has, so far, not been able to agree on a Federal capital. Cape Town and Pretoria are the rivals, and so keen are the supporters of either that the decision may be left over for a referendum or for the future South Africa Parliament to determine—a course which might imperil the whole scheme of Union. The week has brought two notable pronouncements on the main Constitutional issue. "Olive Schreiner" declares strongly for Federation, while Mr. Watson, a former Labor Premier of Australia, told the people of Natal to avoid Australia's mistake, and plump for Unification. It is pretty certain that the Convention has fixed on a compromise—the Canadian system—which retains provincial Parliaments, but limits their powers, gives the Dominion Government a veto on provincial legislation, and reserves to the Dominion Parliament powers not specifically allocated to the provinces, together with a general authority to legislate for "peace, order, and good government." Such an arrangement would exclude Downing Street, give the South African Parliament ample enough control over social legislation to equate the standard of life throughout South Africa, and permit the development of a uniform native policy. The native Protectorates, it is also understood, will remain under Imperial rule until the South African Government has proved its capacity to administer them skilfully and generously.

The agreement for submitting the Newfoundland fisheries dispute to the Hague Tribunal, in accordance with last year's British-American arbitration treaty, has not yet been completed. A conference was held at Washington on Sunday, and Great Britain, Canada, and the United States came to terms, but Newfoundland still stood out. Sir Robert Bond, who is afraid that the Colony may be cast in heavy damages, wants the American claim for compensation to go before the Newfoundland Supreme Court instead of before the Hague Tribunal. On the main point of submitting Article I. of the treaty of 1818 to arbitration, agreement has apparently been reached, and the United States is said to have been unusually complacent. Sir Robert Bond's stiffness is perhaps to be explained by the difficulty of the political situation in Newfoundland. In default of his assent the unusual course has been taken of signing a draft agreement to be laid before the Senate for discussion on the understanding that it is purely tentative. The explanation given is that Mr. Root, the State Secretary, who has conducted the negotiations, retires this week; the idea of compelling Newfoundland to submit to an accomplished fact is disavowed.

The Conference of the Labor Party at Portsmouth has thus far proceeded with what Mr. Keir Hardie described as "honeymoon" peace. The amendment of the Paper Stainers' Union, which revived the attempt made at Hull to give a definitely Socialist basis to the party, was ruled out of order. Should it be revived later on, it will certainly be defeated, with little friction, and no secessions. The general line of Mr. Clynes's address, and of the party feeling, was strongly Free Trade, and showed a disposition to work electorally for it in combination with Free Trade societies. The chief practical proposal was that to concentrate on unemployment. It was decided to increase the payment to the Parliamentary representatives of the party by £20, on the ground of their work during the autumn Session, which seems to us rather a niggardly decision. But the whole question is to be referred to a Committee. The tone of the speeches was remarkably moderate, and the party seems able to retain its force without disturbing the central direction. The trade unionist element is morally as well as materially supreme.

We do not profess to understand all the circumstances of Mr. Sinclair's removal from the House of Commons to the House of Lords, while retaining his Secretaryship of Scotland, but we appreciate his keen regret at parting from his Forfarshire constituents. The reason assigned for the deference shown to the Lords by removing the centre of Scottish administration from the Commons and by the creation of a new Minister-peer during an acute conflict with the Upper Chamber is that of late Scottish business suffered from the absence of peers familiar with Scotland. The Lord Advocate is to undertake Scottish business in the House of Commons, and will, of course, do it superlatively well. Is the new peer to be called in to witness the rejection of more Scottish Bills?

The new science and the old seaman's virtue of courage were well blended in the story of the saving of the passengers and crew of the White Star liner, the "Republic," which was rammed by the Italian liner, the "Florida," in a dense fog, near the Nantucket lightship, 175 miles from New York. Both ships, crowded as they were with passengers, were in great danger. They were saved by the perfect coolness of Captain Sealby, of the "Republic," the bravery of the Italian captain, and the resolution of a wireless telegraph operator, named John Binns, who stood to his shattered cabin, on a sinking ship, till he had sent off message after message to neighboring vessels and stations on the shore. As soon as these messages had been deciphered, there was a race of relievers. The "Baltic" arrived first, and carried the swarm of imperilled lives—including excitable

Italians and Calabrian refugees—to New York. The chief answering telegraph operator remained fifty-three hours at his post. Captain Sealby and his first officer were—need it be said?—the last to leave their ship, leaping from the masts as she went down, and being rescued with difficulty from the whirlpool she made.

Anarchy is infectious. The Russian Government, which breeds lawless men by the thousand, has thrown two of them on our shores, and these men, Jacob and Hefeld, who are apparently Letts by birth, organised an audacious highway robbery in the neighborhood of Tottenham Marshes. The crime ended in a street battle, continued through miles of streets, in which scores of enraged citizens took part. The criminals boarded a motor-car, carrying £80 for wages for the employees of Messrs. Schuurmann's factory. They secured the bag, which has not been recovered, and made off, turning savagely on their pursuers with revolver shots. In the pursuit a policeman and a child were shot dead, and nineteen people were wounded. Every device was used to aid the brigands' escape. An electric tramcar was boarded, and the conductor forced to run it with a revolver at his head, a milk-cart was used, and finally both men were brought to bay—one, Jacob, in a cottage, which was surrounded, the other, Hefeld, before a high iron fence, which he could not scale. The latter shot himself but not fatally, the other either committed suicide or was killed by a policeman named Eagles. The wounded man is in hospital, and may recover. Both appeared to belong to the left wing of Anarchist societies, which rarely or never keep clear of a criminal element. There is a cry for strong anti-Anarchist measures, but our real quarrel is with a Government which cannot govern.

The scheme for the establishment of an institute for the medical treatment of patients with radium, and for research into its curative properties, has made great progress, and the first meeting of the council of the new institute was held on Thursday. A site has been obtained, and a double endowment has been provided by Sir Ernest Cassel and Lord Iveagh. The possibilities of research into the influence of radium in diseases, especially in cancer, have thoroughly taken hold of the public mind. Sir Frederic Treves's lecture on the subject was guarded, though hopeful. The experiments related in a communication which we print in this issue show that medical opinion is inclined to look for developments of great value.

Our Paris correspondent writes:—"It is evident, from the proceedings in the Chamber of Depties on Tuesday, that the measure for making executions private, which has been passed by the Senate, will not go through the Chamber without strong opposition. M. Castillard, the Reporter of the Commission which is considering the whole question and has already persuaded the Chamber to retain the death penalty, proposed a special sitting on Thursday morning to consider the measure sent down from the Senate. His motion was supported by M. Briand, on behalf of the Government, but was rejected by 344 votes against 201, nearly all the abolitionists voting in the majority. Several papers, among others the 'Journal,' the 'Petite République,' and the 'Humanité,' claim that this vote shows a reaction against capital punishment, but it is doubtful whether this is the case. There is already a certain reaction in the country, but it can hardly yet have made itself felt in Parliament to such an extent as the division of Tuesday would indicate, were it entirely due to that cause. The Chamber does not like special morning sittings so early in the session. But the vote undoubtedly shows that the great majority of abolitionists in the Chamber are inclined to oppose the privacy of executions."

January is the rainiest month in the Transvaal, and the rains culminated last Friday in the heaviest downpour recorded in the history of the Colony. In the North West district nine inches of rain fell in twenty-four hours, while in Johannesburg itself the fall was seven inches. The rivers were converted into torrents; bridges were destroyed; roads and railways flooded; houses swept away, and the telegraph lines broken down. The severest damage was done on the Rand. The mines require large quantities of water, which is stored in great reservoirs. Swelled by the tropical downpour, the water in several of these reservoirs burst the containing dam, and swept into the mines, flooding the lower levels. Not much serious hurt was done to property, but many miners, white and native, who were at work in the lower levels, were surprised by the sudden inrush of water and drowned.

M. Coquelin, the greatest of contemporary actors, and one of the greatest comedians who have ever lived, died on Wednesday while rehearsing his part in M. Rostand's new play, "Chantécler." In no conventional sense such a death may be said to eclipse the gaiety of nations. It is hardly possible to conceive the rising again of such a fount of public pleasure as sprang from M. Coquelin's representations of Molière. The great actor seemed especially made for the great master. Above all, M. Coquelin's "M. Jourdain" appeared to be less an effort of the mimetic art than an actual incarnation of the character, endowed with the poetic simplicity that attested the artist's delight in his creation. It was impossible for the spectator to take his eyes for a moment from the wonderful, ever-changing mask that gave it life. Irving could set up a similar attraction by virtue of the extraordinary beauty and refinement of his face; Coquelin worked through the greater power of moulding his whole body and personality to the type he represented. No artist ever radiated a wider joy.

The Royal Academy elections, held last Wednesday evening, provided nothing sensational. Messrs. W. Goscombe John and John Belcher were promoted to full Academic rank, Mr. Bertram Mackennal was made an Associate, and M. Jean Paul Laurens an Honorary Foreign Academician. While public interest is apt to attach itself to the election of Associates rather than to that of Academicians, the choice of Mr. Belcher to be one of the Forty is perhaps the most satisfactory result of the recent ballot. Not only was it desirable that architecture should be represented more strongly; it is also very gratifying that an architect of Mr. Belcher's ability and sympathies should have been chosen. We owe most of what is best in recent architecture to the revival of taste for the English Renaissance style, and with that revival Mr. Belcher has been very prominently identified. Of the others who have been honored, Mr. Goscombe John during his nine years' Associateship has proved himself an accomplished and dainty, rather than a powerful sculptor; Mr. Mackennal's election was foreshadowed eighteen months ago by the purchase of his beautiful marble "Earth and the Elements," by the Chantrey Trustees; and M. Laurens, who is over seventy years of age, is known as a master of the panneau décoratif.

Politics and Affairs.

THE EFFECT OF "BLUFF" IN POLITICS.

The Attorney-General, in his excellent speech on the House of Lords at South Shields, referred to what we may almost call the current speculation that the next election will seat what he called the "food-taxing and trade-taxing party" in power. Sir William Robson was careful to say that he regarded the hypothesis as absurd. Nevertheless, we are afraid that it enters not a little into the thoughts and even the half-conscious calculations of some Liberal politicians, and we have no doubt that it is beginning to influence the minds of the people. The effect is properly described by Professor Minchin, in a letter which we publish elsewhere, as one of "bluff." And "bluff" is becoming an agent of no small weight in the manufacture of popular opinion, or perhaps we should say of popular emotion. Announce a proposition, however absurd, or a line of thought, however unacceptable to the sensible man, repeat, adorn, and even magnify it by the arts of advertisement and rhetoric, and with the peculiarly impressionable "mass-mind," you will have gone some way to establishing the position you have advanced. Mr. Graham Wallas, in his interesting study of the play of human nature in politics, believes that this art of suggestion was largely responsible for the creation of the hostile body of opinion which destroyed the Progressive majority on the London County Council. We can see a similar process at work with similar effect in the controversy between the Liberal Party and the House of Lords. Not one Liberal in ten thousand who had been told within a week of the General Election that the House of Lords would have destroyed the Government's proposals on electoral reform, education, temperance, and Scottish land tenure would have credited such a phantasy. But since then the legend of a House of Lords dowered by Providence and the British Constitution with a mission to set a limit to the extravagance of a piratical Administration, has gained so much ground that Liberals accept each knock-down blow with a fainter and fainter emotion. So far has it modified our political thinking that we see Ministers themselves calmly discussing the prospect that the Lords will throw out, not a visible project of taxation, but an unseen, unprepared Budget.

Unfortunately, this nervous sensitiveness acts not merely on the electorate, but on the Lords themselves. They think that the atmosphere which hustling partisans have brought about is the real one, and that, in fact, they can act on finance with much the same freedom as on the legislative programme of the Government. The "sub-conscious inference," to use Mr. Wallas's phrase, is that the Government are at the end of their power and popularity, and that a clique of second-rate politicians, lacking either a pledged leader or a definite policy, and possessing no more ability on its Front Bench than is necessary to run a County Council, is about to step into their shoes. All the intellectual and moral processes—the attainment of unity within even the Conservative Party, the conversion of the country to a serious belief in Tariff Reform, the thinking out of the preferential policy, the settling of the vital differences between retaliation and protection, the reconciling of the inherent and vital contradictions between Colonial and English protection, or between the urban and the rural demand in our own country, and the ordering even of the preliminary lines of a scientific tariff—are brushed aside or ignored. It is assumed that the election of 1906 is already forgotten, that the growth of a Labor Party is nothing, or merely an incidental freak of the changeable democracy—above all, that the solid interests which our insular position sets up in favor of the Free Trade position can be treated as nought. Tariff Reform is just to have its "turn." It is to be "fair play" between the two creeds—Free Trade to-day, Protection to-morrow; and meanwhile, thank God, a House of Lords to save us from rampant Socialists like Lord Morley and Sir Edward Grey!

Now this vein of shallow time-serving, which exists both in the tactics of modern Toryism and to some degree in the mind of our urban democracy, is peculiarly dangerous both to Liberalism and to the present Administration. It favors the presentment of politics as an irrational movement of men's wills rather than as a deliberate process, designed for the discovery of means for the better government of the people. It lends itself to the most insincere devices of the popular Press, and to the manipulation of a single powerful, and not too scrupulous, personality. Indeed, we are not sure, if Mr. Chamberlain were at the height of his power, that it would not enable him to advance at least the first step towards the achievement of his fantastic later purpose by a kind of limelight effect, thrown by the popular speakers and newspapers of the Tariff Reform Party on to the screen of the national imagination. Now we cannot help this development, and the Ministry must not be indifferent to it. They have many admirable qualities, they are united, they have more than the average ability and resources of a good British Government. But their weak point is lack of pugnacity, the quality which all democracies, and especially all Englishmen, love and admire. Absorbed in their work, they forget that the first business of a party is to live, and that unless it carries with it the beliefs and sympathies of the public, even its work will be mere paper achievement. The country needs to be impressed with a lively image of the Government as a powerful organ of opinion and activity, which is not to be rebuffed by a body so essentially feeble in prestige and constitutional rights as the House of Lords. It needs to be thoroughly disabused of the notion that the next election will yield power to a ragged band of "Confederates," acting on their own party men in the spirit of the masked pirates of "Punch's" cartoon. It is on this side that the continuous yielding to the Lords, the failure to act up to definite and repeated pledges of action, has done so much harm. It has not only encouraged the Lords to unheard-of abuses of their power, but it has given a false notion of political values, and has put heart and seeming authority into a body of obscure, impracticable fanatics, who cannot get even a little of their way without damaging some of the most stable and firmly seated of our commercial interests.

It will be a great discredit to England if a Government so honest and public-spirited as this Administration goes under before a movement as intellectually and morally weak as that of the neo-Protectionists. No Liberal should admit, even to himself, that so humiliating an issue is possible. It is just as true to-day as it was on the morning after the General Election that there is no alternative to a Liberal-Radical and Free Trade administration, and that it is heresy to suppose that a force so powerful, with so much good work to do, and with so harmonious a relationship to popular needs, will yield its place either to the hereditary principle, which no democracy but our own has ever endured, or to a disunited and intriguing faction. We do not believe that the "Confederates" and their like will ever succeed. They are not of the stuff of which British Governments are made. Their proceedings are repellent to the "plain, honest man" whom Bishop Butler supposed to be the judge of our faith, and their economic creed is not understood by themselves or by the public. But their chief, perhaps their only, chance of success lies in the fear which the Government seem to entertain of the electorate. That fear, and the "doubling," feinting tactics to which it led, destroyed Mr. Balfour. It will work with still more pernicious effect on Liberalism, for if the party elects for the policy outlined by the "Westminster," with a timid, crouching attitude in face of the Lords, and the ideas and fighting energy of Radicalism left out, enthusiasm will ebb away from the party as the receding tide leaves a sandy shore. Socialism will then be left as the one fearless, combative party in the State, sucking up the flower of its serious youth and moral force. And that, in turn, would mean an indefinite lease of power for Toryism.

THE "DOMINATING" FACT.

When Mr. Asquith declared the question of the House of Lords to be the dominant issue in politics he was not merely announcing a policy but stating a fact. The policy may be weakened, impaired, rendered nugatory, or reversed. But the fact remains, and is none the less awkward however people may seek to ignore it. The natural inference from Mr. Asquith's words hardly needs to be pointed out. When the leader of a party has recognised and impressed on his followers that there is one issue which dominates all others, he naturally directs all his policy to dealing with that issue. He makes his preparations without delay for the inevitable encounter, he chooses his ground, lays out his plan of action, marshals his forces, and takes care that none of them are wasted on minor controversies. It was natural to infer from Mr. Asquith's speech at the National Liberal Club in December that this would be the line of action followed in regard to the House of Lords. A constitutional question had been raised which must ultimately be settled either by the vindication of the popular will or by the abdication of the Liberal Party. The challenge had gone forth from the Peers again and again, and at length it was understood that it would be taken up in earnest. By the Licensing Bill, Mr. Asquith had declared, the Government would "stand or fall." The Lords had rejected the Bill and challenged the Government to assail their position. Who could doubt the reply? Few would have doubted it if the speeches of some of Mr. Asquith's colleagues—men who used to pass for fighting spirits—had not developed a remarkable weakening on their leader's position.

Now that the Session draws near, and the decisive step of challenging the position of the Lords by Bill would have to be taken, voices are raised in more than one quarter on behalf of discretion and delay. Great things, it is said, remain for the Government to do. It cannot, indeed, deal with the land. It cannot reorganise local taxation. It cannot touch that part of the housing problem which raises these questions. It cannot carry out its pledges with regard to education. It cannot give the Welsh disestablishment. It cannot deal with Irish government. It cannot compass electoral reform. But a Liberal Government may safely acquiesce in the transference of the dispensing power in all these matters to an irresponsible chamber provided that it can organise labor bureaux, and carry some useful non-contentious measure for the relief of sweated industries, from which anything that meets with Mr. Balfour's disapproval will be carefully erased. As for the war with the Lords, it will be waged on the platform. Strong language will make up for weak action, and when the time comes the electors will do the fighting. "You do de pulling dis cow," said Brer Rabbit, "and I'll do de grunting, sez 'ee." Ministerial orators will do the indignation, and in the fullness of time Liberal electors, wrought to the highest pitch of indignation, will swarm to the ballot box in their millions and throw off the hereditary incubus.

Unfortunately, though the policy may be abandoned, the fact remains. Ministers may not choose to make the veto of the Lords the dominant issue in their policy. That is to say, they may do their utmost to postpone and avoid, instead of courting, the encounter. But dominant the issue will none the less remain. If they elect to remain in power as long as they can, two courses are open to them, and either of these is controlled at every turn by the shadow of the Lords. They may elect to press forward democratic measures which they believe to be just, which have the support of their party, and to which they themselves are pledged. If they do so, they will simply ask the House of Commons to spend its time in discussing Bills which the House of Lords will in due course reject. They may, for example, bring in a Bill for Welsh Disestablishment. If they do so, they will occupy the greater part of a session in passing it through its stages with the knowledge that in the end the whole of the Bill is not worth to Wales the paper that it is printed on. Welshmen are said to be very anxious that they should follow this course. We sympathise with them. But unless they secure a pledge from the Government to go to the country on Disestablishment, how far are they advanced? It is to be presumed that Welshmen are genuinely desirous of effecting disestablishment in Wales. If so, the way and means thereto are plain enough. They have to work for the removal of the present veto on Liberal legislation. Why they should interest themselves in the academic discussion of a measure which can never see the inside of the Statute Book is not easily to be comprehended by those who suppose them to be gifted with a full share of political intelligence. The same thing may be said of other democratic measures. What cannot be brought within the four corners of the Budget cannot be passed into law except by favor of Lord Lansdowne and Mr. Balfour. To continue to bring forward such measures is to repeat over and over again the exhibition, of which we have surely had enough, of the impotence of the House of Commons and the persistent authority of the Lords. There can be no doubt of the "dominance" of the House of Lords on these lines.

The alternative policy is for the Government to confine itself to measures which it believes itself able to pass into law. It is, of course, possible that some useful work may be done on these lines. There are some palliatives for unemployment, for example, which might go through by general agreement. There may be proposals in the forthcoming reports of the Poor Law Commission which would command general assent and might be embodied in a successful Bill. What is clear, however, about any such Bills is that they would have to be pared down to suit Lord Lansdowne's appetite. For example, there might be a measure for afforestation, and use might be made of it to provide some amount of employment for unskilled laborers. But it is clear that in such a measure any proposal for the acquisition of land must be put in a form which will suit the views of landowners. There may again be an Irish Land Bill, and it may pass, but only on terms which the landlords will cheerfully accept, and we know by experience what manner of terms those are. There may be some humane plans for dealing with the poor generally, but if they involve any serious increase of the rates or of the burden of taxation on property, we know beforehand what reception they will encounter. We cannot, after what has passed, expect the Lords to abate a jot or a tittle of their power. Their strength grows by exercise. Their moral authority increases with every successful enforcement of their legal rights, and they would be less than human if they did not gain in courage from the manifest reluctance of their adversaries to give blow for blow. On these lines also their position is the dominating issue. It determines policy all along the line.

This particular policy is, if we are to choose, the weaker of the two. It is frankly to acknowledge the dispensing power of the Peers, and to acquiesce in the humiliating position in which they have placed the representatives of the people. It is also to place those who have received definite pledges from the Government in an intolerable position. How, indeed, on these lines can the Government meet their Welsh supporters when they claim time and place for a measure of Disestablishment? Here is a Bill pledged as distinctly as any measure has been pledged. What is the Prime Minister to say when he is asked to redeem that pledge? Is he to plead precedence for other measures? The Welsh Liberals may point to long years of faithful support, given in patient hope of return in the shape of this particular measure of justice. Is he to plead incapacity? The retort is obvious. If the constitutional position has become such that the mere introduction of such a Bill is waste of time—and it would be waste of time—then it has become urgent that that position should be faced without further delay. The way to Welsh Disestablishment, like the way to land reform, to an educational settlement, to licensing reform, lies through the House of Lords, and over the obstruction of the veto. The time is approaching when the different political groups which are specially interested, one in this reform and one in that, will recognise that there is a single barrier which blocks them all, and will demand that the forces of the Government shall be turned upon that barrier. Then, perhaps, we shall see at length the desired co-operation of progressive forces. During the present, as under the last, Liberal administration, these forces have wasted three parts of their strength in struggling against one another for precedence—a vain precedence which could at best yield them the barren honor of cccupying the House of Commons with the fruitless discussion of abortive Bills. Experience must force on them the admission that he who wills the end must use the necessary means, and that, instead of severally clamoring for favor in the King's Speech, they must unite in urging on the Government the need for those effective measures which alone can clear the path for democratic legislation

AN EQUITABLE BUDGET.

Now that the declared attitude of the House of Lords renders it impossible for the Government to press forward any legislative measures of the first importance, they will, we suppose, devote their chief energies to the financial and administrative reforms which are within their competence. In the forefront of this labor stands the Budget, which, from the necessities of the financial situation, must involve important innovations in our revenue policy. In anticipation of the proposals for increased taxation, certain organs of the Opposition are raising the cry of "A vindictive Budget." They represent the Government as designing to punish the Lords for destroying their licensing and education bills, by fining the landowning, brewing and other propertied interests with which they are so closely identified. The sole fact which lends color to the suggestion is the avowed determination to increase the duties upon liquor licences. Had the Licensing Bill passed into law, the obligation thrown upon the Trade of making adequate provision against the ultimate withdrawal of the annual gift so wastefully bestowed upon it by the Licensing Authority, would have precluded any large increase of Licence duties. But now that their monopoly has been temporarily secured to them, the right and duty of taxing it revive. The proposal is, of course, no novel one. Long before the recent Licensing Bill was framed the high licence policy, pursued so successfully in the United States and in some of our own Colonies, was advocated in this country both by financiers and by many temperance advocates.

High licence duties will be imposed primarily for purposes of revenue, because more money is wanted, and the valuable privilege of selling liquor can be made an equitable and a profitable instrument for getting it. For the first canon of sound taxation is that taxes should be imposed in proportion to ability to pay. A legal restraint of competition, such as our licensing policy imposes, enables a trade to earn a surplus rate of profits, and this surplus has an absolute ability to pay. Other taxation, similiarly directed, must be associated with licence duties in the revenue proposals. Land values, though due only in part to legal restrictions, and chiefly to natural scarcity and human wants, are of the same economic character in respect of ability to bear taxation. Though in neither case can a very large and sudden burden be equitably placed upon properties and incomes which have in current usage been regarded as ordinary instruments of investment, this consideration must not deter a Government in need of increased revenue from seeking it in quarters where it can be obtained, without great sacrifice upon the part of individual owners, and without injurious reactions upon industry. The same reasons of equity support the proposal, which the Government is believed to have under contemplation, of a surtax upon high incomes. Whether we regard the origin of high incomes, derived largely from the profitable use of special advantages, natural, social, or educational, or the utility and enjoyment of their expenditure, it is equally clear that their owners have an ability to pay which is not possessed by the poorer classes.

It is very important that this principle should be clearly grasped. For we observe, even in certain Liberal quarters, the notion that an equitable increase of taxation consists in a proportionate increase of the existing taxes borne by the various classes of our population. It is held by those who entertain this notion that the imposition of some fresh indirect taxes upon articles of general consumption is justifiable, as the most feasible way of enabling the working classes to contribute their share. If we believed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer held in his mind any such design, we should not hesitate to denounce its impolicy, not upon grounds of electioneering tactics, but as a violation of sound principles of taxation. For although the working classes of this country, and the many types of small clerks and tradesmen, may not pay a larger proportion of their income in taxation than the better-to-do classes, the taxation which they bear is already in excess of any true "ability to pay," in the sense that the incomes of the majority of them are not adequate to support them in full physical and economic efficiency. Any increased taxation upon articles consumed by the workers would, by reducing the purchasing power of their wages or salaries, tend further to impair the productive efficiency of labor, and would thus diminish the output of national wealth and the national capacity to bear taxation in the future. It is no answer to this contention to urge that there is a large working-class expenditure on alcohol and upon other useless or noxious articles, for there is no means of fastening the incidence of working-class taxation so as to revolutionise their customary standards of consumption. Any increase of taxation, however small, upon the workers, will necessarily take its toll from the lives of their families. It will mean worse and less food for the children, more over-crowding, damaged health, and an increased death-rate. It is obvious that the poorer grades of workers have no "ability to pay," and it is highly probable that any attempt to impose increased taxes, direct or indirect, upon any class of our people below the level of the income tax would react detrimentally upon their vital conditions and their economic efficiency.

These considerations of national economy compel us to derive the required increase of revenue from properties and incomes which are created or enhanced by natural monopoly, legal privilege, or other advantages of opportunity. While the immediate necessities of revenue would of themselves suffice to justify the forms of new taxation here discussed, it must not be forgotten that this Government entered on its tenure of office with a peculiar fiscal mission. The defence of Free Trade committed to its charge is not realised by a mere conservative maintenance of freedom of imports. Free Trade is not safe unless a sound policy of constructive finance, sufficiently productive to supply all reasonably growing needs of public revenue, is established and set in operation before the alternative fiscal policy of Protection can be attempted. By a reduction upon military and naval expenditure the Government might have removed the whole body of breakfast table duties which still lie upon the consumers, and thus have further enforced the sound policy of direct as opposed to indirect taxation. But if this is impracticable, it remains none the less a matter of supreme importance that the Government should make its final impression upon our national polity by constructing a reformed system of revenue based upon the equitable and scientific principle of taxing incomes and properties which, because they are wholly or in part "unearned," have the maximum ability to pay.

CHINA'S ANTI-OPIUM CRUSADE.

With the assembling on Monday at Shanghai of the International Commission, the opium question enters a decisive, possibly its final, phase. China in the past few years has given many proofs of an awakening vitality, but none so moving and momentous as her declaration of war on opium. Her other efforts at reform in the spheres of education, of governmental administration, and of military organisation are sufficiently remarkable. The rise of a new, national, self-assertive, and independent spirit among her meek and disjointed millions is more remarkable still. But none of these phenomena is comparable, either in kind or degree, to the task she is now essaying. In attempting to achieve a moral conquest over herself, and to eradicate a national vice, China has embarked on an undertaking by the side of which our little temperance movements seem trivial, and the abolition of slavery a simple operation of cash remittances. China cannot free herself from the toils of opium by mere executive decree or the easy expedient of voting millions. She can only free herself if the force of an aroused public conscience is brought to bear upon scores of millions of individuals, each one of whom must be simultaneously making his own attempt at redemption. Such an endeavor on such a scale is without precedent in history, and its appeal to the sympathy, interest, and assistance of mankind is irresistible.

To ourselves especially its appeal comes home direct. There are few pages in British history less creditable than those which record the tale of our determination to force opium upon China in the interests of Indian revenues, and against the impassioned protests of the Chinese Government and people. It is true we were not the first to introduce the drug into China. But it is not less true that in the nineteenth century we twice went to war to coerce China into legalising a traffic she had declared to be contraband; that by smuggling and force we fastened the vice upon millions of Chinamen who might and probably would have escaped it; and that but for our actions China would not have relaxed the prohibition on the growth of native opium, in the desperate hope that the Indian drug might be driven out, and the Chinese Government left with a comparatively free hand for dealing with its own people. We cannot, therefore, evade some of the responsibility for whatever misery the habit of opium-smoking may have inflicted upon a country inhabited by one-fifth of the human race. Moreover, we are to-day virtually the only Power under whose auspices an export trade in the drug is carried on. The House of Commons has since unanimously condemned the traffic as "morally indefensible," and there is something instinctively repugnant to the best feelings of the nation in the thought of the Indian Exchequer being replenished from the assisted degradation of the Chinese people, and in the spectacle of our Colonies and settlements in the Far East deriving a considerable portion of their revenues from licensing opium dens. We do not wish to get entangled in any controversy over the physical, mental, and moral effects of opium-smoking. Those who assert that it is no more injurious than alcohol may be perfectly right, though the contention is scarcely reassuring. Those, again, who maintain that, consumed in moderation, it does no harm at all, and that the vast majority of the Chinese who indulge in the habit are moderate consumers, may also be perfectly right. But that does not alter the fact that the Chinese Government, which has after all the nearest and clearest view of the effects of the drug, has found them to be so disastrous to the national well-being that it has initiated a vast and unparalleled campaign of total prohibition. Without British support that campaign cannot possibly succeed. China will reduce the cultivation of native opium to little purpose if it continues to be smuggled or imported from India. Without eradicating the vice, she would in that case be merely depriving herself of revenue, and at the same time filling the coffers of the Indian Treasury. The assistance and co-operation of the Indian Government are, therefore, vital to China's hopes.

That assistance and co-operation have been cheerfully forthcoming, and forthcoming, too, on China's own terms. The Celestial Empire, ever sanguine, undertook to reduce the area under the cultivation of the poppy by one-ninth in each year. The Indian Government—the growth, manufacture, and sale of opium in India is a Government monopoly—agreed on its side to diminish its export of the drug by one-tenth annually. This arrangement holds good till 1910, when it will have been in operation for three years. It is to be continued on proof that China has fulfilled her part of the bargain, until, if all goes well, if no opium is exported from other countries, such as Turkey and Persia, the whole question will have settled itself at the end of the decade. But it is clear already that China has undertaken more than she can carry out in the prescribed time. That the use and cultivation of opium have both considerably diminished since the famous decree of September, 1906, is an undoubted fact. That they have diminished to the extent of one-ninth seems not only impossible to prove, but unlikely to be true. There can be little question either of the sincerity of the Chinese Government or of the sentiment it has awakened among the masses against opium-smoking. But the effect given to the Imperial Edict has, as usual, been haphazard, desultory, and unequal. In some provinces the Viceroys, the mandarins, and the educated classes have joined hands in a vigorous anti-opium crusade, have closed up the opium-dens, made bonfires of the pipes, opened free dispensaries for the cure of the habit, and organised meetings and leagues for combating the vice. In others the Edict has been either ignored or evaded, partly because many of the officials are themselves addicted to opium, partly because the revenue raised from the taxation of the poppy is an important asset in the provincial finances, and partly because the Chinese, the most democratic of peoples, decide for themselves how far the example or wishes of Pekin are worth complying with. The Central Government has undoubtedly done all that could be expected of it, and where the Viceroys have shown themselves equally energetic, they have never had to appeal in vain for popular support. The British Legation in Pekin reports that already smoking in public has become "bad form," and that should this sentiment gain in moral force, there seems no reason why it should not develop into "losing face," the most powerful of all the rules of Chinese conduct.

On the while, we think a good case has been made out for treating China generously in this matter, and for not insisting too stringently on the strict letter of the bond. If, indeed, the whole anti-opium movement peters out, the Indian Government is necessarily released from its obligations, and the question will have to be reconsidered, if at all, on a new basis. But while there is a reasonable prospect that China, by her own exertions, will ultimately succeed in her valorous object, she ought not to be held to a too rigid covenant. Every allowance should be made for the unprecedented difficulties of her task, and the Indian Government, which has seconded her initial efforts in an admirable spirit, should be encouraged to persevere in its generous course. We do not, however, hide from ourselves for one moment that the whole problem is wrapped in perplexities. The loss of three and a-half or four millions sterling a year to the Indian revenues is a very serious prospect, and the difficulties of prohibiting the cultivation of the poppy in the native States would be not less serious. Then, again, if the House of Commons orders the Governments of Ceylon, the Straits Settlements, Hong Kong, and the Federated Malay States to forego the revenue they have hitherto derived from licensing opium dens, the question of compensation from the Imperial Treasury is bound to arise, and cannot, in justice, be evaded. And, finally—and here the International Commission ought to be of real service—it is of great interest and of more than a little importance to determine how far the diminution, such as it is, in opium-smoking among the Chinese masses has been offset by the growth of opium-eating or by addiction to alcohol, morphia, or cocaine.

THE LIBERAL PARTY AND THE NAVY.

We hope that the usually well-informed London correspondent of the "Manchester Guardian" is wide of the mark when he predicts that the Navy Estimates will show an increase of six millions, i.e., that our naval expenditure will rise to about 38 millions. Now let us be clear in this matter. Many Liberals have never been greatly attached to the formula of the two-Power standard, because of its inelasticity, and the way in which it seems to stereotype naval policy at periods when it should follow the movements of our diplomacy, and the new incidents and groupings in the world of foreign affairs. Our naval policy in the past was built on tolerably safe, if not very scientific, lines. We looked after the next strongest Power, which was usually France, and, if we were alert, kept well in front of her. Then came the period of continental combinations, and, sliding into the two-Power standard, we held France and Russia—then in marked unfriendly relationship to Great Britain—in our minds' eye. In a word, naval and foreign policy coincided. But great changes followed, all but one favorable to ourselves. Russia ceased to be a naval Power, having been crushed by an ally of our own—the new force of Japan. France passed from hostility to a warm and close association with us. An American entente removed another source of peril, and was followed by the practical withdrawal of the British fleet from the American-Atlantic zone. And the general and very real anti-British sentiment which arose out of the South African settlement vanished into air. Only one new and serious phenomenon occurred, and that was the growing alienation of Germany from England and the growth of the German Navy. That was a single measurable peril, to which the formula of the two-Power standard happened to be inapplicable. But so long as that form of words was governed by the phrase well used by Sir Edward Grey at Coldstream—namely, that it applied only to a "probable combination," its retention formed no ground of quarrel with the Government, and no reason for breaking up the national unity on the subject of naval strength.

But now an attempt is being made to crystallise the two-Power standard in a form in which it constitutes an offence to the United States, and a grievous new burden on the electorate. With no disrepect to Mr. Lee or Mr. Bellairs, we decline to take either as authorities on the mixed problem of policy and defence which constitutes the measure of our Naval Estimates. Least of all, have they a right to interpret Ministerial policy or the feeling of the Liberal Party. There is a sentence in Mr. McKenna's rather excessive speech on the Navy at the Fishmongers' Hall which seems to suggest a desire to give the hardest and most literal interpretation to the Prime Minister's answers to Mr. Lee—in other words, to direct our naval strength against a possible combination of the German and American fleets, plus ten per cent. There has been some misapprehension on this point, which we understand that the Prime Minister's communications to Mr. Murray Macdonald and his friends have set at rest. We are quite willing to leave out many almost certain calculations—such as the union of the French and British sea-power in the event, for which no reason in policy or nature exists, of a war with Germany. But we are not willing, not merely to ignore these factors, but to give shape to the monstrous spectre projected by Mr. Lee, and if the Naval Estimates are framed on such an hypothesis, the Liberal comity about the Navy will be destroyed. The Prime Minister's pledges are not only incompatible with it, but can be cited in direct support of a policy of retrenchment.

Moreover, no need for such an increment as six millions exists in the competition of the German programme. The critical point in that instrument, so far as we are concerned, arises in 1911 and 1912. It is possible, by supposing that Germany comes up to date with all her constructive work, to say that for some weeks of these years the power of the two countries in "Dreadnoughts" alone will be nearly on a parity. But if we build four such ships every year, begin them a little earlier than usual, and finish them within two years, 1912 will leave us with a start of at least five such ships. But with the "Dreadnought" type the German strength in great battleships almost ends. We, on the other hand, have our two Nelsons, our eight King Edwards, our five Duncans, and our six Formidables. We also have an overwhelming preponderance in first-class cruisers, and only the other day the "Times" was arguing in favor of reckoning the strongest and swiftest of these vessels as "capital" ships. Such a standard of strength as this, which yields every canon of safety and preponderant force laid down by the naval school, can be maintained without a plunge into thoughtless extravagance. No Liberal Government concerned both for the credit of the country and the raising of its standard of civilisation, can decree a rise of six millions at one bound of the Naval Estimates. Such a step would destroy its unity, would falsify the personal pledges of every one of its leading members, including Mr. McKenna himself, and would be an act of useless incitement to the growth of armed force in the world. We have no monopoly of the power of production. Where we build others build. But we set the pace, and, being first, our neighbours naturally quicken their step when we take a fresh stride forward. On safety we are all agreed, and also on the lines which secure safety. But a step beyond safety is waste, and worse than waste.

The vast insuring public cannot fail to welcome the announcement that the Government propose to require some provision against the promotion of irresponsible fire insurance companies. Under the Life Assurance Companies Acts a deposit of £20,000 is the preliminary essential to the launching of a new life insurance company. A similar requirement is enforced under the Act of 1907 before the business of employers' liability can be pursued, but hitherto no provision has been enacted with respect to fire insurance. There can be no reasonable excuse for this exception, for the public require quite as much protection in this branch of insurance. The number of new fire insurance companies has increased of late years altogether out of proportion to real requirements. It is hard for the ordinary insurer to discriminate between the good, bad, and indifferent. It is, therefore, well that the Board of Trade should lend its assistance to the unwary, and guide them in the direction of security. The wholesale cutting of rates is an easily obscured process. But it can have but one result, and in most cases the lesson is learned too late.

Life and Letters.

THE ENJOYMENT OF THE EARTH.

"Further," says Mr. Thomas Traherne, "you never enjoy the world aright, till you so love the beauty of enjoying it that you are covetous and earnest to persuade others to enjoy it." Most of those who in latter years of depression and grey skies have revealed themselves as "covetous and earnest to persuade others to enjoy it," have been great physical sufferers—from a life of physical torment, perhaps intensified and heightened by that torment, "corroborating forever the triumph of things." Stevenson and Henley, Walt Whitman, and Richard Jefferies, all those who, in Mr. Edward Thomas's eloquent definition, have "made to-day the first of days and this field Eden," have learnt this intoxication of present pleasure from association with present pain. "He was a very marked case of hysteria in man," was one medical verdict upon Jefferies. In the long years of torture which terminated in premature death, "in some way not yet to be explained," says his latest biographer, "the mortal pining of his body was related to the intense vivacity of his last years." "Some of my best work," he wrote, "was done in this intense agony." In this latest and best of his biographies, "Richard Jefferies: His Life and Work," by Edward Thomas (Hutchinson & Co.), the irrelevant part of his writing is placed in its suitable position. He appears sometimes in description and commentary of the life of rural England, a life crumbling in his day and now already becoming a memory. He plunged occasionally into politics, first as a violent opponent of Joseph Arch and the Laborers' agitation—the voice of the tenant farmer class from whom he sprang; later as a kind of Socialistic Radical, a bitter opponent of the feudal system. There have been claims advanced for him as a naturalist, an observer of the ways of beasts and birds; claims which, before criticism, are compelled to abandon any extravagant demands. For none of these things will he be remembered; but as one of the company of "Life Worshippers" who, awakening while other men were asleep, could behold something of the splendor of the world, the magic of each moment as it passes, vindicating its existence before it dies.

And here is the ultimate relationship with Whitman; no more of a naturalist, no more of a politician. Jefferies died when he was thirty-eight, Whitman lived to a ripe old age. One possessed a physical vigor lacking in the other, and a quick, exuberant response to human comradeship and affection. In outward and visible form, in texture of mind, there was no obvious resemblance. But in each there was the same gluttonous grasping at the present, the sucking of the rind and core of its delights; in each the same response to the consciousness of the crowd; in each the same refusal to accept any standard but the standard of Life, before which many impulses and all inhibitions stand judged and condemned. "I believe in the Body," is the beginning of the creed of either. "I believe all manner of asceticism," is the confession of Jefferies, "to be the vilest blasphemy; blasphemy towards the whole of the human race. I believe in the flesh and the body, which is worthy of worship. . . . The ascetics are the only persons that are impure." So his worship of natural things became a kind of physical avidity; intensified by a sense of touch and vision exceedingly delicate and violent. He devoured color, finding "every spot of it a sort of food." In the later spring "the ears listen and want more," he writes: "the eyes are gratified with gazing, and desire yet further; the nostrils are filled with sweet odours of flower and sap. The touch, too, has its pleasures, dallying with leaf and flower." "Can you not almost grasp the odour-laden air," he asks, "and hold it in the hollow of the hand?" It is a riot of sense-given impression, accepting, without questioning, very content. For this man is of the company who find the world "more to man since he is fallen than it was before," accepting the challenge of the mystic—"you never enjoy the world aright till the Sea itself floweth in your veins, till you are clothed with the Heavens and crowned with the Stars."

It is a Pageant, the pageant of the moment which passes and yet abides, ever old and ever young. It delights in "the old road, the same flowers." It accepts the wind's whispering that "there never was a yesterday and never will be to-morrow." It finds "always hope in the hills." "All the grasses of the meadow were my pets," wrote Jefferies of his childhood's days. "I loved them all." Of poppies, "there is genius in them," he proclaims, "the genius of color, and they are saved." With Thoreau he will abandon all that most men care for to hear one cricket sing. "I found from the dandelion," he cries, "that there were no books." "The sunlight puts out the words of the printed books as it puts out the fire; the very grass blades confound the wise." To that sunlight he brings as a testing instrument all clamorous and appealing things; the hopes and dreams and perplexing ways of men. He is a worshipper of the sun, falling in the afternoon in Trafalgar-square, on the crowded Brighton promenade, in the woods of high June, or under a cold November day. He applauds it stored in the gold of the wheat or woven into the petals of the rose. "More sunshine; more flowers" is a perpetual hope for the future of mankind. For this sunshine is life—riotous, confident, unashamed; life congruous to and illuminating all the physical beauty of the human body, of the world of out of doors; the life which made him almost intoxicated with the marbles in the British Museum, which drew him, resisting, to the unknown city multitudes; which left him in childhood on the downs, "utterly alone with the sun and the earth," lost in an ecstasy, an inflatus at "the inexpressible beauty of it all."

And as it approved so it condemned; all energies directed towards blind alleys, burrowings underground; all that was unable to encounter with exultation the test of that strong stimulus and fever. "It rebels," says Mr. Thomas of his work, "against all the gods, against all things except life." Jefferies is a rebel as Blake was a rebel, and Lafcadio Hearn and Thoreau and Whitman; against the mechanic pacing to and fro; the set, grey life; the apathetic end. His vision of his generation was of the man with the muck-rake, ever being offered the golden crown, ever assiduously and with downcast eyes raking together the sticks and small stones and the dust of the floor. "The pageantry of power," he affirms, "the still more foolish pageantry of wealth; the senseless precedence of place; words fail me to express my utter contempt for such pleasure or such ambitions." He is dissatisfied that life for the general is "so little and so mean." "Back to the sun," he is always preaching, from "house life"—"house life" which he denounces as the creed of the half-alive. "Remain; be content; go round and round in one barren path, a little money, a little food and sleep, some ancient fables, old age, and death." As a mystic he belongs to the class of those who aspire, rather than of those who acquiesce. He was never in danger of becoming a quietist. Rejoicing in the moment, he was never content with the moment, demanding always that which the moment, with all its rich benefits, could never bestow. He asks "for a larger frame, a longer day, more sunshine, a longer sleep." He rises from the banquet of life, never satisfied; encouraging illimitable desires. Longing—an invalid—for "the unwearied strength of Ninus to hunt unceasingly in the fierce sun," "still I should desire greater strength and a stouter bow," he acknowledges; "wilder creatures to combat." "The intense life of the senses," he cries, "there is never enough of them." "I should like to be loved by every beautiful woman on earth." Meat and wine he finds pleasant and most refreshing, but "these are the least of all." He has never had enough of the vehemence of exertion, the vehemence of sunlight and life, the insatiate desire of love, divine and beautiful, the uncontrollable desire of beauty. "Give me these in greater abundance," he prays, "than was ever known to man or woman." It is the prayer of a cripple, in poverty and pain, stricken down ere the journey has well-nigh begun; so soon to pass to where all journeys end.

And what he desired for himself he desired for all his companions; a life which will transfer no affections to some problematical future, but here and now will riot and rejoice in the glory of the sum of things. He is perplexed and saddened by the confusion that man has made of his world. "In twelve thousand written years the world has not yet built itself a House, nor filled a Granary, nor organised itself for its own comfort. It is so marvellous I cannot express the wonder with which it fills me." Yet he believes that there would be enough for all, if only all were willing to share it. He brushes aside the ordinary ambitions which inflame mankind: "money, furniture, affected show, and the pageantry of wealth." He longs for the coming of a day when the ambition of the multitude will be fixed on the idea of form and beauty. "I would submit to a severe discipline," he declares, "and to go without many things cheerfully, for the good and happiness of the human race in the future." "The labor of our predecessors in this country, in all other countries of the earth is entirely wasted. We live—that is, we snatch an existence—and our works become nothing. The piling up of fortunes, the building of cities, the establishment of immense commerce, end in a cypher. These objects are so outside my idea that I cannot understand them, and look upon the struggle in amazement. Not even the pressure of poverty can force upon me an understanding of, and sympathy with, these things." But he does not despair of the future. "Earth," he asserts in "The Pageant of Summer," "holds secrets enough to give them the life of the favored immortals." His heart was fixed firm and stable in the belief that "ultimately the sunshine and the summer, the flowers and the azure sky, shall become, as it were, interwoven into man's existence." "There is so much for us yet to come," he believes, "so much to be gathered and enjoyed."

He is one of the very few writers who can look towards the future with hope, whose visions and Utopias do not end in a sense of dust and ashes—an infinite weariness. The cities ever growing higher of M. Anatole France, in the heart of which men piled up wealth on a diet of sour milk and digestive tablets, the fat, settled comfort of Mr. Bellamy, even the playing at children of William Morris, all leave an impression of emptiness and fatigue, life settling down upon the leas. John Stuart Mill, while oppressed by the problem of what mankind would do when all the old wrongs were righted, found consolation in the poems of Wordsworth, in the vision of the world learning from Wordsworth serenity and content. There is more satisfaction to be obtained from the writings of Jefferies and Whitman. Wordsworth assumes a nature benignant and responsive, a spirit whose dwelling is the light of setting suns and in the mind of man. The result is a kind of refined and sometimes too rarefied Pantheism, which is compelled often to shut its eyes to the Nature which is "red in tooth and claw," and equally bestows increase and destruction. Jefferies was no nature worshipper. He wove from his dawns and sunsets no roseate scheme of natural religion. He acknowledged the "blunt cruelty" of natural things. He always confessed no intelligence in human affairs: outside—a Nature not so much hostile as utterly indifferent to all the ardours of mankind. "The sea, the earth, the sun, the trees, the hills, care nothing for human life." He had no specific "humanitarian" teaching, and in early days delighted in the work of devastation and of slaughter. He was bored by the claims of science, and thought nothing of the jargon of "Evolution." The strength of his position rests in his association of these realities with the overmastering "passion of life." To him it was an adventure always, into a region of fairyland, occupied as to another modern mystic with "dust like the wreck of temples and thistle-down like the ruin of stars." His strength was in himself. It was from that hidden, mysterious source of vitality that the colors appeared which he sought in field and flower, that rain of fairy gold which flung itself over the common things until every bush was burning with fire. He did not find a Presence which disturbed with the joy of elevating thoughts. He found a glamor—inimitable, inexplicable—which excited to delirious emotion. Others have demanded Order, Understanding, evidence of Purpose or Compassion. He asked only for Beauty. And that Beauty was not denied to the supplicant. The Seasons passed in their procession; Birth and Death wove their webs of being; men were seeking, and in vain, for sympathy and pity behind the veil of visible things. Enough for him that here the sunlight flickering on the stems of old trees, the sap creeping up through a million tiny stems, the changes of expanding petals and of withered autumn leaves, could reveal a magic and a mystery which time could never dim nor age destroy.

BURNS THE REALIST.

It was a hundred and fifty years this week since the birth of Burns, and if we were to say that we could mark the beginning of modern English literature with that event, every Scotsman in the Lowlands would spring from his chair and protest that it was impossible, because Burns was a Scot. We are quite aware that Burns was a Scot. It is only as a Scot that he counts. The moment he tried to be English he dropped his distinction, and ceased to be a writer of much significance. Like so many of the Irish poets, he wrote English as a foreign language, always moving stiffly in it, as one unaware of the intimate value of its words, so that his English verses seldom rose above the level of the album. Take his English at its very best. Take the famous and often quoted lines from "Tam o' Shanter":—

> "But pleasures are like poppies spread,
> You seize the flow'r, its bloom is shed;
> Or like the snow-falls in the river,
> A moment white—then melts for ever;

Or like the borealis race,
That flit ere you can point their place;
Or like the rainbow's lovely form
Evanishing amid the storm."

It is all very pretty, but with what relief, with what sense of power renewed we reach the next line:—

"The hour approaches Tam maun ride!"

Or what a change from the sickly, stuffy atmosphere of drawing-room verse it is to go back to the free air of gutter and tavern in the poem's opening lines:—

"When chapman billies leave the street,
And drouthy neebors, neebors meet,
As market-days are wearing late,
An' folk begin to tak' the gate;
While we sit bousing at the nappy,
An' getting fou and unco happy,
We think na on the lang Scots miles,
The mosses, waters, slaps and styles,
That lie between us and our hame,
Where sits our sulky, sullen dame,
Gathering her brows like gathering storm,
Nursing her wrath to keep it warm."

After comparing these two passages within a few lines of each other in the same poem, no one could doubt that the Burns who counts—the Burns of poetry—is the born Scot and not the sham Englishman. If one had to make a selection from Burns, the surest way to begin would be to cut out everything he wrote in English. We may be told this would cut out the admired lines "To Mary in Heaven." Let them go, then; they are not the true Burns. They do not compare in passion or expression with "The Banks o' Doon," or even with "Highland Mary." The poet is working in a material of which he is not master, and he is hampered by exactly those traditions and well-worn uses which it was his distinction to break through or throw aside. Let it be granted that Burns was, before all things, a Scots poet. No Scotsman could outdo us on that article of faith though he preached it through a week of Sabbaths. We will even say that the nearer Burns came to writing like an Englishman the less of a poet he was.

And yet we find in him for the first time some of the most distinctive notes of our modern English literature. There is in him the clinging to reality, the determination to see things as they are, and to report them without the embellishments of tender or poetic convention. In Collins's "Ode to Evening," and even in the spirit of Gray's "Elegy," we may trace the beginnings of the revolt against the frigid tradition of the classic school. It is a revolt that we specially connect with Wordsworth's name, and it was developed in such opposite writers as William Blake and Crabbe; but Wordsworth himself always owned his debt to Burns:—

"Whose light I hailed when first it shone,
And showed my youth
How verse may build a princely throne
On humble truth."

Burns seldom reached the depths of passionate emotion. He never touched such strings as "A slumber did my spirit seal," or "I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree," and a few other poems that since his time have become part of our common inheritance. The nearest he came to passion was in the "Banks o' Doon," and the nearest he came to magic was in the haunting and exquisite lines:—

"The pale moon is setting beyond the white wave,
And Time is setting wi' me, O!"

Certainly he has many charming and tender lovesongs—"Of a' the airts the wind can blaw," "O, my love's like a red, red rose," and "Mary Morison," which he ends with the very rare achievement of an epigrammatic form that does not spoil the beauty:—

"If love for love thou wiltna gie,
At least be pity to me shown;
A thought ungentle canna be
The thought o' Mary Morison."

But it was not in depth of passion that he was greatest. It was in his intimate touch with outside reality in man, beast, and nature that he was the first of our poets, and has remained unsurpassed even by Wordsworth. Sometimes, it is true, our weak English throats have to gulp his words like burnt porridge, and when in the fate of the Auld Brig we come upon the line "And dash the gumlie jaups up to the pouring skies," we look round for the burbling Jabberwock to come whiffling past. But if we could drop out the three words borrowed from chilly tradition, what a first-hand picture of a driving winter's day is in the verse:—

"When biting Boreas, fell and doure,
Sharp shivers through the leafless bower,
And Phœbus gies a short-liv'd glow'r
Far south the lift,
Dim-dark'ning thro' the flaky show'r
Or whirling drift."

And even more intimate is the similar glimpse of the mouse exposed to winter's misery:—

"That wee bit heap o' leaves and stibble
Has cost thee mony a weary nibble!
Now thou's turn'd out, for a' thy trouble,
But house or hauld,
To thole the winter's sleety dribble,
An' cranreuch cauld!"

Wordsworth, as he said, followed that line of humble truth; most of our greatest poets have followed it since then, even when their sublime theme has been most aloof from mice and men. But the man who does a thing first generally does it best, because he needs more stuff in him to clear the path of tangle and choke-weed. It was not Burns's life as a small farmer that made him a poet, but as he happened to have genius too, his life as a small farmer gave him a sureness of touch, a closeness of affection for bird and beast and earth such as no scholar in universities or suburbs can ever hope to acquire.

Reality has been one dominant note in our literature for something over a century; humor has been the other, and in both Burns set the example that we were to follow. To be sure, he was not the first realist or the first humorist in our literature, but since his time the things have become more pervasive, and have taken a rather different sound. In his humor as in his realism the secret of Burns is again his intimacy, his personal closeness to man or beast, so that he always seems to be thinking from the inside, and becomes the very soul even of what he satirises. As with all true humorists, the best of Burns's humor is touched with sympathetic affection, such as is seen in the old farmer's salutation to his old mare, or in the sweet appeal of the girl in "Tam Glen," which Matthew Arnold thought such an excellent antidote to moonshiny lyrics:—

"My minnie does constantly deave me,
And bids me beware o' young men;
They flatter, she says, to deceive me;
But wha can think sae o' Tam Glen?"

There is the same sympathetic insight in the "Jolly Beggars," the poet's masterpiece of rollicking humor, and one of the most genuine scenes of revelry outside Rabelais:—

"Life is all a variorum,
We regard not how it goes;
Let them cant about decorum
Who have characters to lose."

Burns had, besides, the humor of satire in its finest form. "Death and Dr. Hornbook," "The Holy Fair"—there are many excellent examples, and they reach their highest perfection of malignant laughter in "Holy Willie's Prayer." Every verse is steeped in the finest venom, but take the second as most quotable for memory:—

"I bless and praise thy matchless might,
When thousands thou has left in night,
That I am here afore thy sight,
For gifts and grace,
A burnin' an' a shinin' light
To a' this place."

Combine the satire with the affection and you get perhaps the highest form of Burns's humor, and a form very characteristic of the British mind. In Burns it reached perfection in the "Address to the De'il," and the ode "To a Louse, on seeing one on a Lady's Bonnet at Church," which concludes with the well-worn quotation:—

"O wad some Pow'r the giftie gie us
To see oursels as others see us!
It wad frae many a blunder free us

And foolish notion:
What airs in dress and gait wad lea'e us,
And ev'n Devotion!"

But if only one example of Burns's humor were allowed to survive, it would be the "Address to the De'il" that we should choose, for in that there is some touch of all his finest powers in humor—his irony, satire, intimate knowledge of the poor and their traditions, an unfailing command of strange but necessary language, and over all the queer glint of humorous affection, such as a nice child feels for a wicked doll:—

"But, fare you weel, auld Nickie-ben,
O wad ye tak a thought an' men'!
Ye aiblins might—I dinna ken—
Still hae a stake—
I'm wae to think upo' yon den
Ev'n for your sake!"

It is hard to say how far one writer really influences his successors, or how far they would be different if he had never written. But if we may trace any tradition in literature at all, we may see in Burns a source of two great influences. On the side of his close intimacy with nature, his pitying affection for the country people, birds, beasts, and all things of low estate, his work was carried on by Wordsworth, and has descended to Thomas Hardy and to others who have found in humble truth "the aristocracy of passion." In satire, in humor, and prolific splendor of production he was the natural predecessor of Byron, though Byron surpassed him even in his unfaltering ease of expression. Both sides of his genius have, by one means or another, entered into the daily life and thought of our people. As one may see by associating with soldiers and ordinary workmen, an affectionate sympathy with common and unfortunate things characterises our country, and at the same time the people retain a freedom of satire and ironic criticism that saves them from sentimentality. We do not say that Burns was the origin of these characteristics. But it was because he possessed both beyond the limitations of others that his power survives, as Wordsworth said, deep in the general heart of men.

THE FORTUNATE MUSICIAN.

One cannot feel in approaching the centenary of Mendelssohn's birth the satisfaction of a posthumous reparation which is often a frequent justification for these festivals. Mankind has no need to repent in sackcloth when it hears his name. To him at least our fathers did not give a pauper's funeral as they gave to Mozart, nor bury him, as they buried Poe, under a tumulus of slander, which their sons have had to excavate. They baptised him Felix, and, as he lay dying, all Europe waited for the physician's bulletins. We miss the adventurous pleasure of snatching his work from oblivion, and recoil rather shyly from the attempt to compete with the plaudits which overwhelmed him living. We know that little girls through all these years have never ceased to practice the Songs without Words upon suburban pianos, that prodigies will continue to make their premature débuts with the violin concert, and that choral societies in every town of the North of England will go on performing the "Elijah" with an annual piety and a respectable zeal. The natural man is rather tempted to resent so much good fortune, and to deny to this facile conqueror a place among the heroes who have made garrets immortal, and caused our ears to throb with the melodious memory of their pain. And, indeed, the gods brought to his cradle every gift save the possibility of a profound experience. His very name was inherited fame. He had wise parents, devoted brothers, cultured sisters, enlightened teachers, and a whole salon of the great to applaud his earliest efforts. So soon as he could pen an exercise in counterpoint, a private orchestra was waiting to perform it in the family mansion. Hegel and Humboldt were proud to attend the lad's Sunday parties. Goethe received him even as a child. He was hailed at seventeen as a composer of distinction, and recognised at twenty as an Admirable Crichton. His competent water-colors and his capable verse translations of Terence and Dante attest the care with which every talent had been fostered. The natural deaths of mother and father and sister were the only griefs in his sunny career. Its one annoyance was the slightly embarrassing patronage of his Sovereign; its one disappointment that the enthusiasm of Paris and Berlin seemed cool in comparison with the devotion of London and Leipsig. He had his good things in this life, and posterity feels that the debt of gratitude to his genius was paid in full. It was a slight and charming personality that grew up amid the favors of a contented world, which only asked that he should please it. The longing, the struggle, the intensity of thwarted emotion, the devotional no less than the revolutionary spirit were absent from this genius, to whom fortune had given grace and tact and the plastic sense of beauty.

It would none the less be an unhistorical view, with would regret either the facility of Mendelssohn's talent, or the ease of his progress through the world. It is possible that poverty or friendlessness might have brought some new element of depth, or unrest, or rebellion into his work, and that his tact, learning, and industry would have enabled him to find for deeper thoughts a still beautiful expression. But his generation would have lost more than posterity could have gained. He stood at a turning point in the social and economic evolution of music, and he played in its development a part which cannot be measured by the intrinsic value of his compositions. Music had been, up to the death of Mozart, the exclusive amusement of the wealthy and the well-born. Executants and composers alike were the dependants, sometimes even the liveried servants, of nobles and princes. The earlier glories of the Viennese school were a decorative adjunct to the lives of feudal magnates and princely churchmen. Beethoven alone was too proud and too strong to live by patronage, yet too profound and too much an innovator to capture in his lifetime an intimate place in the affections of the middle-classes. It wanted no originality in Mendelssohn's time to conceive the possibility of this new rôle. But his inherited wealth, his charm of manner, and the immediate appeal of his compositions, even to the less educated taste of his day, were necessary elements in a success which helped to lay the foundations of the position that music holds to-day. The modern industrial town was springing up, with leisure and wealth enough to have æsthetic needs, but without traditions, without education, and with little of the curiosity which can to-day win a hearing even for Strauss. Birmingham and Leipsig were typical of the age, and it was precisely in Birmingham and Leipsig that Mendelssohn became a demi-god. He had all the qualifications, negative and positive, which made for a popular success, even in Early Victorian England—external grace, an affectionate and modest nature, the reputation of a good citizen who had none of the dreaded "Bohemian" eccentricities of manners and morals, an attitude towards religion which made the Churches his allies, and with it all, the gifts of a brilliant executant, and the suggestion of a not too dangerous or diabolic magic in his improvisations. His songs and his occasional writings for the piano perpetuated his influence in homes which would have given no welcome to greater music, while his more ambitious compositions had a tunefulness which captured the simple listener without the ordeal of a second hearing, and a technical mastery which secured the no less enthusiastic approbation of the learned. He was all the while recovering for this larger public the neglected legacies of the past. At his hands the world at last consented to receive the inheritance of Bach, for it was to his enthusiasm and insight that the Passion Music owned its second performance, and its subsequent conquest of Europe; and he it was, more than any other individual, who forced a sceptical world to realise the greatness of the later works of Beethoven. His Leipsig concerts set the model to civilisation, and the Conservatorium which he founded there perpetuated this tradition, and became the typical school for an art which had at last freed itself from its dependence on courts, and based its future on the devotion of multitudes. In this broadening of the basis of music, this expansion of its appeal, which coincided so wonderfully with the recovery of so much that was abstruse, and with a general raising of standards, Mendelssohn was a pioneer whose triumphant personality compelled success and conjured with difficulty.

It would be an easy task to draft an effective speech for a Devil's advocate who should oppose the canonisation of Mendelssohn among the greater masters. Much of his more popular work has worn itself threadbare, but in the process what pleasure and uplifting, what consolation and contentment has it not brought with it to three generations. Even the symphonies, some movements excepted, sound to modern ears comparatively slight and superficial. The limitations of his talent are sufficiently obvious. For all his preoccupation with religion he never struck the devotional note which one hears in Bach and Handel and Beethoven. His lyrical gift is merely pretty when one compares it with Schumann's or Schubert's. Weber excelled him in reproducing the atmosphere of the German Romantics. His special talent was perhaps, to render the comparatively slight moods which an external scene may awaken—to paint the water-colors of music. But there remains, after all these deductions, an enduring performance of an unassailable beauty. No familarity can state the exquisite grace and appropriateness of the Midsummer Night overture, a miracle which ranks in the world's creations beside Rossetti's "Blessed Damozel," as the fresh work of an inspired youth of seventeen. The Octett for strings retains its place among the unalloyed joys of the concert room, and in some degree that may be said of most of his chamber music. One may doubt whether any composition save the Dead March in Saul has been put to a test so severe as the Violin Concerto. One has heard it hurried by the virtuoso, labored by the child prodigy, and sugared by the conscious sentimentalist, yet its serene beauty survives untainted and unspoiled. A comparison with the greater works in the same form of Beethoven and Brahms, cannot degrade or unclass it. Even the simplicity of its slow movement, with its discreet suggestion of a still Sabbath evening in some Rhine valley in early summer, tranquil and God-fearing and gently melancholy, does not lose its abiding dignity. The supreme tact of the writing, which suggests in every bar a conscious adaptation to the resources of the violin, leaves it none the less spontaneous and lyrical. A severe measurer of words might refuse it the epithet "great," but in an age when every writer strains for profundity and meaning, for force and passion, it is a rarer praise that we can call it "beautiful." One may argue about Mendelssohn's precise place in the apostolic succession, but at least there is no one living to-day who deserves to rank beside him on any measurement of æsthetic values. The Germans, with their pedantic pursuit of the idea of development in art, are ready to hail any fanatic who will exaggerate a principle or carry some tendency a little further than his predecessors. They have all but sophisticated us into forgetting that a work of art is an appeal to the senses and the imagination. Beauty and pleasure are words which they have relegated to the vocabulary of Philistines and children. We stand to-day in need of a little shameless hedonism in our artistic valuations. When we return to that criterion we shall experience fewer doubts about the place of Mendelssohn in music. Strauss, they say, must be heard often to be understood. It is higher praise that Mendelssohn can be heard often and enjoyed.

OF GOOD AND EVIL.

It is sometimes remarked of the more thoughtful of the rising generation that they are cooler in their feelings about right and wrong and in their bestowal of praise and blame than seems consistent with the enthusiasm of youth. This is sometimes deplored as implying some laxity of moral fibre. But this, most likely, is an erroneous interpretation of what is rather to be regarded as a natural fruit of modern education. Though determinism as a set philosophic creed has never won wide ascendancy, the scientific treatment of history and human nature it expresses must have modified in various subtle ways the views and feelings of the younger generation upon those problems of good and evil which their parents solved by rule-of-thumb theology or merely traditional morality. Considerations of "heredity and environment" have come partly to temper, partly to displace, the older sense of "the exceeding sinfulness of sin," for it is on the side of evil that the change of feeling is most evident. There is no straight denial of responsibility, but everywhere a growing tendency "to make allowances." Fragments of psychology and of sociology creep into the mind by a thousand channels, bringing some suspension or qualification of the old customary or instinctive feelings. Nor is it only the more scientific view of human nature that conduces to this change. Our ampler understanding of the economy of Nature seems to justify the existence of many beings and deeds that once from ignorance seemed purely noxious. An informed evolutionist can hardly keep the old anthropocentric view of the universe—regarding everything as made to serve some purely human end. No doubt we must still continue to kill man-eating tigers, garden slugs, and tuberculous bacilli. But as we comprehend more clearly the part they play in the scheme of things, we come to hate them less. The bacteriologist at any rate must acquire some positive sympathy with what may be termed the "point of view" of the bacillus. And so will not the wider Naturalist find in the various sorts of human parasites, who once seemed wholly evil—the criminal, the beggar, the usurer—their necessary functions in the cosmic order, and will not such discovery moderate his hostility towards them? Is not all this and much more involved in the aphorism "Tout comprendre c'est tout pardonner?" But scientific restriction is not the only tendency of modern thought that sets this way. Philosophy and religion have made various inroads upon the old sharp antagonism of good and evil. Though the central thought of Emerson's doctrine of compensation was old as reason itself, the freshness of its modern utterance chimed in with many spiritual and intellectual needs of the age. The vindication of the moral law "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he reap," by linking it to the whole realm of natural causation, came as a welcome successor to the dying Calvinism of New England, while the optimist and the indifferentist alike turned the plastic teaching to their own temperamental purposes.

Though nothing was further from Emerson's meaning than any desire to weaken the human war against material or moral evils, a loose application of his doctrine of compensation as an argument for laissez faire is very common. A certain admitted relativity of pleasure and pain, of good and evil, success and failure, is treated as a natural balance which it is foolish or futile to seek to disturb. Though seldom openly applied to morals, it often serves to turn aside resentment against material injustice. The poor, they tell us, get quite as much enjoyment from their lives as the rich: the latter have pains as numerous and as intense as their pleasures; the balance of satisfaction for the upper and the lower classes, and even for individuals, is not very different, or, if it is, such remedies as reformers would apply will not secure a better adjustment. While this doctrine seldom comes out into the open, it underlies much of the emotional apathy of the ordinary well-to-do educated person in considering the poor.

Again, though the logic of Christian Science is contemptible enough, the attitude of thought and feeling which it represents is worthy of much consideration. The habit of "denying" evil, verbal in the first instance, cannot remain without influence upon feeling and action, and the willingness of millions of persons in civilised countries to adopt the ritual of such denial indicates a previous softening of the older feelings of hate and indignation. No doubt Christian Scientists will retort that, instead of slackening in the struggle against evil, they are bringing the struggle to a triumphant victory, for to deny evil is to annihilate it. But this first principle of Christian Science will appear to most of us to beg the whole question. More subtle, though less popular in its immediate influence, is the new theistic monism struggling as Personalism to distinguish itself from the older forms of Pantheism, which finds such eloquent exponents as Dr. Campbell. Every attempt at interpreting the Universe as a single spiritual system is, of course, confronted with the same necessity of defining its attitude towards the sin, the pain, the falsehood, the ugliness, which appear either as breaches or as blemishes in the goodness and harmony of the whole. We do not say that the bold endeavors of the defenders of divine immanence to distinguish evil as the figment of a finite and separatist view, is unphilosophical. Philosophers, Eastern and Western, have, in many ages, held the doctrine of the purely partial or illusory nature of evil, and the subtlest of our living philosophers has expressed it in the forcible apothegm: "This is the best of all possible worlds, and everything in it is a necessary evil."

But what concerns us here is not the truth or falsehood of these views or principles, but the fact that they are held, and that they are spreading throughout the intellectual atmosphere. To certain robust intelligences it appears that such thoughts are powerless to effect feeling and conduct. No abstract doctrines of fate or determinism, they contend, ever weaken the actual sense of liberty and responsibility, and no enhanced understanding of the uses of evil and pain will make us hate them less or slacken our efforts to abolish them. Our knowledge that the sun does not move every day from East to West does not interfere with our practical conviction that it moves this way. How much feebler will be the power of mere thought to alter the inherited tradition of feelings about good and evil evolved in long aeons of a struggle for morality!

But is this robust answer quite satisfactory? The reaction of the new thoughts about the meaning of good and evil is already visible in important acts of conduct, in education, the treatment of crime, and in the whole realm of psycho-therapeutics. Not only a few advanced men and women, but quite ordinary citizens, are coming to feel towards many crimes and vices, at any rate when they do not touch themselves too nearly, a toleration which would have shocked their grandfathers, as much as the cruelty with which the latter treated children, criminals, or lunatics shock the present generation. That there is still much to seek in all these acts of conduct we are aware, but about the steady stream of tendency there can be no dispute. The really interesting speculation is how far it will carry us. When scientific psychology and the new spiritual monism have had time to work, not only on the few, but on the many, so that a new moral atmosphere is generated, how far will it affect, not merely the intensity of the emotions which good and evil, noble and base characters and conduct evolve, but the very nature of the sentiments of praise and blame? Brought up to see in every soul the product of its ancestry and its human surroundings, shall we come to feel towards virtue and vice the same sort of likes and dislikes that we feel towards a shapely or an ugly plant, or towards a machine that runs smoothly or one that "goes wrong"? Or is there something so invincibly unique in human personality and the arts that emanate therefrom as to preserve the instinctive qualities of moral love and indignation against the allied invasion of scientific determinism and spiritual monism? Perhaps, indeed, the conflict may moderate the older Hebraic asperity of moral passion into a "sweet reasonability" which shall keep the glow of moral fervor without its consuming fire. Toleration and consideration are such priceless gains that it is difficult to believe that character and conduct can be enfeebled or imperilled by any changes in feeling about good and evil which they involve.

PROFESSOR MURRAY AND THE NEW HELLENISM.

"I remember about twenty years ago reading an obituary notice of Bohn, the editor of the library of translations, written by Mr. Labouchere. The writer attributed to Bohn the signal service to mankind of having finally shown up the Classics. As long as the Classics remained a sealed book to him, the ordinary man could be imposed upon. He could be induced to believe in their extraordinary merits. But when, thanks to Mr. Bohn, they all lay before him in plain English prose, he could estimate them at their proper worth and be rid for ever of a great incubus. Take Bohn's translation of the 'Agamemnon,' as we may presume it appeared to Mr. Labouchere, and take the 'Agamemnon' itself as it is to one of us: there is a broad gulf, and the bridging of that gulf is the chief part of our duty as interpreters."—Professor Murray's Inaugural Address.

By the application, in fact, of the newer geography, sociology, and economics, the Greek is at last attaining his true historical setting. But Hellenism has been taking an even greater step than this. As the modern scholar brings all his new material to bear, and grows nearer to the real meaning of Greek life and thought, he tends more keenly to realise how close akin it is to the life and thought of the modern world. Never since it ascended the throne of culture at the Renaissance has Greek thought exercised so wide an influence. Professor Murray believes that for more than a century past "certain mitigating and hopeful strands of feeling" in English political thought have been due to the permeation of Greek ideals: "an unquestioning respect for freedom of life and of thought, a mistrust of passion and a confidence in Sophrosynê, a sure consciousness that the poor are the fellow-citizens of the rich, and that statesmen must, as a matter of course, consider the welfare of the whole State." And to-day the practical influence of Greek studies is everywhere gaining ground. Even writers of that school which insists on its intellectual aloofness from academic thought, such as Mr. Graham Wallas, or Mr. H. G. Wells, confess page by page their debt to Plato.

To keep alive this influence is the high function of modern scholarship—such is Professor Murray's main theme, and no one has striven with more patient erudition than he, with more poetic insight, with more widely human sympathy, to fulfil that function. Every scholar remembers the immediate effect of his first book, "Ancient Greek Literature," the fruits of over ten years of daily communing with the Greeks—remembers, and still registers his debt to it. After that masterly review of the whole range of Greek writers, he chose out the narrower field in which perhaps he has become best known to the general public—Greek poetry, and especially the editing, interpreting, and, to that end, translating of Euripides. The result is ancient history now, the creation of a new and lovely store of English verse, and the revelation of Euripides as a thinker so earnest, so "modern," that two thousand years are as yesterday, and many a problem of our present world is touched by and responds to the magic of his thought. Some of our deepest religious emotions have been stirred by that brilliant exposition of the last phase of Euripides' ideas in the "Introductory Essay," and the translation of the "Bacchae":—

"Love thou the day and the night" . . . "It is only so that life can be made what it really is, a Joy: by loving not only your neighbor—he is so vivid an element in life that, unless you do love him, he will spoil all the rest!—but the actual details and processes of loving."

"Happy he on the weary sea
Who hath fled the tempest and won the haven.
Happy whoso hath risen, free,
Above his striving. For strangely graven
Is the orb of life, that one and another
In gold and power may outpass his brother.
And men in their millions float and flow
And seeth with a million hopes as leaven;
And they win their Will, or they miss their Will,
And the hopes are dead or are pined for still;
But whoe'er can know,
As the long days go,
That To Live is happy, has found his Heaven!"

And how aptly did some of the translations fit the dominant political situation! It was at a moment when we in England were particularly concerned with the ethics of conquest that the "Trojan Women" appeared, emphasising with almost unbearable realism the ghastly side of war, "the crying of one of the great wrongs of the world," "the first great expression of the spirit of pity for mankind, exalted into a moving principle," The "Medea," too, was staged not long after "Votes for Women." How many a husband has told his wife, somewhat in the spirit of that famous speech of Jason's, to be content with the position he has won her? Or what keener satire could we write on the claims of the imperialist gin-seller to civilise the inferior races!

Apply the same method—a minute appreciation of the fine shades of language, wedded to a sympathetic and human imagination—apply it to Homer, and the epic of the springtime of the Greek world comes straight into our life side by side with the tragedy of its autumn. To those who had been used to read Homer with a "slack imagination," the "Rise of the Great Epic" must have been as a key to Olympian mansions unknown and unsuspected. The Homeric problem, which had long seemed to the layman nothing but a typical academic dispute, a mystery of armour and pottery and dialects, suddenly becomes a matter of intense human interest—the story of the moral progress of a race, eliminating from its literature the relics of barbarism that lay so close behind it. The analysis of Aidôs (Shame or Sense of Honor) and Nemesis (Righteous Indignation) is a permanent contribution to the history of moral evolution; and, as we turn the pages, the ethical creed, thus revealed in Homer, primitive as it is, stings again and again our private and even our national conscience.

Thus has Professor Murray's work exemplified the treatment of Greek literature which he recommends to the students and teachers of Oxford. First to understand: for this, all the scrupulous attention of the old scholars to the words, aided by a new visualisation of the life in which those words were written. Then to interpret, to the pupil and to the world: for this, the enthusiasm for humanity, the wide historical view, the knowledge of modern needs; so that the ideals of Pericles may be indeed a κτῆμα ἐς ἀεί, a possession for ever and Plato's "Republic" may be still "a pattern laid up in Heaven" for our guidance.

With such a purpose the scholar's life needs no apology. "However unworthy we ourselves may be, let us not despise our calling." That is the new Professor's message to Greek scholars at Oxford. "It is not to be made light of because it produces no great discoveries or inventions, no stir and change upon the face of the world." "We have, more than most people, the joy of having given ourselves up to something greater than ourselves. We stand between the living and the dead. We are mediators through whom the power of great men over their kind may still live after death; through whom the living may catch the tones of more august voices than are now to be heard upon the earth."

Letters from Abroad.

THE GREAT AGENT PROVOCATEUR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—It is well-known that the social and revolutionary movement in Russia is divided into two main currents. On one side is the Socialist-Democratic Party, which includes the great majority of the town workmen, and played the decisive part in the general strikes of 1905 to 1906. On the other side is the Revolutionary Socialist Party, which has followers chiefly among the intellectuals of the towns and among the peasants, who are also, of course, attached to the Social-Democrats.

The principal difference between these organisations consists in tactics, their object being identical, that is to say, the attainment of international Socialism. But this difference of tactics is so profound and springs from ideas as to the evolution of modern society so essentially opposed, that in spite of the decision of the International Congress at Amsterdam in favor of Socialist unity all over the world, the two great Socialist parties in Russia remain entirely distinct.

The Social Democrats rest their tactics on the action of the organised masses. They look for the fall of Tsarism, and the final victory of Socialism to an essentially working-class movement. Therefore, they think that it is only the political and economic organisation of the workers, their "direct action" in strikes or at the barricades, and their political and parliamentary activities, which can lead to decisive results.

The Revolutionary Socialists, on the other hand, attach much importance to the individual action of heroic fighters who, by striking at the chief representatives of power, can, they think, destroy its authority. This is the origin of Terrorism. They also think that the primitive communal organisation of the Mir contains elements suited to the immediate formation of a Socialist society, and makes it unnecessary for the peasants to pass through the proletarian phase which Marx's theory declares to be inevitable.

The Revolutionary-Socialist party is, above all, concerned to carry on the work of the "Narodnaia Volia," which, from 1879 to 1884, made the autocracy tremble, but, at the same time, achieved nothing practical, showing that a mere isolated handful of heroic personalities cannot change the constitution of a country, even after succeeding in a series of sensational acts of violence, such as the death of Alexander the Second.

It was after the disappearance of the "Narodnaia Volia" that the Social-Democratic party took shape, about 1890, under the influence of Plekhanoff, Axelrod, Deutsch, and Vera Sassoulitch. It soon obtained an influence so considerable as apparently to wipe out every other organisation. Its part in the revolution, and also in the second Duma, to which it sent seventy deputies, is well known.

However, several years after its formation in 1895 there was formed the Union of Revolutionary Socialists, which was really the nucleus of the other great organisation, and which carried on the theoretical work of the "Narodnistes," and, in particular, insisted on the necessity of violence. The new group was a small one, and until about 1903 it merely vegetated. Then, with the murder of the Minister, Sipiaguine, it began a series of reprisals.

From the beginning the new party included among its most influential members a student of the School of Mines, eventually an engineer. He was called Eugène Phillipovitch Azeff. Azeff, no less than M. Guerchouni, or even more, as some say, was the soul, the supreme head, of the secret group specially charged with the preparation and execution of outrages.

You can imagine, therefore, the sensation caused when the report began to spread that Azeff, "the great chieftain," was merely an agent provocateur, the tool of a body of high police officials.

The disclosures of the author of this article, and of one of his Russian friends in the "Daily News," in "The Times," and simultaneously in the "Journal," and "l'Humanité" in Paris, were reproduced in all the great European newspapers, and had a stupifying effect in Russian Revolutionary quarters. At first attempts were made to minimise the importance of the part played by Azeff, and the extent of his betrayal, but details more and more numerous and precise were published by the "Journal" and "l'Humanité." It was necessary to acknowledge the weight of the evidence, and the fighting spirits were at last obliged to ask themselves this terrible question:—"Had not their party for seven years been a mere puppet in the hands of the police officers of the Tsar, and an involuntary instrument of the criminal coterie who create and sustain the Autocracy?"

In any case, it now appears that acts of physical force which for five years have struck consternation into the official world of Europe, and have excited the enthusiasm of friends of Russian liberty, were known beforehand to members of the Tsar's police. The attempt against the Governor of Oufa, Bogdanovitch, "the execution" of the sinister Dictator, Plehve, the murder of the Tsar's uncle, the Grand Duke Sergius, Governor General of Moscow, the successful assault on Launitz, the Prefect of St. Petersburg, and many other unsuccessful attempts on the Grand Dukes Nicholas and Vladimir, on General Trepoff, on the Department of Police, on Kleigels, Governor General of Keiff, on the Tsar himself, were believed to be known in advance to persons attached to the detective service or to the Court.

All the attempts which failed were condemned to failure in advance by Azeff. Those which succeeded only owed their success to the fact that he desired success, or to circumstances which at the last moment defeated his purpose.

The first of these outrages, that on Bogdanovitch, was specially organised by the famous revolutionary, Guerchouni, whose funeral in Paris last year was attended by more than 15,000 persons. The police were warned by Azeff, and one of his most important agents, a man named Mednikoff, left for Oufa in order to arrest the famous terrorist after having received the promised reward of 10,000 roubles. However, Guerchouni, disregarding Azeff's advice, had forestalled the hour for which the attack had been arranged. Mednikoff learned by a telegram which he received in the train, that Bogdanovitch had been killed, and that Guerchouni had fled to Kieff. He telegraphed to the police of that town, where Guerchouni was arrested, transferred to Schlusselburg, and sometime afterwards to Siberia. The indomitable Terrorist managed to escape and to reach America by way of Japan.

The circumstances of the Grand Duke Sergius's death are, in the words of Jaurès, "terrible and mysterious." In any case, it is certain that members of the Moscow police were cognisant of the proceedings of the bomb thrower, and of those of his associates. Azeff, who organised the crime, kept them fully informed of its smallest details. When things were coming to a crisis, the innocent detectives asked if it was not time to put an end to this dangerous game. The answer from headquarters was that no one was to be touched. Several hours later the Tsar's uncle was killed by Kalaieff.

It seems that a Court faction, of which the Grand Duke was the chief, aimed at nothing less than the dethronement of the Tsar, who was thought to be too "liberal" or too "weak," in face of the growing revolution. It was to get rid of this violent and despotic man that Azeff, "the greatest 'agent provocateur' of his age," as Bourtseff, his chief accuser, called him, was set to work.

Amongst the acts of force which succeeded in spite of Azeff must be mentioned that of which the Prefect of St. Petersburg, Launitz, was the victim. The Terrorist who was ordered to carry it into effect, and was to have been arrested after being denounced by the Agent Provocateur, received, no one knows how, a card inviting him to be present at the opening of a hospital which the Prefect was attending. He took advantage of this to put forward the outrage by a single day. He fired two revolver shots at Launitz, and was killed by an officer.

I should be exceeding the limits of this article if I referred to all the crimes which were directed by Azeff. Among those which did not succeed was the attempt on Trepoff on a train in which the Grand Duke Nicholas was travelling, but, above all, a plot to destroy the Sûreté in St. Petersburg, the details of which are extremely dramatic.

The fighting organisation had decided to blow this office up, but Azeff betrayed and arrested those to whom he had assigned the task. One does not know whether to admire the courage of the Terrorists or to shudder at the horror of their plans. These young men were to turn themselves into "living tombs." After fastening belts stuffed with dynamite round their bodies, they were to have entered the Sûreté, and then to have blown up themselves, the building, and every soul it contained.

But the most formidable attempt organised by Azeff aimed at nothing less than the person of the Tsar. The Agent Provocateur then acted in the interests of a coterie similar to that of which the Grand Duke Sergius had been the chief, and which aimed at changing the occupant of the Throne. The seriousness of the plot was increased by the fact that the Tsar was to be murdered at the moment of his meeting with the chief of a great foreign State, who must have perished with him. No human power could have hindered the success of this conspiracy, which only failed through the hesitation at the last moment of its immediate agents. If we are to credit the information which we possess, the part played by Azeff in the risings at Moscow and Cronstadt, where his arrangements led inevitably to the failure of the revolt, was also considerable. From the same source we learn that it was under Azeff's orders that Gapon was killed. Azeff suspected Gapon's loyalty, and feared possible disclosures to the authorities, with whom the ex-priest had better relations than himself.

The part played by this Satanic personality extended to every conspicuous drama in the Russian revolution, and the number of his victims, young men and girls, old men and women, despatched by him to the scaffold, to the whipping-posts, to Schlusselburg, or to Siberia, cannot be numbered. To these must be added the unhappy creatures whom he had executed as traitors because he feared that they guessed his true character.

By dint of continued watchfulness, maintained at the peril of his life, Azeff had contrived to get rid of his less dangerous antagonists, and it is to the patient sagacity of an older revolutionist, Vladimir Bourtseff, that we owe the discovery of his treachery, in spite of the protests of the heads of the party who, up to the last moment, refused to believe that their "head" was an agent provocateur. Bourtseff, convinced by the proofs that he had accumulated and by those furnished him by the former chief of the detective service at Varsovia, persisted in his charges and their truth was finally accepted by the Tribunal composed of Prince Kropotkin, Vera Figner, and of the friend of Marx and translator of "Capital," Herman Lopatine, the veteran of the "Narodnaia Volia." Before the Tribunal could come to its decision, Azeff fled, thus apparently acknowledging his guilt. It seems that he is actually in Russia.

It is impossible as yet to estimate all the political consequences of this business. If it has produced discouragement and despair among the Revolutionary-Socialist party, the blow is likely to fall still more heavily on Tsarism. Never,, to use Jaurès's words, have "the foul and bloody depths" of Autocracy been brought so clearly to light as in this story of mysterious crime done to the order of the representatives of authority. As for the Russian revolutionaries, they would do well to draw from these events the necessary conclusions in theory and practice. Tsarism will never fall save through the collective efforts of the organised people.—

Yours, &c.,
JEAN LONGUET.

THE MYSTERY OF RADIO-ACTIVITY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The novelty of the treatment of disease by light has worn off, and the general public do not nowadays read so much about the mysterious influences of radium and the "X"-rays. But what was wonderful a few years ago is still more wonderful to-day, if only the skilled "X"-ray operators, swathed up with professional etiquette, would openly confess their beliefs.

Lately I spent a few instructive hours in the crowded "X"-ray department of a London hospital. The medical officer was following up a suggestion from the U.S.A. that a certain action of the diaphragm had a bad influence in the early stages of consumption. A young, weedy, Cockney lad of eighteen, stripped to the waist, lay down on the canvas stretcher bed in the dark room. The "X"-ray bulb hissed and spluttered as it filled the room with a weird light, and lit up with phosphorescence the screen swaying closely over the patient's chest. There were two fine cross lines intersecting each other on the screen, just as in a telescopic gun-sight, and a clever dotting mechanism communicated with a large sheet of paper lying directly below on the floor. To the medical operator's eyes, the contents of the chest cavity were as clearly defined on the screen as if it were laid open, and as the cross lines followed the outlines of the several organs within, a line of dots covered the paper underneath. To me, this marvellous screen-work seems always to possess the spirit of the supernatural.

You cannot stay, indeed, long in a light treatment department before its associations raise speculations upon the dread disease that haunts so many thoughts. It was in this department, during the early unprotected stages of "X"-ray treatment, that an ulcer of undoubted carcinoma was produced upon a healthy finger. Two successive operations saved the hand, but the discovery that the mineral, lead, in its various properties was impervious, in some marvellous way, to the penetration of the terrible ions of the destructive "X"-ray has obviated such dreadful perils to present-day operators.

"This remaining ulcer," observed my friend, pointing to the spot on his ray-mutilated hand, "I'm to have cut out shortly." "These three small, hard brown spots here (showing me his right hand) are also malignant." "Is that, then, the beginning of an "X" ray carcinomalous sore?" I remarked. "Yes! It is so diagnosed now, and the elimination of each by the knife at this early stage will prevent further development." "So that it is carcinoma produced by radio-activity, without a doubt?" I continued. "Yes." "Do you support, then, the suggestion that radio-activity is at the root of all cancerous troubles?"

"I think it is just possible. I am almost convinced the cause will be discovered by following closely this line of investigation. It is a line that the research department investigators are now closely engaged upon. There is radio-activity, just possibly with malign influence upon the surrounding tissues in which it is embedded, in a renal calculus."

"Then," I interpolated, "a facial rodent ulcer may commence, by this theory, on the cheek through the malign radio-activity from the facial bones?" "It may be," said my friend; "it is quite probable."

And now, sir, why is it, I ask, that the specific cause of this dreaded disease has baffled the efforts of the research laboratories of the entire world? The years of investigation are passing on now. Consider what in other respects has been achieved during the past two decades. The specific bacillus of cholera, tuberculosis, diphtheria, typhoid, Malta fever, beri-beri, syphilis, with others, have all been revealed, and in cases the evil effects mitigated. If cancer is caused by a malignant microbe it is nothing less than extraordinary that it should have escaped detection so long. If the disease is really caused by radio-activity from within the human body, just as we know that it can be created from without, then the mysterious delay is explainable.

As the world knows now, the "X"-rays and radium have effected wonderful cures in skin diseases. It is a pity that the professional knowledge of the treatment by ultra-violet rays is not as old as that of medicine. Results, by its treatment, have been, it must be confessed, irregular; success, in many instances, has accompanied failure in others, without any apparent reason.

Of course, what I have written has not much bearing on the equally awful problem of the large, profound tumors. The knife still remains the radical cure, with the subsequent pain of the severed nerves and glands. But even these sarcomatous tumors in hospitals in Continental Europe are being treated in instances with success, partly by extirpation and by radium.

There is no lack of inventive initiative in the light treatment department. I was shown before leaving a new method of rodent ulcer treatment in initial stages. "When a wart on a cheek begins to break down, and show its malignancy," observed my surgeon friend, "I coat it over thickly with zinc powder, cover this with cotton-wool, place the electrode on the top, and pass through the electric current." "Is that method better than injection?" I queried. "Much more so! When injected, the fluid is at once passed into the blood circulation, and swept away; when flashed through by electricity, the powder passes into the skin-tissues, and remains there." "And the effect," I observed, "is beneficial?" "Marvellous, the results have been!" the surgeon added.—Yours, &c., J. Reid.

Letters to the Editor.

"WHY?"

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—There is a passage in "Le Jardin d'Epicure" which seems apposite to the present discussion:—

"Le mal est nécessaire. S'il n'existait pas, le bien n'existerait non plus. Le mal est l'unique raison d'être du bien. Que serait le courage loin du péril et la pitié sans la douleur? Que deviendraient le dévouement et le sacrifice au milieu du bonheur universel? Peut-on concevoir la vertu sans le vice, l'amour sans la haine, la beauté sans la laideur? C'est grâce au mal et à la souffrance que la terre peut être habitée et que la vie vaut la peine d'être vécue."

A world of absolute happiness and goodness is ideally possible, and may exist somewhere, but we can form no conception of such a world, and we should have to be radically changed in order to find it tolerable. As Anatole France says in the passage immediately preceding that quoted above:—

"Quand on dit que la vie est bonne et quand on dit qu'elle est mauvaise, on dit une chose qui n'a point de sens. Il faut dire qu'elle est bonne et mauvaise à la fois, car c'est par elle, et par elle seule, que nous avons l'idée du bon et du mauvais. La vérité est que la vie est délicieuse, horrible, charmante, affreuse, douce, amère, et qu'elle est tout."—Yours, etc., R. E. D.

THE BEAUTY OF A NATIVE TONGUE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have read your article on this subject with very great interest and pleasure. May I suggest that if the works of Sir Walter Scott were read and studied in schools, the days of Romance would be recalled, if not the thing itself revived. There are those who hold that history can be most effectively taught through Scott's works; and the Edinburgh Sir Walter Scott Club, of which I have the honor to be an original member, gives prizes for the best essays by school children on a given work each year, with highly satisfactory results. I can hardly imagine any boy reading "Rob Roy" or "Ivanhoe," or "The Fortunes of Nigel," without being saturated with romance; or any girl reading "The Heart of Midlothian" or "The Bride of Lammermoor," or "Red Gauntlet," without a similar result. I have heard it objected that Scott could not have written what is called in these days of hurry and trashy literature a "short story"; but I conclude that the objectors have never heard of, much less read, "Wandering Willie's Tale," which is probably the best short story ever written, or likely to be. Of course, I include the poems amongst Scott's works, and I know of nothing better calculated to arouse the imaginative faculty than the perusal of such pieces as "The Lady of the Lake," "The Lay of the Last Minstrel," and "Marmion." As you read, you can hear the tramp of armed men and the sound of martial music, and feel the breeze on your cheek as it is wafted along the heather-clad hillside. After all, this is education of the highest and best kind.—Yours, &c.,

THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The statement of the Prime Minister that those who wanted land to cultivate themselves had a "statutory right" to it stands in serious danger at present of taking its place in some districts amongst other more or less shadowy privileges of the freeborn Englishman.

In making this carefully considered statement, it is not my intention to adopt a hopelessly pessimistic view either of the Small Holdings Act itself or of the prospect of its provisions being eventually complied with. A somewhat wide knowledge of what is being done to carry out the provisions of the Act only convinces me that the chief requisite for a good while to come is vigorous and unresting action by the Board of Agriculture, which, it must be remembered, is anticipated and provided for in the Act.

As chairman of the Allotments and Small Holdings Association, and a member of the Allotments and Small Holdings Committee of the Worcestershire County Council, I can testify that, broadly speaking, everyone knows that the Act has come to stay, and I gladly recognise the hearty support which is being given by many Conservatives to the adoption of the Act and its principle of supplying land to those who intend themselves to cultivate it. In this county about 12½ per cent. of the approved applications for land, which amounted to 7,300 acres, have been already supplied, either through public or private action. If the same were true of the whole of the country there would probably be three or four times as many new small holders as we have been told there are.

From correspondents in every part of the country, from reports in newspapers, and the information supplied by the travelling agent and lecturer of our association, it is perfectly clear that many county councils have done very little indeed to carry out the Act. Northumberland, it is stated, places the responsibility for administering the Act on the Board of Agriculture, and from many other counties reports are to hand that very little is being done.

One could enlarge almost indefinitely in giving chapter and verse for this assertion, but that it is the fact very few people in a position to know will be prepared to dispute.

Let us not disguise for one moment that the difficulties of getting land and interfering with existing tenancies are in themselves genuine and great hindrances. No reasonable person doubts that there must be delay. What is requisite is that a period should now be named when these delays must be overcome.

This can only be done by means of resolute and untiring action by the Board of Agriculture through its Commissioners, and backed up by the approval and influence of the Cabinet and Parliament and by the force of public opinion.

This is too serious a matter in the national welfare and the life of this Government and the Liberal Party to be left to the usual administrative action of a Government department.

The passing of the Act was a distinct and definite break with the recent past of the land law and land customs of England, and consequently demands special watchfulness and special energy. I cannot help pointing out the advantage there would be in a permanent Parliamentary Committee, which should watch over the progress of the Act—and what better time for prompt action in Parliament could be found than in the debate upon the Address? It is certain that unless some such action is taken there will be deep discontent amongst a large section of the supporters of the Government in the country districts, which it is to be hoped may be more or less satisfactorily met when the annual report required by the Act is laid before Parliament by the Board of Agriculture.

Not only are certain county councils to be found serious fault with, but some departments of the Government will have difficulty in showing that their action has not had the effect of delaying and hampering the progress of the Act.

The inspector of the Board of Agriculture when in this county stated that the Local Government Board would not sanction loans for buildings on small holdings beyond thirty years, although the Act allows fifty years, but after protest this instruction was speedily withdrawn.

Again, there have been bitter complaints of the action of the Woods and Forests Department, which one critic, an alderman of a southern county council, described as a "humbugging lot."

The Board of Agriculture is doubtless conscious of the need for action; perhaps it may be understaffed, and apparently there has been no record kept there of the applications for small holdings, which might well have been done. The statement of the Board of Agriculture that it is advised that a man holding several small holdings under 50 acres apiece is only to be held as the occupier of one holding for the purposes of the Act, unless it is withdrawn, will put an end to the hope of extending the number of small holders in many districts.

Again, it is to be deeply lamented that the Board of Agriculture has encountered difficulty from the Government Law Officers giving their opinion in favor of the view that when a council has bought land and let it to tenants, the rent should include the cost of the sinking fund for repaying the principal as well as the interest on the loan.

Recently, after protest, it has been laid down by the same bewildering authorities that in this matter a council may do as it likes! But what is the law, and should it not be made clear that a tenant should not both rent and pay for his land at the same time?

The time has come, after twelve months' experience of the working of the Act, for the Board of Agriculture to give notice to the county councils who have not succeeded in procuring land that the Commissioners will after a stated period be required to enter upon the duties prescribed by the Act as those they must adopt where a demand for land from suitable persons is believed to exist, and for which demand a proper provision is not being made.

Only by this action will the well-grounded hopes of widespread social improvement in our rural districts be properly met. It is safe to say that for one man already applying for land there are many more waiting for the result before themselves making an application.

Enough promise of good from the Act has been afforded to justify resolute action on the part of the Government, which is undoubtedly suffering from the present condition of things, which should be speedily and effectively altered.

Deep disappointment is natural to men who applied for land, and, so far as they can see, are no nearer getting it than they were a year ago.—Yours, &c.,

FREDERIC IMPEY,
Chairman, Allotments and Small Holdings Association.

THE CITY MEETING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The City meeting is to support the Prime Minister's own statement as to the two-Power standard. The official declaration happens to coincide with the definition unanimously accepted by the Navy Committee of the House of Commons, on whose behalf Mr. Arthur Lee asked the questions to which Mr. Asquith gave such emphatic and satisfactory answers. You state that "we know well that the Prime Minister repudiates any such interpretation" as a two-Power standard involving a ten per cent. superiority over Germany and America combined. What is your authority for this grave contradiction of the Premier's official utterance? Personally, I believe your quoted words merely represent your own wishes; but they certainly show the necessity of a City meeting to confirm the Government in their official utterances. May I also suggest that your estimate that such a two-Power standard would cost £52,000,000 a year is ludicrously exaggerated?—Yours, &c.,

CARLYON BELLAIRS.

The Savile Club.
January 23rd, 1909.

[Mr. Bellairs will not have failed to observe that the Lord Mayor has withheld his concurrence from the meeting in question, doubtless for excellent reasons. Mr. Bellairs might use the interval thus provided in working for those economies in naval and military expenditure to which his election address pledged him. As for the Prime Minister's declaration, Mr. Bellairs may rest assured that neither the Government nor the Admiralty contemplate building against America and Germany combined, with ten per cent. over, and that the body of Liberals who approached Mr. Asquith are satisfied on this point. The two-Power standard rests on its old basis—that of superiority to what Sir Edward Grey called at Coldstream a "probable combination"—not on Mr. Lee's and Mr. Bellairs' additions to it.—Ed. "A NEW YEAR ENTERTAINMENT."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your very entertaining article under the above heading, and dealing with the discovery of Miss Charlesworth, may I beg of you a tiny corner of space in justice to myself, the luckless wight who "spotted the lady." It was not the full pride of my garrulous impudence that set me on this entertaining hunt, but merely love of adventure. Surely such an amazing young person was worthy the steel of the "halfpenny newspaper," at which the sixpenny NATION sneers, and out of which it makes a two-column story of entertainment for its own readers?

And, finally, is meeting this merry young Jill o' the Wisp in a public drawing-room, recognising her, and taxing her with the identity she disowns, "disregarding every social convention"?

Are you not unnecessarily cruel to a newspaper (of your own kidney) which managed to bring off this small "exclusive," and then left to other journals the joy of paying large sums of money to the lady to induce her to admit her identity?—Yours, &c.,

BLUFF.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There are at the present moment two supreme instances of Bluff before the British people—namely, the Motor Bluff and the Tory Bluff.

The essence of Bluff consists in a defiance of Fact. About two years ago, Lord Montagu of Beaulieu, acting the character of Mr. Micawber to the life, assured the House of Lords that popular "prejudice" against motorists had greatly diminished, that friendly relations would soon be established, and that we might look with confidence to the near advent of the time when the lion would lie down with the lamb. The volume of correspondence which last year appeared in THE NATION, and still more markedly in the "Times," was an illustration of public feeling towards "the tyrants of the road," who have bluffed the people out of their right to safety on the highways. But it is of the essence of Bluff to ignore all this; and the Bluffers have recently formulated the demands which must be conceded for their satisfaction.

The first demand is one which for every true motorist is the dearest object in life—Abolition of the Speed-Limit. Grant him this, and he will submit to all else—well knowing that there will be nothing else for him in the way of hindrance. The Secretary of the Automobile Association approves highly of the new proposals, in which No. 1 is Abolition of the Speed-Limit. Indeed, he exhibits a candour and a real fairness which are beyond praise; he would increase some of the penalties on "discourteous" drivers. Verily, it is a case of "the zeal of thine house hath eaten me up." But Mr. Stenson Cooke knows well that when a definite speed-limit is abolished and replaced by the vague expression, "driving to the common danger," there is not a motorist in the kingdom who will admit transgression; and the difficulty of obtaining a sufficient number of witnesses will, in almost every case, ensure immunity to the motorist.

However, the thing is as good as settled. The British Public, which has already taken with culpable equanimity the death and maiming of thousands of victims, with meek verdicts of "Accidental death," is certain to accept "No. 1—Abolition of the Speed-Limit," provided only that the Bluffers keep repeating and publishing it often enough. The people will be driven later to an effective remedy.

As regards the Tory Bluff, I sometimes feel uncertain whether we have a Liberal Government with more than a few weeks' tenure of office or not. I gather from almost every newspaper that Mr. Balfour is making his Cabinet. True, a few posts are not definitely filled; but practically the thing is settled. Bluff says—and repeats incessantly—that the Tories are just in, and that it is now important to weed out all those who are not "whole-hoggers," so that Mr. Balfour may have a homogeneous vote and a substantial majority when, a month or two hence, he brings in his Protection Bill. The feeble tone of the Liberal organs indicates that Bluff has knocked all the spirit out of them.

So much for the effect of Bluff on a people who, almost but yesterday, sent to Parliament a "Liberal" Party with an unprecedented majority, to carry Liberal measures!—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE M. MINCHIN.

THE DEATH PENALTY IN ENGLAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—You are probably correct as to the public opinion in England not being, as yet, prepared for the abolition of the death-penalty for murder; but the great number of cases in which there are petitions for a reprieve, most of them bearing a large number of signatures, affords evidence that the public is prepared to go a considerable distance in that direction. A number of death-sentences are commuted every year, and I think the Home Secretary is more frequently blamed for carrying out a sentence than for commuting it.

There are, I think, two distinct questions to be considered. First, should the English definition of the term "murder" be amended?—for many offences are considered murder here which are not so regarded in other countries; and, secondly, should the death-penalty be the ordinary punishment for the crime of murder after the definition had been amended?

When I speak of the definition of murder, perhaps I should rather complain of the want of a definition. Murder is killing another person "wilfully, feloniously, and of malice aforethought." That sounds simple enough, but if we recollect that manslaughter is a felony, the use of the term "feloniously" becomes objectionable; and, moreover, whether a particular act is felonious or not is often a question of law rather than of fact. But the main difficulty lies in "malice aforethought." When a judge tells the jury (as was done in the case of Lieutenant Wark) that "malice" does not imply ill-will, and is even consistent with positive affection, and that "aforethought" does not imply premeditation, the ordinary juror is set to solve a very difficult conundrum; and the judge, when telling him what the words do not mean (in which he flatly contradicts the best English dictionaries), usually takes care not to tell him what they do mean. That is too difficult a question, even for a judge. At all events, the net is spread wide enough to catch a man who causes death by means of an illegal operation, though performed at the request of the deceased woman, and to catch the survivor of two persons who have agreed to commit suicide together, but one of whom failed to effect that object, or who causes the death of an officer of justice while engaged in the discharge of his duty, provided that he had any illegal intention in what he was doing when he caused it.

Insanity is a defence to the crime of murder, though a recent Statute permits a verdict of "Guilty, but insane." But what is meant by "insane"? Here the English judges seem to be hopelessly at variance with the medical profession, and I think, on the whole, that the doctors are likely to know a little more about insanity than the judges—especially the judges of a past generation. Perhaps some of the judges who fixed what is called the existing law were insane, and thus had a personal experience which the doctors did not possess; but this kind of experience does not carry much weight with the public. The new verdict implies that a man may kill another "wilfully, feloniously, and of his malice aforethought," and yet be "insane"; and this may be true in the legal (?) meaning—or unmeaningness—of the words in the indictment. A mere provision that these words should in future be taken in their plain, literal, and grammatical sense, without regard to any non-natural sense that may have been attached to them by judges on previous occasions, would do a good deal towards placing the law of murder on a satisfactory basis.

But there are often extenuating circumstances—such as very strong provocation—which ought to prevent an execution, although the prisoner had committed a [illegible] murder, instead of a "constructive" one. To meet such cases, I would propose to give the judge the same discretionary power as in other cases, and to sentence the prisoner to death or penal servitude—the sentence thus pronounced being open to appeal on the same grounds as any other discretionary sentence. I do not think public opinion would pronounce against either of these alterations, and both would, I think, prove beneficial.—Yours, &c.,

"THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your recent interesting article on the "Oxford English Dictionary" prompts me to ask you to give some of your readers the opportunity of filling up one little gap that remains in its massive perfection. Neither it nor any other dictionary I have been able to consult gives any account of the origin of the use in modern European languages of the terms of altitude for the facts of musical pitch, the description of the notes of the scale as "high" and "low." The earliest instance of the usage given in the "Oxford Dictionary" is from Shakespeare, but its origin is not discussed. Sir James Murray, to whom I wrote on the subject, says that "apparently the question has not been investigated, or has been investigated without result—a common result." He refers me to Grove's "Dictionary of Music," s.v. Acuteness, where the question is raised, but left quite unanswered—as is also the question as to the quite different Latin and Greek use of acutus and gravis, ὀξὺς and βαρὺς with the same reference. In that article Dr. Pole says, "The ancient appears to have imagined that the acute sounds of the voice were produced from the higher parts of the throat, and the grave ones from lower parts." (He gives a reference to a passage from Aristides Quintilianus.) "And this has been supposed by some writers to have been the origin of the terms; but the idea is incorrect and far-fetched, and can hardly be considered a justification."

In spite of Dr. Pole's authority, it seems to me there can be little doubt that the usage did arise from such incorrect idea as he refers to, or rather from the singer's feeling of a lift in the throat as he ascends the scale. That feeling, which finds expression in the common unscientific terms, "head-notes," "chest-notes," is surely undeniable and universal. Even if that origin for the usage be admitted, there remains the questions where and when it began and how far it extends. Is it found in Hindustani and Chinese, for example?

The origin of the classical "sharp" and "heavy" is, I should say, even more obscure.

Perhaps it is worth mentioning that in Greek ὕψιστη feminine of ὕψιστος, highest, was used to mean the lowest note on the harp, obviously because its string, being the longest, reached furthest from the ground. The usage would, of course, have been impossible if the idea of altitude in pitch were as inevitable as it appears to us, or if it had been in the Greek mind at all.

It is curious that these obvious questions of etymology seem hardly to have been raised at all. That is my excuse for raising them, if you will allow me, in your columns.—Yours, &c.,

"SUFFRAGETTE HISTORY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I cannot help writing on Mr. Jolly's letter, entitled "Suffragette History." According to him, "homo," in Magna Carta, does not include woman, and woman, therefore, has not "hominal" rights. Grant it all; but what follows? Simply this, that the disabilities of women in English Law are much more serious than many of us had thought.

If, as he says, or his letter implies, women have been, literally, outlaws, from Magna Carta onwards, then the case for the immediate enfranchisement of them on the same terms as men receives a new and powerful argument from an unexpected quarter. They need counterbalancing advantages as soon as ever these can be given.

If Mr. Jolly is right, he has presented poor, ignorant Miss Pankhurst with a new weapon, of which she will not be slow to avail herself.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. Jolly, in his letter under this heading in your issue of the 23rd denies that the word "homo" in Magna Carta stands for "man and woman." He states that "the only ground for this translation is vouchsafed by Mrs. Stopes," &c. He does not know that Coke in his Institutes II., 14, 17, 29, and 45, definitely states that "homo" extends to both sexes, and that all other legal elucidations of Magna Carta do the same. Mrs. Stopes refers to all these authorities in her larger book, "British Freewoman," p. 75, which evidently Mr. Jolly has not seen; neither has he apparently read the little book called "The Sphere of Man," which he acknowledges he possesses. Because in it he might learn that all the companies of freemen included women, by custom; and Lord Brougham's Act of 1850, and the Interpretation Act, of 1889, by Statute, ruled that the word man should always include women, except where otherwise is directly expressed.—Yours, &c.,

MR. SEAMAN'S PRONUNCIATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The highest authority we have on the English vocabulary is the "Oxford English Dictionary," in which the pronunciation is settled by the consensus of opinion of scholars—men of catholic education. The dictionary gives two sounds for the word "ate"—one to rhyme with "plate," the other with "net," and gives preference to the former, which you and G. W. E. R.—Whigs both—find "shocking"! The Editor, however, adds, in the etymological note: "The pronunciation 'et' is commonly associated with the written 'ate,' but, perhaps, belongs rather to 'eat,' with shortened vowel after analogy with the verbs 'read,' 'lead'; compare the dialectal 'bet,' past tense of 'beat'."

The dictionary has not reached "satiate" yet, but there is no disputing that it is a dissyllable, while the work distinctly gives "palliate," a trisyllabic pronunciation—"pall-i-ate."—Yours, &c.,

A DIRGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I correct the third line in "The Dirge," quoted by the writer of the article on "The Beauty of a Native Tongue"? I always think the line should be—

"Fire and flete and candlelight."

This makes sense of the lament. Flete—i.e., shelter. Doubtlessly, the old long "s" (ſ) was put for the "f," and then the word was changed from the little-known flete to the better-known sleet.—Yours, &c.,

THE WORKS OF PATER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I, too, would like to see the works of Pater published at a much lower price—if it can be done; and beg to endorse the suggestion made by L. B. in your issue of January 9th.

Perhaps I may be allowed to express the opinion that it is an unfortunate fact that very few of the works of the Elizabethan Dramatists are available in a complete form. For the excellent "Mermaid" Series I am, of course, thankful—but these volumes contain, with very few exceptions, only a selection of each writer's plays.

I would venture to suggest that Messrs. Chatto & Windus might issue more volumes of complete plays like their excellent edition of Massinger. I wonder why Messrs. Macmillan do not issue some complete editions of Elizabethan Plays in the "Globe" Series.

I have never been able to understand why none of the works of the great contemporaries of Shakespeare have yet been issued in "Everyman's Library," or in "The World's Classics," or in the "New Universal Library." Surely it would be worth while for the publishers of these and similar series to try the experiment of endeavoring to meet what I know to be a real want, viz., complete editions of the works of these masters, in handy volumes, at a reasonable price.—Yours, &c.,

EDGAR ALLAN POE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Bernard Shaw, in his interesting appreciation of Edgar Allan Poe, says that Poe's story of the short-sighted gentleman who married his grandmother was offered to an English magazine, which regretted that its "deplorable immorality" "made it for ever impossible in England." That magazine must itself have been particularly short-sighted, for the story in question I remember reading, as a boy, between forty and fifty years ago in one of a number of volumes of "The Englishwoman's Domestic Magazine," which my parents possessed. "The Englishwoman's Domestic Magazine" must have been an enterprising publication, for these volumes contained not only this story and two or three others of Poe's (including "The Lady Ligeia"), but also Longfellow's "Kavanagh" and Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter."—Yours, &c.,

WOMEN'S WAGES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—You suggest that any Government tribunal for determining wages should be endowed with a discretion to pay a woman men's wages, "whenever positive evidence is brought that she does in point of fact act as the chief wage-earner in the support of a family." That would be a way of familiarising people with the idea of equal pay for equal work, and a kindly disposed Government might possibly employ women breadwinners on the terms you suggest. I have heard of a group of workmen's societies who have adopted the plan, and they do employ one woman who supports a family; but how would it appeal to the ordinary employer?

I wish I could bring in evidence a certain director's laugh that I heard lately. He had been told that he was employing girls at 8s. a week who had to support relations. "Are we to pay different wages according to what family there is?" he asked. "That's sentiment, not business." Then came the laugh, which was not pretty; but I don't think he was altogether wrong. If employers or wages boards were to begin to ask how many mouths there were in the homes, the idea of a worker's common standard of needs must disappear, and we are hardly ripe for that. Even if the inquiry is carried no farther than you suggest, it is surely pretty clear what the result would be, of putting two sets of women in competition—one at men's and one at women's wages.

Can this ever be more than a "fancy" plan? And ought not Government to set an example that employers would follow?—Yours, &c.,

R. N.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mrs. Travers, expresses her doubts as to the power of the vote to raise wages. We women suffragists are quite aware that wages are controlled by many and complicated causes, but we believe that if the suffrage were granted to women it would help to raise their whole status in the community, their standard of life, their political sagacity, and their power to combine. This last especially would be the strongest lever that could be applied to the wages of women. As for the agricultural laborers, they may be, as Mrs. Travers says, in "a desperate plight"; but have not their wages risen by something like two shillings a week since 1884?

Mrs. Travers raises another point in her argument—that women will most quickly get the vote by patient devotion to the work of local government. There are at present over 1,200 women serving on Boards of Guardians throughout the country, and there would be a much larger number than there are on Borough Councils were it not for the absurd legal restrictions (due, no doubt, in part to the voteless condition of women), which prevent any married woman from standing for election except in London. The value of women's work in local government has been fully proved again and again, and may be used as an argument for women's suffrage—if any arguments beyond the claims of justice and equity are needed. But surely it would seem that the exercise of the simplest right of citizenship would naturally precede and prepare for any active part in even local administration.—Yours, &c.,

(Mrs.) C. D. RACKHAM.

THE SEER.

"Churches are best for prayer that have least light."

I.

BROTHER ANDREAS in the convent dwelt,
As flesh may dwell among the souls set free.
For there the stately Prior in zeal must melt,
The dullest novice had the eyes that see.
And, when the choir with mystic light would glow,
Or, near as touch, the blessed forms would glide,—
"Seest thou not now?" his neighbors whispered low;
"Pray for me! Pray!" his weary voice replied.

II.

What time they gathered faggots in the brake,
He guessed what visions led them through the trees,
And, when they cast their nets upon the lake,
What unseen Presence sent them to their knees.
"Yet grieve not, Brother, for thy lack of grace!
God for a little from thee hides His smile!"
Andreas answered, with averted face:—
"I know, indeed, 'tis but a little while!"

III.

So, to the last, they held him deaf and blind,
Whose soul was sated with the Mystic Flame,
Who sought, ere death, to hide among his kind
The Light from which those vagrant shadows came...
God's seer must claim one twilit holiday
That faith may win her spurs and find her wings!
Now sleeps his clay upon the kindred clay;
And all the Brethren dream of common things.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

IN his address to the members of the Authors' Club on Monday last, Mr. St. Loe Strachey spoke in very interesting fashion upon a very interesting theme, though he hardly did much to define the boundary between literature and journalism. The fact of the matter is there is no distinction between journalism and literature; there is merely the difference between good writing and bad. Addison's essays in the "Spectator," or Johnson's in the "Rambler," much of De Quincey's work and some of Pater's, Stevenson's, and Matthew Arnold's were journalism, but they are also literature. Journalism is just a convenient label for writing which makes its first appearance in periodicals, and in proportion as the writer's aim comes to be the transcribing not mere fact, but his sense of it—if we may use Pater's definition—he becomes an artist, and his work is literature. Journalism, said Mr. Strachey, might become literature if those who practised it took trouble enough about their style. In other words, the highest journalism is literature. Mr. Bernard Shaw tells us that all the highest literature is journalism, and that the writer who aims at producing the platitudes which are "not for an age, but for all time," has his reward in being unreadable in all ages. There is no real difference between the views of Mr. Shaw and Mr. Strachey, and both bear witness to the fact that it is impossible to draw a boundary line between literature and journalism.

WHAT Mr. Strachey said about style, and in particular about the value of simplicity and of short sentences, was admirable. But here again we do not feel that he said the whole truth. Style is "Fame's great anti-septic" but unless the writer has something to say his style will avail him little. At the present moment the average writer, whether of prose or verse, is more "correct," both in diction and grammar, more careful to avoid solecisms, than he has ever been, but will anyone maintain that a high proportion of what is now published deserves to be called literature? To speak without saying anything is the unpardonable sin, and more books perish for lack of substance than for lack of form.

THE late Professor Jebb's edition and translation of the "Characters" of Theophrastus, which was first published in 1878, has been out of print for some time, though nothing has since appeared to supersede it. Many readers will be pleased to learn that the work has been revised and further notes added by Dr. J. E. Sandys, and that it will be re-issued by Messrs. Macmillan during the present season. Dr. Sandys' preface contains a letter written by Jebb in 1870, giving his view of the "real interest" of Theophrastus. "Other writers," he says, "whose name is legion, prove to us that all the great organic lines of human nature are the same to-day, yesterday, and for ever. Theophrastus is one of the few who survive to remind us that the lighter traits also of character are permanent and universal."

ACCORDING to the "British Weekly" Mr. Kipling has ready for publication a new novel—his first long story since "Kim." It is a romance of the future, when aeroplanes will be common, and other visions—we presume, of purely material progress—have been turned into realities. The title is "With the Night Mail."

"THE Love Letters of Thomas Carlyle and Jane Welsh," which Mr. Lane is to issue early in the season, will contain an introduction by Mr. Alexander Carlyle, in which he declares that the correspondence "should convince even the most prejudiced and unfriendly that Thomas Carlyle and Jane Welsh were essentially generous, self-sacrificing, and noble." There are to be 176 letters, together with an appendix, containing the poems of Carlyle and Mrs. Carlyle, and four articles, entitled "Sartor Resartus," "Margaret Gordon and Blumine," "Edward Irving and Jane Welsh," and "Catherine Aurora Kirkpatrick and Blumine." We hope that the publication will not cause the wretched and useless quarrel regarding the married relations of the Carlyles to be reopened.

ANOTHER book to be published shortly by Mr. Lane is "A Sister of Prince Rupert: Elizabeth, Princess Palatine, Abbess of Hereford," by Miss Elizabeth Godfrey, a writer who has already shown skill in exploring historical by-paths. The coming book is described as "a study of a temperament and of an epoch." Princess Elizabeth is in many ways typical of the cultured princess of the seventeenth century. She took some share in most of the great political and religious movements of her time, though for English readers her fame has been overshadowed by that of her picturesque brother, Prince Rupert.

MR. MURRAY has in the press an interesting series of letters written from the Peninsula between 1808 and 1812 by Lieut.-General Sir William Warre, who was for several years attached to Marshal Beresford's personal staff. Warre was present at the battles of Rolica, Vimiero, Corunna, and Salamanca, as well as the sieges of Ciudad Rodrigo and Badajos. He knew Portuguese, and was therefore able to come into closer touch with the native population than were most other English officers. The letters, which form an almost continuous narrative of the main events of the war down to the battle of Salamanca, are said to be of much historical value. The book has been prepared for publication by Sir William Warre's nephew, Prebendary Edmund Warre.

MR. FISHER UNWIN has in the press a biography of the late Sir Randal Cremer, by Mr. Howard Evans. His work in connection with the peace movement and the International Arbitration League brought Sir Randal Cremer into contact with many leading Continental statesmen and diplomatists. A little crabbed and hard, he was one of the most honest of politicians, and his personal eccentricities seemed only a piquant set-off to his zeal and sincerity.

SIR HUBERT PARRY has finished a book on Johann Sebastian Bach, which will be published in a few weeks by Messrs. Putnam. The book is partly biographical and partly a critical and historical study of the work of the great eighteenth-century composer, to whom, not unnaturally, musical opinion, both in Germany and in England, is beginning to look as the "perfect musician."

A TRANSLATION of Dr. Witkowski's "The German Drama in the Nineteenth Century" is to be published during the spring. The book deals chronologically with the distinct periods which marked German dramatic literature during the past century, special attention being given to Kleist, Grillparzer, Hebbel, Ludwig, Wildenbruch, Sudermann, and Hauptmann. There is also a series of chapters dealing with the minor dramatists.

THE ANATOLIAN CHURCH.*

The paper which gives its title to the latest book by Sir William Ramsay is far from being the most interesting in this valuable collection of studies. "Luke the Physician," is a somewhat minute criticism of Harnack's work under the same title. Sir William Ramsay's attitude to the great German writer is sufficiently indicated in the sentence that Harnack's book shows him "on the threshold of the twentieth century thought, yet not able completely to shake off the fetters and emerge out of the methods of the nineteenth century." Yet Sir William is careful to point out that in reference to the main position of Harnack regarding the writings of Luke he is in agreement. But he claims that the literary criticism of the last fifty years has demonstrated that "one can prove anything and nothing" by such purely verbal criticism as Harnack has employed. The real progress that has been made "comes from the discovery of new evidence and not from verbal criticism of the old books. It is only by bringing the old books into comparison with facts and life that they can be profitably studied." Most readers of this essay will only agree with this statement with certain reserves; but if they are fairly familiar with the writings of Harnack and his critic, they will be disposed to add that whatever Sir W. Ramsay's services have been to criticism they pale in interest before the "discovery of new evidence" made by him. In a subsequent essay, entitled "The Oldest Written Gospel," he agrees with Harnack that Luke and Matthew were adapted from a common source earlier than Mark. Such source was in Aramaic, and is now, for the most part, hopelessly lost. It was written while Christ was still living, and this early date was that which gave it the high value which Matthew and Luke attributed to it, and yet justified the freedom with which they modified and added to it.

The points suggested by both these essays deserve attention, and no students of the New Testament can afford to neglect them. In both, and still more in the subsequent papers, there are facts produced from the writer's own observation which add greatly to the value of his arguments. It is, indeed, in the fullness of his knowledge on matters connected with the local circumstances, the geography and the history of Anatolia that the great value of Sir William's observations is to be found. For no man has done more towards clearing up the many historical and archæological questions connected with Asia Minor than he. No one has identified so many sites of forgotten cities and of historical events in Asia Minor. The present writer spent an evening upwards of twenty years ago in Smyrna with Mr. Humann, the explorer of Pergamos. Speaking of the archæological work done, he had much praise for what the Austrians were doing at Ephesus, the French and Germans in various places, but, said he, "that young Englishman without any backing from his Government is doing more real archæological work than any of us." Since then, down to last year, he has been steadily working, and has added largely to the world's store of historical knowledge and especially to that which relates to the illustration of the New Testament.

Sir William Ramsay is at his best when treating of the religions of Asia Minor. Knowing the country, perhaps, as no other Englishman knows it, he is able to apply his large stores of learning to the solution of the many difficult problems connected with the history and religion of the various races who have inhabited it. In this volume he brings out in several places the continuity of religious feeling in regard to various sites. One of his most striking illustrations of this continuity is of a Hittite High Place on a mountain top 7,000 feet high, near Barata. The temple probably went back to a very remote antiquity; but the time came when it was transformed into a Christian church. The High Place had a sanctity attached to it which the Christians did not think it expedient to disregard. He points out that even in Ephesus where Hellenic influence was always strong, the Pagan temple gives way to a church of St. John the Theologian, and that then on nearly the same site, reverenced as such through all historical time, the Turk built his mosque. Religious awe clung permanently to the ancient sites. The new religion, whether Christian or Moslem, found it necessary to attach the sacred place. Underlying new and old were the same religious conceptions, and the author's attempt to define what these conceptions were is noteworthy. While the fatherhood of God is the dominant note in other lands, "it was the motherhood of the divine nature that was the great feature in the Anatolian worship. The male element in the divine nature was recognised only as an occasional and subsidiary actor in the drama of nature and life" (p. 130). The transition was made in due course from the god-mother to the Mother of God. The earliest known trace, according to our author, of the veneration of the Virgin Mary in the Christian religion is in a Phrygian inscription of the second century. It is in suggestions like these that this book is valuable, and it has many which throw light on the character and history of the Anatolian races. He shows how the mountain ranges and especially the Taurus, separated the peoples and isolated them. This isolation served to preserve distinct types of religious belief, manners, customs, and even physical features. The nomadisation of Asia Minor following the conquest by the Ottoman Turks still further completed the isolation. Around all the coasts of the country Greek influence prevailed, but it seldom went far into the interior. During all the time of our present era, the difficulty of communication between various places in the Empire, due mainly to physical causes, has continued. It was, of course, largely increased when the Yuruks and other nomads took possession of the extramural country. The result is seen in the markedly distinct physical features which distinguish the inhabitants of Asia Minor and in the arrest of the progress of welding the people into a common type.

It is equally remarkable in reference to religion. It is perhaps too much to say that there has never been a heresy in the country which is not represented now, but the statement has a large measure of truth. Yet under all the diversities of race and of traditional religion, certain general ideas of religion show themselves which now, as in the time of the Empire, mark a broad distinction between the religious tendencies of Eastern Europe and of Anatolia. The Orthodox Church has always two great currents of tendency, one Hellenistic, the other Anatolian. Pantheism was the underlying thought of Greece. It had a constant tendency to develop into Polytheism. After Constantine's edict and the decrees of Theodosius ordering every subject to become Christian, the church took over many of the Greek gods and a bulk of superstitions. To this extent it became Paganised. But Anatolia always revolted against this Paganism. It was essentially monotheist before the time of Constantine, and continued to be the opponent of Paganism. When the two great iconoclastic movements occurred, the Anatolians were against image worship and were the true breakers of images. The supporters of such worship were either Greeks of race or those who had come under Greek influence. The great iconoclast emperors were both from Asia Minor. A recent Roman Catholic writer, Père Pargoire, says that Leo the Isaurian, while placing himself at the head of what the Latin Church calls a heretical movement, was yet acting upon personal conviction against image worship in any form. Indeed, the Emperor seems to have been conscientiously shocked at the multiplicity of images and the development of Paganism. When he had completed his glorious task of defending the imperial city against the greatest army which ever laid siege to its walls, he set himself steadily to work to put an end to image worship. On the other hand, the ruler who was more zealous than any other in restoring the polytheism of the Church, and was, more than any other, the champion of reaction, was the remarkable Empress Irene. She represented the Hellenic spirit in its fullest development. Born and brought up in Athens, educated in the still existing Greek philosophy, she was Pagan through and through. After her triumph at the second Council of Nicaea, in 787, once more the movement against image worship developed, and once more its most effective leader was from Asia Minor. Leo the Armenian, like his predecessors of the same name, was monotheistic rather than Pagan in tendency.

It would be interesting to point out how in various other ways the religious sentiment of Asia Minor influenced the course of history. Valuable suggestions on this subject abound in the volume under consideration. There are indications given in the volume that the author has accumulated evidence regarding the development of Byzantine architecture. Possibly his journey in 1907, when he was accompanied by Lady Ramsay and Miss G. L. Bell, had this object largely in view. There is no work in English which deals with this subject in a satisfactory manner, and if our surmise is correct that Sir W. Ramsay proposes to publish one, all interested in the subject will be grateful.

A MIXED QUIRE.*

A POET'S motive is his own affair. It matters not at all why he writes poetry; the only thing that matters is whether the poetry be good or bad. Mr. John Davidson is a materialist, or rather, a monist; a monist, moreover, of a very definite kind. He has built the latest hypotheses of physical science into a creed which he holds passionately, and, indeed, arrogantly. It is a creed which presents quite as many difficulties as any of the more usual ones, and Mr. Davidson, like all devotees, bridges the gaps in it by faith and vehement assertion. He has his devil, too; all things immaterial are powers of evil to Mr. Davidson. Passion, imagination, reason, thought, are, of course, material; gods, pixies, and demons are, he says, immaterial. But he does not explain how these latter, which are forms of thought, and so material, can be at the same time immaterial. A sound, workable religion, however, must have a devil of some kind, so we may allow Mr. Davidson to have his. The enunciation of his creed is accompanied by a tremendous egotism; he is fond of saying, "I am the first person to think or feel this, and probably the last person too." But when he tells us what this singular thought or feeling is, it turns out to be nothing extraordinarily notable. Mr. Davidson asserts that in him the universe has become aware; in himself he feels all the agelong energies of stars, atoms, and lightnings. We do not doubt it; but we dare say there are some hundreds of people who have gone through precisely the same processes of thought and feeling as Mr. Davidson's. It is, indeed, hardly possible for anyone with an imagination to read the generalisations of modern science without experiencing the emotions and ecstasies which are admirably described in "The Testament of John Davidson." However, not only, as Coleridge said, the egotism of Milton, but all egotism is in some sort a revelation of spirit. So we must allow Mr. Davidson, the hater of spirit, his egotism.

But the kind of creed which Mr. Davidson holds is of small moment compared with the kind of poetry which he makes out of it. We must reckon it a good thing that he is so vehement and arrogant in his faith, since he has turned this faith into a splendidly vehement, arrogant poesy. "The Testament of John Davidson" is cast in a sort of epical soliloquy; and it is full of dazzling word-craft. He carries us into the eternal void, and fills the darkness with showers of gorgeous fire. We follow with excitement his cosmic experiences, his ferocious wooing of Diana, his account of his warfare against the gods, and the fantastic vision of the gods in hell. There are many lines of exceedingly beautiful poetry, such as—

> "Before the galaxies with silver seamed
> The swart oblivion of the Universe."

Throughout Mr. Davidson poetises his monism with wonderful passion and splendor, and this testament of his is a noble and stirring poem. It contains, however, some serious faults. The metre, invigorating at first, becomes monotonous in the end; not even Mr. Davidson can dispense with inflection in blank verse. Then there is far too much that reads like a versified text-book; such words as electron, ion, molecule, hydrogen, amœba, bacteria, are all very well in scientific treatises, but poetry should have nothing to do with them. They are not yet alive; they are empty of suggestion. Definite meaning they may have, but poetry demands that words shall not only mean, but suggest.

On the whole, "The Testament of John Davidson" must be accounted inferior to its predecessors. Nevertheless, the torrential rush of the verse, and the brilliance of the images, make it a poem which, to paraphrase Mr. Davidson—

> "leaves the lonely mind and tranquil thought
> A thoroughfare of beauty."

We hope he will fulfil the promise with which the poem ends, and will for many years—

> "into music change the tumult high
> That echoes through the vast unvaulted courts."

If he does, then we will heartily thank Artemis for frustrating his contemplated suicide.

Mr. Wingfield-Stratford is also a poet with a motive—a motive, we suspect, that he owes to Nietzsche. He appears to hate equally our modern mob-rule and our self-styled aristocracy, and he shows a naïve distrust of Woman in general, which looks suspiciously like a pose. He applies to modern politics, in a fine sonnet to the German Emperor, Nietzsche's famous dictum that a good war justifies any cause; and he has a healthy, savage detestation for Mammon and the works of Mammon, which finds vigorous expression in "The Devil on Dartmoor," a little supernatural drama full of admirable energetic poetry. Put broadly, he passionately demands individual, rather than communistic righteousness. This is, we believe, Mr. Wingfield-Stratford's first book, and, from an intellectual point of view, a very remarkable first book it is. We recommend that his name be remembered, for he will do better things than any of the poems in "The Call of the Dawn." At present, his poetry lacks a severe discipline; we give him credit for aiming at directness and strength of diction, rather than at conceited complexity; but he often disconcerts us with trite phrases and well-worn images in the midst of fine and original writings. His poetry, in fact, is not yet as genuine as his thought; nevertheless, his demand for beauty is frequently answered in his own verse. We heartily welcome a new singer with such great potentialities.

In "The Dowager of Jerusalem," by Mr. Reginald Farrer, we need not, fortunately, worry ourselves overmuch about motives. Mr. Farrer's motive is that very old one, that most excellent of all motives—the desire to write a good poem. We can proceed to an examination of his poetry without being forced to examine the reason for the poetry's existence. It is a play out of Gibbon, that unrifled treasury of drama, laid in the times of the Comnenian Emperors. It is frankly a study-play, but even so, we are uncomfortably conscious of padding and long speeches in it. The versification is sometimes dull, and the short spells of rhyming that are introduced seem to have no particular object. There are really only three essential characters in the drama, but the list of dramatis personæ extends to considerably over twenty. We can forgive all these faults, however, for the really admirable studies of the three important persons. As a ruthless, sensual, splendid scoundrel, winning men's fear and women's love wherever he goes, Mr. Farrer's portrayal of Andronikos Komnenos is magnificent. The Countess Philippe and the Queen Theodora are rather dangerously alike; but, perhaps, this is intentional. The speech wherein Philippe praises her own body because it is—

> "The sacred pyx in which his love is stored.
> The cup from which he drinks the wine of life," contains the kernel of the play, feminine love contrasted with masculine—the women's love of being loved, and the man's love of his own pleasure. The drama ends with a fine piece of ironic psychology. Altogether, in spite of its prolixity, Mr. Farrer has written a play that is worth reading more than once.

Another study-play is "Queen Mariamne," an anonymous composition. There is no prolixity here, no superfluous crowding of the stage. The characters are many, but they are all required, and all differentiated with consummate skill. Mr. Farrer often has to work himself up into poetry; but the substantial thought of "Queen Mariamne" is poetry, which continually flashes into exquisite word-craft. Consider this, of Cleopatra handling jewels—

> "Pale are my fingers from this luxury
> And contact as they pat the crystal flesh
> Of all this light."

Or this, of Herod brooding on his love—

> "Mariamne! Very oft
> I call down to my soul to her, and there
> She answers in abundance, as the corn
> That the large waters woo to sudden tilth."

Continually we feel ourselves in the presence of a mind that knows all the wonder and power that is in words. And, eloquent of full emotion as the speeches are, the pauses and hesitations in the drama are often more eloquent still. The psychology of the play is as strong as it is supple. The racked spirit of Herod, tormented by love and afflicted by beauty, not daring to think of death unless Mariamne die with him, driven by gusts of madness into murdering those he loves, by turns tender and cruel, dignified and pitiable—it is a triumph of characterisation. Not less so is Mariamne herself, calm amidst conflicting urgencies, serenely above the insane passions of Herod and the plots of Herod's enemies, hardly seeming to partake in life, yet exquisitely human, and at times roused into beautiful indignation. The play ends with the reiteration of Mariamne's name, having an effect of the most moving poignancy. We dare to say that, as far as England is concerned, the story of Herod and Mariamne has now received its final literary treatment.

As far as can be judged from "Songs of Good Fighting," the late Eugene R. White would, if he had lived, have done better work in prose than in verse. The single prose-tale that is included in this slim volume, "The Festin d'Adieu," is much better of its kind than the strenuous buccaneering and filibustering songs are of theirs. It is a delicate, pathetic, and charming piece of work, told with considerable skill. Mr. White, however, never arrived at mastery over the very difficult metres which he chose for his songs. Many of them can only be described as jingle; and a painful effort to achieve muscularity is always apparent. Still, behind his technical deficiencies, there is evidence of a large imagination; and we have no doubt that his untimely death meant a serious loss to prose literature. Of Mr. F. P. B. Osmaston's "Dramatic Odes and Rhapsodies," there is not, we are afraid, much to be said. Browning was a great poet, but to imitate Browning is not necessarily to write poetry. Considering the amount of intellectual energy that must have been expended on these odes and rhapsodies, the scantiness of poetry in them is quite surprising. Mr. Osmaston admits that Browning is his exemplar, and anticipates reproof therefor. We, however, have no quarrel with his choice of master, nor with the poet that he imitates, but only with the fact that he imitates so feebly. The prologue to the book consists mainly of an attack on Mr. Davidson; and from it we can only conclude that Mr. Osmaston has read Mr. Davidson as superficially as he has, apparently, read Browning. There is not much, again, to be said of Mr. A. E. Housman's "A Shropshire Lad," but for a very different reason. It is some years ago that this exquisite series of lyrics was first published; now it is known to everybody—one of the most popular poems, we should say, of recent years. There can be no question that it deserves its popularity, for all that it is preoccupied overmuch with the thought of death. Now it has arrived at the dignity of an illustrated edition, Mr. William Hyde's colored drawings are extremely beautiful, showing a subtle sense of color and a delight in the marvellous qualities of the English atmosphere. We have not, indeed, seen more successful color-illustrations than these.

Recently Mr. Frederic Harrison has drawn attention to an elegy, in the form of a sonnet-sequence, called "Thysia." It is a husband's lamentation for the death of his wife, and is unquestionably a fine poem. The sonnets are on the Shakespearean model, and sometimes end with an Alexandrine, which is, we think, a mistake; otherwise, they show little trace of the amateur. We hardly believe, indeed, that the anonymous author is an amateur, so unerringly does he achieve that pinnacle of poetic art, simplicity. In every one of the sonnets, grief is expressed with almost intolerable directness, a grief not mixed with desperation, but with a noble faith and courage. Mr. Harrison speaks of some of these poems as having been composed in the very presence of the coffin, which, we hope, is no more than a figure of speech. But in whatever manner they were composed, they are wonderfully moving poetry. We may almost say of them, that their sorrow has made "sorrow more beautiful than beauty's self." Such pure, unaffected music, made out of such a terrible affliction, will surely not be "alms for oblivion."

THE GOSSIP.*

Mr. Tollemache's reminiscences do not pretend to be either novel or instructive. They are trivial in substance, but agreeably garrulous in form. Some of them have already been published. The rest are strung together at haphazard, and yet so arranged as not to fatigue the general reader. Mr. Tollemache has known, as he says, a great many interesting people, and has something characteristic to record about each of them. There is an absence of ostentation which disarms criticism, and the easy flow of the style carries one with it down the stream. There is no art in Mr. Tollemache's simplicity. He goes where chance takes him, picking up whatever is to be found by the way. It may be matter of historical interest and importance. It may be the merest gossip. It fills its place all the same, and diversifies a chronicle which is never tedious. To criticise such a volume as Mr. Tollemache has put together is practically impossible. We can only take what he offers, observing the entire lack of effort in a spontaneity which is never forced. Mr. Tollemache tells his stories in his own fashion, often recognising that they are not new, and sometimes claiming to decide the true authorship of a familiar remark. But that does not prevent him from reporting it on his own account, or from embellishing it with such ornaments as suggest themselves to him from time to time. The result is a collection, or rather an assemblage, of jottings, observations, legends, and anecdotes of all kinds, from which anyone may take what suits his particular fancy. As we have said, to criticise such a performance in the ordinary way is impossible. There is no use in complaining that a book is not what it does not profess to be. One might ask, for instance, whether Mr. Tollemache has written a book at all. His answer would be that he has put down what came into his head, and that he never professed to do anything else.

Mr. Tollemache's characters of individuals are not always sympathetic. When he dislikes a man he shows it. He was at Harrow under Dr. Vaughan, and his remarks upon Vaughan's methods are not complimentary. Vaughan was an exceedingly successful head master, and Mr. Tollemache's pleasantry will not injure his reputation. There is nothing really ill-natured in it. But Mr. Tollemache does not always seem to know what the bearing of a story is, or how it affects the received ideas of the persons concerned. If he can weave it into his narrative, or into one of the digressions which interrupt his narrative, that is enough for him. It ought, perhaps, to be enough also for his readers. For, after all, they are provided with such an abundance of material that they can well afford to deal with it for themselves, and they are in no way bound to adopt Mr. Tollemache's interpretation of such facts as he records. Herodotus has been called prolix, and Mr. Tollemache is no Herodotus. He resembles the Father of History in turning aside to the right or to the left, as the humor takes him, not in the philosophic passion for inquiry which made Herodotus ask so many interesting questions that he could not answer himself. Mr. Tollemache has no scientific aims. The law of association seems to be the only principle underlying his discursive proclivities. One thing leads to another with him, until he has exhausted one stage of his journey, and is obliged to begin another. He does his best to avoid jolting, and that is really the sum of his endeavor. There is a good deal in assuming the interest of what you have to say, and that Mr. Tollemache always assumes. He

HARPER'S LIBRARY OF LIVING THOUGHT.

HARPER'S LIBRARY OF LIVING THOUGHT is intended as a response to what appears to be the special demand of the century now opening. Just as in the organic world every organism is, we are told, a growth of cells springing from the parent cell, so every good book is nothing more than a synthetic expansion of a single, central, living thought. Before Darwin and Wallace simultaneously announced a new cosmogony of growth, the living thought at the heart of that great revolutionary system was expressed in a footnote to an article in the Westminster Review by Herbert Spencer. That brief footnote was of more importance to the world than most of the books published in that year. The twentieth century is and must needs be in a hurry, and what it asks for is the central living thought of every intellectual movement without delay. Its energies are so enormously active that new living thoughts are jostling each other daily. The consequence is that when a writer feels that he has a new living thought to express, he does not wait to develop it fully—he does not pause to write a book, as he would have done in times past—he sends the suggestive article to one of the great reviews or magazines. Before getting into permanent form, this suggestive article has to wait until the creator of the thought has the opportunity of developing it, of expanding it into a book, or else until he republishes it in a collection of miscellaneous essays upon all kinds of other subjects. Now, it is the object of this new Series to furnish the living central thought in permanent book form as soon as it is born, and at a low price. The reader will find that for the same price which he would give for a review he can obtain a beautifully printed little volume, well bound, and an ornament to his library.

ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE

Three Plays of Shakespeare.

There is no literary question in which the twentieth century is more deeply concerning itself than that of Shakespeare and his art, and Mr. Swinburne is, above all men, admirably equipped for treating such a subject. Concerning "King Lear" he has indeed given us a new living thought—that King Lear is an expression of the most advanced doctrine as to the absolute equality of mankind confronted by Nature. [Ready February 1.

W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE

Personal Religion in Egypt before Christianity.

A remarkable volume on an important phase of the evolution of religious thought. It is an examination of the "old bottles into which the new wine was poured," and Prof. Flinders Petrie gives the reader all the resources of his unrivalled knowledge of that period. [Ready February 1.

COUNT LEO TOLSTOY

The Teaching of Jesus.

At this moment a great and passionate attention is being given to religious questions. "New theologies" are springing up like mushrooms. Yet there is no more commanding figure in the realm of religious thought to-day than Count Tolstoy. By the suffrages of the Christian world he would be the one above all others chosen to tell once more the old, old story.

THEODORE WATTS-DUNTON

Poetic "Adequacy" in the Twentieth Century.

Which treats of the immense difficulty poets will find in keeping abreast of the thought of the century now opening. Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton stands in the foremost line of great English critics by right of the subtle and profound insight which is his, perhaps, because he is himself a creator.

SVANTE ARRHENIUS

The Life of the Universe. In 2 vols.

A deeply interesting account of the conceptions which man has formed from the earliest to the latest times of the origin and formation of the universe. No more important contribution to the solution of the problem has been made than the previous work of Prof. Arrhenius—"Worlds in the Making."

does not regard it as his business to prove the importance or the relevancy of his points. Having made them, he leaves them with the air of a man who has discharged his duty. There is a fascination in this complete detachment from literary methods which can be more easily felt than described.

It would defeat Mr. Tollemache's object and diminish the number of his readers if we were to quote the stories with which he has enriched his pages. They are liberally diffused, and yet at the same time they do not clog the narrative or interrupt the reflections. They simply serve to illustrate and to heighten the meaning which Mr. Tollemache seeks at the moment to convey. They are in their proper places, and would suffer by removal. It is not merely that they belong to particular points and passages. They come in the order of time where Mr. Tollemache has put them, and without disturbing the framework of his design they cannot be arranged in any other way. A less pretentious volume never appeared, and this is perhaps the reason why it never disappoints the expectation of the critic. If Mr. Tollemache had had a moral to point, or a proposition to prove, or a theory to establish, he would have laid himself open to numerous charges which he now escapes by the simplicity of his method. He goes on his way regardless of appearances, chattering as he goes, not for want of material, but because that is the most natural form of his thoughts.

THE ROMANCE OF REALITY.*

In the Dedication of "The Flower of the Heart" to Mr. H. G. Wells, Mr. Marriott Watson says: "You have long been wanting me, I know, to write a novel of modern life. Well, here it is . . Here I have turned my back fully on romance and adventure." It is always interesting when a painter or writer essays a new style, for either he discovers in himself new qualities, or the audience recognises the old under the mask of novelty. The novel before us leaves us speculating as to what artistic rank Mr. Marriott Watson would have attained had he not, nearly twenty years back, definitely enlisted and marched under the romantic banner, borne so gallantly by Mr. Henley and the brave spirits of "The Scots Observer." What did our literature gain by that belated after-glow of the European Romantic movement? Stevenson was, of course, the central figure, attracting to the standard many a young man who might have sworn allegiance to another flag. But Stevenson himself sought in California and the South Seas that revivifying breath of reality, without which romanticism is as a wandering spirit seeking in vain the body through which it can manifest its power. Romanticism divorced from reality is for the majority of writers a mere cul-de-sac. How little of permanent worth is left to us in Romance from the European movement that raged so furiously after Byron's death! The claim on us to-day of Scott, Balzac, and Dickens is surely derived from their direct observation of the life around them, and the heel of Achilles in each of these great writers is surely the romantic unrealities which are now exposed, transfixed by the arrow of Time.

It is, perhaps, indeed, the neat revenge of time that has led Mr. Marriott Watson to turn at last from chronicling the fortunes of his "gentlemen of the road," cavaliers, privateers, and other engaging adventurers whom Mr. Henley and his school loved to honor, to setting forth the career of Mr. Sam Eversley, City financier, the managing director of the Imperial Mines Corporation, the Colorado Bonzana Ltd., and various subsidiary companies. For the City privateersman and the financial buccaneer have been flourishing in our midst, making the public stand and deliver, year in and year out, and taking toll of every unwary passer-by, nay, stripping the widow and the orphan, lured within their clutches, while the "National Observer" was dividing its praises between the feats of "Gentleman Dick" and the Empire-building of Mr. Cecil Rhodes. Why should Mr. Sam Eversley, the City "bull's," claims be ignored when he was bearing the heat and burden of the day in Throgmorton Avenue, plotting to scoop the British public in the "Thieves' Kitchen" (as the City Stock Exchange Club is called), with his "jobbers and brokers on strings, while directing his campaign from his luxurious chambers at the Denmark House, E.C."? Without Mr. Sam Eversley's activities in the Equatorial Oil and Exploration Co., how meaningless would be the classic phrase, "Trade follows the Flag," and how little chance would there be for our "little wars," if Mr. Sam Eversley and his followers did not flourish the "concessions" from Tumba in the public's face. No; it is evident to us all, as well as to Mr. Marriott Watson, that the home of Romance to-day is no longer situated on Bagshot Heath, but has passed to Basinghall Street, Denmark House, Copthall Chambers, or wherever the offices of these "speculative trusts" may be, where "shareholders are quietened, balance-sheets rigged, shop-windows dressed, auditors soothed," &c. The career of a Jabez Balfour, to speak only of a great brigand of yesterday, was, indeed, more picturesquely romantic than that of Claude Duval, though the former wore broadcloth and the latter went to his work in laced silks and a crape mask. We have always regretted that the "National Observer" school should have spent its energies in idealising the memories of Captain Kidd, when much greater living adventurers, Jewish and Gentile, were planning raids on the gold reefs of the veld and sailing home to Park Lane with argosies of diamonds and the glowing reports of their subsidised mining experts.

The picture of Sam Eversley's operations in the Amalgamated Gold Company, of his difficulties with the flotation of the Equatorial Company, of the financial manœuvres of the Imperial Corporation (i.e., Sam) to maintain the market in all its bantlings, of Sam's own relations with his attendant jackals, Phillips and Bob Hewitt, with his co-directors, the Earl of Thwaite, Sir Joseph Webb, Mr. Carton, etc., and with the world of dealers, jobbers, "stags," "underwriters," etc.: all this is done with convincing detail. The plot of the story is, however, chiefly concerned with the relations between Frank Lassetter, the heir of Lord Bracondale, and Sam's beautiful and unsophisticated girl wife, Alice. Sam has taken a country house on the Bracondale estate, with the view of getting into county society, and the accidental rencontre between the financialist and the aristocrat ends in Lassetter's becoming a pawn in Sam's game, and in accepting a seat on the board of the Equatorial Oil Company. No doubt this is quite true to life, and is fairly typical of the bargain struck between our South African financialists and many of our nobility and gentry a few years back. We could wish, however, that Mr. Marriott Watson had followed the example of the late Frank Norris, and had developed Mr. Sam Eversley's career in a series of two or three novels, and not compressed so big a subject into one. For his limited space does not give him room enough to do justice to both Sam and his dual relations with his wife and Miss Kitty Larose of the Melpomene Theatre. Our interest is shifted to the more "romantic" aspect of Alice Eversley's growing passion for her country neighbor, Frank Lassetter, and of her repulse of Colonel Devigne, late of Equatoria, who plays a waiting and watching part in the game. The analysis of the budding and breaking into flower of Alice's secret love for Lassetter is very delicately handled, and justifies our author's title, "The Flower of the Heart," but he has made the mistake of throwing too many figures into the foreground of his picture, and of not concentrating the light on the three leading figures. In consequence his exposition of the emotional crisis when Lassetter meets with a gun accident, and Alice flies from her home to his side, and of her position as his mistress, is hurried and unsatisfying. Sam takes his wife's defection with amazing indifference, considering the hot-blooded nature of the man, but from the point, indeed, of Chapter XVIII., where a romantic accident suddenly springs an unnatural and stagey situation upon us, we begin to doubt the author's avowal that he has turned his back "fully on romance and adventure."

It is not easy for a novelist to reverse engines and to turn aside from the flowery path of romance and take to the stern road of realism. In romance it is easy to generalise, to conceal the paucity of fine living touches that must go with every good drawing from nature, under the attractive dress of picturesque externals. Mr. Marriott Watson's portrait, however, of Sam Eversley, this indomitable City

AMONG the many rivals of the venerable Revue des deux Mondes, which have come to the fore in late years, the Grande Revue, takes a prominent place. Modelling itself rather on the lines of our English Monthlies, it has, whilst retaining the literary flavour and perfection of form which distinguish the best French work, essayed to give a vivid and up-to-date record of what is happening in the world of political and social life, as well as in that of letters and art. At once critical and sympathetic in its attitude towards the latest movements of thought and opinion, its first endeavour is to place before its readers an impartial and intelligent survey of the happenings of the month.

In order to enable the English Reader to judge of the scope and merits of LA GRANDE REVUE, Mr. Nutt offers the first quarter (January, February, March, six numbers of 200 pages each, with Illustrations) at the exceptional price of "bull," is so strong and living that we devoutly trust he will tell us more, in future novels, of that actual life which he has "watched and studied with the interest of the detached spectator." The real world of to-day is the romance of the world of to-morrow, and Thackeray's "Vanity Fair," to our thinking, offers to our English novelists one of the best examples we have in fiction of that perfect fusion of the imagination and the world of everyday fact, which we sum up in four words—the Romance of Reality.

SOME CONTEMPORARY PORTRAITS.*

It has been said that the difference between journalism and literature is that, while journalistic work is done with the expectation that it must perish, literary work is done "in the high hope that it might be eternal." Mr. Gardiner would be the last to deny that he designs his volume, "Prophets, Priests, and Kings," mainly for its present use and effect. He takes a salient trait in the person under discussion, enlarges and decorates it with much skill, minimises whatever may run counter to its full development, and thus presents us with a portrait which has unity and resemblance. In planning out a series of articles for a daily newspaper—the contents of this book first appeared in the "Daily News"—no better method could be devised, and Mr. Gardiner is almost uniformly successful in applying it. Take for example the portrait of Mr. John Burns. The dominant characteristics here are energy and vitality, and on these Mr. Gardiner lays full stress. Mr. Burns is "boisterous, confident, gaily aggressive, honest as the day, full of the egotism of the child with the child's delighted interest in the passing show of things." "He stands four square to all the winds that blow . . . his great eyes flashing scorn and challenge from under the terrific eyebrows, his nostrils swelling with defiance, his voice bursting in upon the tranquillities like a foghorn, thick and hoarse from thundering in the open air, his grey hair and beard belying the enormous vitality of mind and muscle." This is pictorial truth, and Mr. Gardiner excels in telling it. Moreover, he cultivates with success many agreeable literary gifts, notably the gift of quotation. Nothing, for example, could be happier than to describe George Meredith's attitude to life through the following lines:—

> "Death, shall I shrink from loving thee?
> Into the breast that gives the rose
> Shall I with shuddering fall?"

We also like many of Mr. Gardiner's characterisations. For example, this of the Speaker, "He says unpleasant things in a pleasant way." Of Mr. Lloyd George: "He does not learn, he absorbs." Of General Booth: "He never argues; he simply goes on as if he did not hear." And of Mr. Keir Hardie: "He is the only man who could have created the Labour Party, for concentration and intensity are the creative impulses. But he is almost the only man in the Party who is not fitted to lead it." Mr. Gardiner, in a word, has used his experience well; his book is instructive to those who know the characters with whom he deals, and it must be brilliantly interesting to those who do not.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"Louis Napoleon and the Genesis of the Second Empire" (Lane, 16s. net) is described by its author, Mr. F. H. Cheetham, as "a biographical study rather than an attempt at a contribution to history. It is, in fact, both, and the reader will gain from its perusal an understanding of the forces and events that led up to the coup d'état of 1848. It is doubtful whether many people will be led to rate Louis Napoleon as high as Mr. Cheetham does, though undoubtedly a strong case is made out for a more favorable verdict than that commonly given. "Though greatly inferior to his uncle," says Mr. Cheetham, "he was a man of superior intelligence, and had he not been a Prince and a Bonaparte, he would still have been in the front rank of the men of his time." He was far less of an egoist than Napoleon I., and it is arguable that he was far more of a patriot. Perhaps the best fate that could have befallen him would have been an opportunity to follow the career of letters for which he was in many ways admirably fitted. De Tocqueville declared that Napoleon III. was the only man living who could write "monumental French," while Cobden spoke of the "absolute perfection of the style of his occasional addresses." Mr. Cheetham adds that "imagination . . . was Louis Napoleon's mastering quality, and it is everywhere apparent, together with elevated thought and clearness of expression in his literary work." As a ruler and statesman, Louis Napoleon must be pronounced a failure, though whether this was due to circumstances or to inherent defects in character is a nice question, to which it is difficult to give an unqualified answer. An anecdote furnished to Mr. Cheetham by Mr. Thomas Hardy, and printed as a postscript to the present volume, may possibly throw some light on Louis Napoleon's character. When William Barnes, the Dorset poet—who told the story to Mr. Hardy—was a schoolmaster in Dorchester, he had as usher a certain Mr. Hann, "a fair and rather choleric young man from the Vale of Blackmoor." It was the custom for the Dorchester burghers, with their visitors, to promenade round the older part of the town on Sundays. On one occasion Barnes and Hann met a band of strollers, among them Louis Napoleon, who, "in a sort of freak, put out his walking-cane between Hann's legs so unexpectedly that the latter staggered and nearly fell, which caused laughter among the other promenaders. The next thing of which Barnes was conscious was of having Hann's coat tossed into his arms by his furious usher, and of seeing Hann in his shirt-sleeves spring in a pugilistic attitude in front of Louis Napoleon, and call upon him to defend himself before he was laid flat on the gravel." Louis Napoleon, seeing he had mistaken his man, apologised profusely. However, it was rather want of will than of personal courage that he showed during his political career.

Among the "other essays" in Mr. John Buchan's "Some Eighteenth Century Byways, and Other Essays" (Blackwood, 7s. 6d. net) are to be found such subjects as Bunyan, Tolstoy, Rabelais, Mommsen, the Victorian Chancellors, the Heroic Age of Ireland, and Mr. Balfour, so that the title of the book is somewhat misleading. Many of the papers are merely reviews of books such as Mr. Atlay's "Victorian Chancellors," or Mr. Andrew Lang's "Prince Charles Edward," or the third volume of the same author's "History of Scotland," while others are short essays, which made excellent journalism, but seem to us of slight permanent interest. On the other hand, some of those essays which come properly under the title Mr. Buchan has chosen are well worth reprinting. "A Comic Chesterfield" gives an entertaining account of the eleventh Earl of Buchan, whose many eccentricities have not won for him the immortality he deserves. There is also a vivid account of Lady Louisa Stuart, "one of the best of English letter-writers, equal—though of a very different type—to her more famous grandmother, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu," and a judicious estimate of Lord Mansfield. Mr. Buchan regards Mr. Balfour as "in many ways, the representative Scotsman." He has every characteristic with which the world at large credits the Scot, and which the Scot flatters himself that he possesses." One may accept this, but we certainly demur to the verdict which rates Mr. Balfour "higher than any other literary statesman of to-day." It is sheer nonsense to set Mr. Balfour's achievement as a man of letters above that of Lord Morley or of Mr. Bryce; but here, as in some other parts of his volume, Mr. Buchan allows political prejudice to pervert his judgment. This is to be regretted, because Mr. Buchan's characterisation contains much that is of value. We quote two sentences which show his power of analysis: "Mr. Balfour is always destructive when he is at his best." "Thinness, as of a too dry wine, is the defect of Mr. Balfour's finely critical spirit." The essay is laudatory, but, with the exception we have noted, not too laudatory, for Mr. Balfour's dialectical bent is seen to great advantage when treating such philosophical questions as have engaged most of his literary work.

Mr. Philip Treherne's little volume, "The Right Hon. Spencer Perceval" (Unwin, 5s. net), does not add anything to our knowledge of the subject, nor is it remarkable for any new ideas. It is, in the main, a straightforward account of a career that presents no subtleties. It deals with the surface of politics only, and perhaps that is fortunate, for the writer's occasional comments on social and economic conditions reveal a considerable confusion of mind. This little burst, which interrupts his account of the Order in Council, is an example: "The country has experienced the doctrine of Free Trade—a philanthropic epoch of peace and goodwill, though the cost of living increases from year to year, and the poorer citizens are crushed in every direction. Rent, food, and fuel continue to augment, but they are told to sleep soundly in their beds. The necessities of life are as nothing compared to a sense of security." This is one of many little splashes of honest indignation that show Mr. Treherne to be a man of feeling and spirit but not of very profound insight, or possessed of a very clear grasp of the matter he is discussing. Towards the end of his volume these splashes occur more frequently, and he ends with a little storm of temper and impatience. "To the average materialist of these days a character like Spencer Perceval's presents the aspect of a sealed volume." If this is a correct judgment, the average materialist is certainly very easy to elude and baffle. We should have thought that few things were less like a sealed volume than the character of Perceval. He was a man of integrity and courage, with great Parliamentary abilities and a genuine force of character. Unfortunately he lacked insight, imagination, wide sympathies, and the power of taking long or large views. He identified himself with the narrow prejudices of the Court against Catholic Emancipation, and he resisted Parliamentary Reform. The poor of England, whom Mr. Treherne pities for sufferings Free Trade has brought them, were sinking into pauperism, under the unchecked power of the governing oligarchy, at the most rapid rate in history. Their condition excited the sympathy and alarm of some of those, like Whitbread and Cobbett, on whom Mr. Treherne pours derision; but the career of Perceval himself is the best illustration of the unconcern with which the Tories whom he admires watched their miserable decline. Probably no politician of Perceval's great abilities has ever taken so limited a view of the aims and purposes of society.

In M. Maspero's book, "New Light on Ancient Egypt" (Unwin, 12s. 6d. net), we have a charming popular account of the most recent work in this wide field by one of the leading Egyptologists of our day. By means of a number of apparently disconnected chapters he first awakens and then focuses our attention on the subject of ancient Egyptian life. First he gives a sketch of the history, then he draws our attention to the means by which this history has been reconstructed. He tells us of the excavations that have been made, of the inscriptions that have been deciphered, of the museums in which the finds have been arranged and classified; and in doing so he mentions all his fellow-workers in Egyptology with an appreciation that throws a glamour round their efforts. Even when he is dealing with the most technical points he is never dull, and some of his chapters, such as those on the love poetry of Egypt, or the romance of an Egyptian statesman's life, rise beyond a common interest. Hellenists may complain that he is too eager to affiliate the glory that was Greece to the grandeur that was Egypt. What the Eleusinian Mysteries and the Dionysiac celebrations have in common with Egypt, they have in common with many other primitive rites, but M. Maspero himself is eager to admit that the proofs of the connection are as yet but shadowy. But for anyone who is interested in Egypt, but has not the time or the opportunity to visit it, it will be a real treat to read M. Maspero's chapters on the rites of El-Armarna or the Oasis. He describes both so vividly that we can almost feel the keen desert air in our faces, and see the stately ruins in the brilliant sun. Nor could anything be much more vivid than his description of the opening of the tomb of Queen Tiji. This book, archæological as it is, rises out of the region of archæology into that of literature, and reading it we perceive that archæology, like philosophy, is "not harsh and crabbed as dull fools suppose, but musical as is Apollo's lute, and a perpetual feast of nectared sweets, where no crude surfeit reigns."

Mrs. Garnett's translation of "The Revolt of the 'Potemkin'" (Heinemann, 6s. net.) enables English readers to read the description by an eye-witness of the mutiny on the Russian battleship, which was one of the most thrilling episodes in the Russian revolution. The author, Constantine Feldmann, narrates his experiences in a plain and direct style, that lifts his book into the level of real literature. His account of the ill-treatment of the Russian sailors and of their dreams of freedom and justice is all the more impressive because it is never strained or exaggerated. We have seen no book more likely to evoke sympathy for Russian freedom combined with detestation of the methods employed in its repression. To say that the work has been translated by Mrs. Garnett is a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the rendering.

Miss Esther Singleton has done good work as the author of an exhaustive volume on "Dutch and Flemish Furniture," and this entitles her guide to "The Standard Galleries of Holland" (Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d. net) to serious consideration. The galleries she describes are the Mauritshuis at the Hague, the Rijks Museum at Amsterdam, and its less important neighbor, the Stedelijk Museum, the Town Hall, Haarlem, famous for the Hals Regency pictures, and the Boijmans Museum at Rotterdam. Most of the criticism included is that of well-known authorities, and the handy arrangement of the volume should commend it to those who have not the opportunity of studying the standard works on the subject. The work is illustrated with some fair reproductions of famous pictures, and contains an excellent index.

It is never an easy task to analyse the charm of an essayist, and Mr. J. B. Atkins puzzles while he pleases. There are no novel ideas in "Side-Shows" (Christophers, 3s. 6d. net), no fruits of a rare experience, no audacities, no deliberate criticisms of life or society. But there is a singular and unfailing urbanity, an ease of manner, and a grace of movement which recall the essays rather of the eigthteenth than of the nineteenth century. The writer is contented with the world, and on tolerant terms with himself. He enjoys the pageant, and we feel that he is himself a popular guest. The result is that he has written a book which will disturb no slumbering conventions, and start no uneasy reflections, while it pleases, relaxes, and entertains. There are pages of kindly yet gently satirical social description, which set one asking why, after all, it just fails to reach the classical level. There is a dialogue with a cat which betrays a rare insight in the most elusive branch of animal psychology. There are spirited sketches of torpedo-boats and destroyers. There are quaint dialogues with a Derby winner, with Doggett, and with the Duke of Buckingham; vivid sketches from Paris and Madrid, and water-colors from the Norfolk Broads. The best is literature, the least excellent is good journalism. A pleasant and easy style, a rare absence of effort and self-consciousness, a kindly sense of humour, a notable variety of theme, and an unfailing charm of manner, make this dainty volume a welcome addition to our stock of contemporary essays.

Mr. Henry van Dyke is the American author of a number of books of a religious character, and, as he explains in the preface to "Out-of-Doors in the Holy Land (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s. net), it was largely a religious motive that led him to Palestine. He desired—as many others have done—to learn to appreciate the full significance of the Bible stories by acquainting himself with the localities connected with them; and to attain this object the more completely, he avoided the ordinary tourist method of travelling, shunning hotels, and keeping to the open road. His small expedition, conducted by an exemplary dragoman, proceeded in this manner from Jaffa to Jerusalem, where they camped outside the Damascus gate, and from this base explored the neighbouring places of interest; then pushed on to the old Roman city of Jerash by way of the Valley of Aijalon, and so into Samaria and Galilee, completing the journey with Damascus. A pretty gift of word painting makes the narrative very readable, and some felicity of expression is shown in the "Psalms"—a somewhat curious literary conceit of the author's own composition—that intervene betwixt the chapters. There are also fragments of personal experiences, encountered en route, that relieve a record mainly composed of scenic description and reminiscence of Bible and later history. The volume is adorned with color illustrations that strike one as being conscientious rather than inspired.

The chronology of the earliest Egyptian dynasties is one of those subjects which historians have never ceased to wrangle over since the study of Egyptology began. Neither is it yet determined whether Mena, the first king of the First Dynasty of which there is any authentic historical record, flourished about 5,500 B.C., or two thousand years later. Only when one comes to the eighteenth Dynasty does one find the beginning of an agreement between the contending schools of chronologists; they consent, thenceforward to the Persian Conquest, to work, more or less, along a common line of dates. In adopting the older, which is the higher system of early chronology, in the "Story of the Pharaohs" (Black, 7s. 6d. net), the Rev. James Blaikie has the authority of Professor Flinders Petrie; but the two systems are given side by side in an appendix, and there is nothing in the text to prevent the reader, intent on further study, from choosing which he likes. The period covered by the book extends from the First Dynasty to the Battle of Pelusium, at which the rout of the Egyptian army led to the occupation of the country by Cambyses. From the first to the twelfth Dynasty the progress of the race and its rulers can be traced clearly and consecutively; then there is a period of some slight obscurity, caused probably by the oft-repeated changes of government and a chronic condition of civil war; and, finally, with the foundation of the eighteenth Dynasty, there begins the era that witnessed the military genius of Tahutmes III., the rise of an empire that extended into Syria and Nubia, the ultimate decline of that empire after Rameses III., and its fall at Pelusium, with which event the independent history of Egypt may be said to cease. Modern archæological investigation in a country whose climate has always favored the permanence of monuments has done much to elucidate historical problems, and Mr. Blaikie shows himself well abreast of what has been done in this direction. For his reconstruction of the social fabric he has drawn upon the exhaustive works of Professors Maspero, Petrie, and others of repute. The picture he gives of the Court and the upper and lower classes of the community, and his sketch of the curious and often contradictory beliefs that made up their religious system, are very fascinating: not less so because his literary touch is considerably lighter than what one usually encounters in a work containing so much solid information. Egyptian art and architecture are represented by a number of characteristic illustrations in half-tone and line.

It has been left to a little knot of French economists to maintain in its pristine rigor that "simple system of natural liberty" which once dominated industrial theory and practice in this country. Professor Leroy Beaulieu is a master of this individualistic interpretation of social progress, and his latest volume, entitled "Collectivism," carefully translated by Sir Arthur Clay (Murray. 10s. 6d. net), applies the pure logic of this doctrine in criticism of current Socialism. For M. Beaulieu all forms and degrees of Socialism are varieties of the same destructive malady. Under all of these the worker will lose his individual liberty, becoming the slave, not of the State, but rather of the gang of politicians who will "run" the State. Since all the springs of industry will be weakened, the product of industry will be diminished, and the arts of industry will no longer advance; so there will be loss for all the classes and individuals of which society consists. "In the course of two or three generations only, the material impoverishment and moral weakening of humanity would be considerable; in a century the face of the world would be entirely changed; not only would all improvement in production have ceased, but even the technical arts already acquired would have deteriorated, owing to the want of personal interest in the practice of them, and humanity would soon revert to the ignorance, indolence, and poverty of primitive ages." To sustain his thesis the author argues that there is really no such thing as "unearned increments," that all payments which rank as such are really necessary stimuli to owners of land, capital, and ability. Trusts, combines, and other limitations of competition are trifling and purely ephemeral phenomena, not seriously contravening the practice of free competition which directs production and secures an equitable distribution of the product.

In compiling his volume, "Anne Seymour Damer: A Woman of Art and Fashion, 1748-1828" (Kegan Paul, 12s. 6d. net), Mr. Percy Noble has been faced by the difficulty that the subject of his biography left instructions that all her letters and papers should be destroyed at her death. There are, however, numerous references to her in contemporary memoirs, and from these, as well as from a few autograph papers and letters that have survived, Mr. Noble has put together a fairly interesting biography. Anne Seymour Damer was the daughter of Field-Marshal Conway, and, in the opinion of her friends, a woman of great wit and vivacity, with a talent for sculpture that was little short of genius. Among her works are the colossal statue of George III. at Edinburgh, the sculptured heads of "Thame" and "Isis," that stand below Henley Bridge, and busts of Nelson and Sir Joseph Banks. Horace Walpole was her father's cousin, and she eventually inherited the famous house at Strawberry Hill, with its wealth of curios and £2,000 a year for its upkeep. She took a leading part in the Whig society of her day, and supported Fox in his candidature for Westminster. Indeed, Fox seems to have been one of her heroes, for within a few weeks of the Battle of Waterloo she presented Napoleon with a bust of Fox, receiving in exchange a snuff-box set with diamonds with Napoleon's portrait on the cover. Mrs. Damer bequeathed this snuff-box to the British Museum "under the injunction of never allowing the portrait to be copied." Despite the injunction, a reproduction of the miniature is one of the illustrations in Mr. Noble's book. Considering the difficulties of Mr. Noble's task, he has acquitted himself well. His picture of Mrs. Damer is necessarily rather blurred in outline. But it shows us a woman of character and achievement.

By securing gold in the open market last Monday, the Bank of England proved the wisdom of those who prophesied that after the issue of the Russian Loan the French demand for gold would cease, and our Bank reserve would be replenished without difficulty. As the collection of the income-tax is now proceeding rapidly, money is tight, and this, again, helps the directors to make their three per cent. rate effective. The outlook for the stock markets is not very good, as the enormous capital issues and Government loans must have absorbed most of the French and British accumulations. Trade requirements, also, seem happily to be increasing, though very slowly.

The Canadian Loan.

It is said that about half the Canadian Loan has been subscribed by the public, the other half being left on the underwriters' hands. This is not a bad result, as there will be no difficulty in disposing of a gilt-edged security yielding 3¾ per cent. The provision of ten pound bonds has attracted a great deal of notice, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer has helped on the idea by himself subscribing for one of these bonds, which really make an ideal security for the small investor. Among the other new issues "coffee" bonds are still highly favored. The Russian loan, after being at a premium, has gone to a discount, while

THE GRAND TRUNK AND THE GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC.

A good deal of anxiety has been felt lately about the Grand Trunk system. It had some prosperous years, and people began to think that even the Third Preference would turn out a good security. But the American panic, coupled with the bad harvest of 1907 in Canada and a severe trade depression, have hit the whole line very severely. Moreover, the new transcontinental line (the Grand Trunk Pacific) is sufficiently connected with its parent to put a very heavy strain on Grand Trunk finances before long. It is impossible to say how soon after completion the western portion of the line will pay. That it will pay in the end, and make a magnificent contribution to Canada's development there can be no doubt. The resignation of the Grand Trunk Pacific manager is attributed to disclosures of financial corruption in connection with some contracts for railroad construction. A great effort is being made just to purify public finance in Canada.

THE LONDON BANKS.

The banks, of course, all suffered more or less in 1908 as compared with 1907, and some of them have only maintained their dividends by giving the shareholders more than they earned. Fortunately, the London and County, whose report appears elsewhere, has a very wide margin, and has been able to maintain its 20 per cent. dividend quite comfortably, although its profits were £100,000 less than in the preceding year. The profits of the National Provincial were sufficient to provide a dividend of 17 per cent. as in 1907, leaving a handsome balance. This is a very strong position. It is very fortunate that English banks as a whole have such stability. It is just because they are managed as a rule by cautious men on conservative lines.

SUGGESTIONS FOR

CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The King visits Berlin on Tuesday next. A brilliant programme, with the family element strongly emphasised, is being arranged for him, and we need not say how earnestly we desire that his journey will bring success with it. We wish we could add that all the arrangements associated with this important event were ideal. We do not profess to understand why the association of Sir Charles Hardinge with the King's State or semi-State interviews with other Sovereigns is continued. The practice is thoroughly unconstitutional, and we believe that, so far from adding to the weight of the King's proper influence in foreign affairs, it detracts from it. In the case of the Berlin visit, we are glad to see that the King will also be accompanied by a Minister of State. He could not be joined to a more agreeable and tactful personality than that of the Colonial Secretary; but the first remark which suggests itself in connection with the choice of Lord Crewe is: "Why is not the Foreign Secretary to be present on an occasion on which issues of foreign policy alone arise?" Is Sir Edward Grey's absence really meant to emphasise the fact that no real approach to Germany is intended? We hope not. But in that case why do we not use to the uttermost Sir Edward Grey's remarkable power of impressing everyone with whom he is brought into contact?

The Russian Government has intervened to suggest a solution of the difficulty between Turkey and Bulgaria. Turkey demands £5,000,000 compensation; Bulgaria offers only £3,280,000. Turkey, however, owes Russia an annual indemnity of £320,000, and Russia proposes to remit this for a term of years sufficient to make up the larger sum, and herself to get an equivalent from Bulgaria. There are countless descriptions of this suggested transaction, all conflicting. Some reduce it to a mere matter of book-keeping; others assert that Russia is making Bulgaria a subvention from her own pocket; while from others again it would appear to be a profitable business speculation. The Bulgarian Government have approved the principle of the solution because it would save them raising a loan, and France and Great Britain are pressing its acceptance upon Constantinople.

On the other hand, Austria and Germany are decidedly against it. Russia's purpose is plainly to break the alliance between Austria and Bulgaria, and to establish her hegemony in the Balkans beyond dispute, for Bulgaria, the only independent Slav State in the Balkans, would be delivered over to Russia if the Russian scheme were adopted. Turkey also is disposed against the scheme, on financial grounds because she never paid the Russian indemnity regularly, and it is not clear that she would get the ready money she needs, and on political grounds because it is her plain interest to oppose the extension of Russian influence in the Balkans, and herself to get on good terms again with Bulgaria, the strongest of her Balkan neighbors. Apart from this it is feared that Russia may ask for the opening of the Dardanelles as an additional reward for her "generosity." Turkish opinion is said to be greatly disturbed by the action of our Foreign Office in backing up Russia.

All the delegates to the South African Convention have signed the draft Constitution which will make South Africa a Commonwealth, and it will be published next week, and discussed by the State Parliaments next month. The framers of this great instrument—the special work of Liberalism and of a British Prime Minister of the "Little England" school—have worked in perfect harmony, and the "Times" correspondent says that General Botha has gained everyone's admiration by his "breadth of view." The compromise on the capital is a curious one. Cape Town—much the most famous and beautiful of South African cities—is to have the Parliament: Pretoria is to be the administrative centre; and Bloemfontein—the central town—gets the Appeal Court. It is hard for us to imagine a Parliament working with its administrative offices a thousand miles off—here they are even transferred for a good part of the day from Whitehall to the Palace of Westminster. But Botha and the veteran and sagacious Mr. Hofmeyr seem to think that the arrangement is practicable.

Mr. Churchill spoke at Nottingham with force and sympathy on the social question and on the policy of constructive legislation to which it is understood that his department is especially devoting itself. The line to which the Government are apparently fixed forbids the raising of the great political issue, but Mr. Churchill declared that they were bent on placing before the nation what he called a "wide, comprehensive, interdependent scheme of social organisation" in the shape of "a massive series of legislative proposals and administrative acts." We suppose the specific allusion is to the kindred problems of the Poor Law and Unemployment. The design, apparently, is to present a connected series of reforms within the next two years, beginning with labor exchanges and ending up with a scheme revolutionising Poor Law administration in respect of vagrancy, the treatment of children, outdoor relief, and old age. Unemployment may be dealt with in the form of Bills setting up plans of afforestation, of Wages Boards for the sweated industries, and of industrial and invalidity insurance. Such a programme—as Mr. Masterman hinted in a powerful speech at Yarmouth—necessarily involves new friction, and eventually direct conflict, with the House of Lords.

We observe that Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's late Secretary, took the fighting line with great directness and energy in a speech at Stirling Burghs. Mr. Ponsonby thought that the credit of Liberalism depended on the prompt handling of the question of the Lords, and insisted that the ranks were "united and thirsting for the fray." "The time," he said, "has now come for action; the Liberal Party are ready, the bugle has been sounded. The decks must be cleared—cleared for action." We are quite sure that when this spirit gets firm hold of the party, it will make short work of the calculations and plans of delay.

On Tuesday Baron Komura, the Japanese Premier, made an important statement on foreign policy to the Japanese Diet. Peace, he said, was so well secured that the country should concentrate on domestic development. In that connection she must discourage random emigration and direct the flow of population to her own Asiatic possessions. The regulation of emigration was bound up with the prosperity of Japan's international commerce, and these considerations explained the compacts that she had entered into with the United States and Canada. A new customs tariff would be introduced, and for that purpose existing commercial treaties would be denounced. Japan's relations with France and Germany were excellent and growing in cordiality. The agreement with the United States had confirmed a traditional friendship and contributed to the repose of the Orient, and the Japanese Government relied upon the sense of justice of the American people and the friendly disposition of the Federal Government to prevent anti-Japanese legislation.

By far the most interesting passage in the speech referred to Great Britain and China. Baron Komura remarked that though "various events of far-reaching importance" had occurred in the relations of the two countries with other Powers, the alliance with Great Britain had steadily grown in strength and solidity, and to-day stood upon a perfectly firm and enduring foundation. Some long-pending questions with China had been adjusted, and in the case of others a satisfactory solution should not be "altogether impossible" if approached in a spirit of conciliation. Japan had invariably made it her guiding rule to observe the principle of the open door. The severest comment upon these two passages is a leader in the "Times." The "Times" until now has been strongly pro-Japanese, but its leader on Wednesday was an unveiled attack on Japan's treason to the "open door" principle, especially in the matter of the Fakumann railway. Can it be doubted that this change of tone is one result of the Anglo-Russian alliance?

The Conference of the Labor Party at Portsmouth has had a somewhat inconsequential end. Having repudiated dogmatic Socialism as a test, the Conference adopted, by 362 votes to 313, the stock Marxian resolution in favor of the socialisation of the "means of production, distribution, and exchange," and the "complete emancipation of labor from the dominion of capitalism and landlordism." As a matter of practical policy, the resolution asked the Labor members to frame, and the Government to support, Bills for the nationalisation of land, railways, and mines. We suppose these verbal pieties are thought necessary to secure the adherence of the minority, not one member of which can think them out. But they obviously play the game of the two kinds of politicians who wish to discredit the Labor Party as a practical force, and those who never think of political action at all. As a rule, the more extreme the theoretical basis of an English Labor Party is, the less effective is its practical action on the Left wing of the Liberal Party.

The negotiations with the United States are not yet quite secure. The Fisheries Agreement has at last been accepted by the Newfoundland Government, but the Waterways Treaty is hung up in the Senate. Responsible Senators are talking of its ratification being postponed for months. The criticism to which it is subjected is directed chiefly to two points—a demand that the distribution of the water-power from the river joining Lake Superior and Lake Huron should be arranged for in the treaty, and an objection to the pollution clause, which is held to be unfair to the United States, which has most large towns on the border. If the treaty is amended by the Senate on these points, the weary round of negotiations will have to begin over again. Meanwhile, a section of the Canadian Press utilise the opportunity for girding at Downing Street. These papers think it humiliating that the Canadian Parliament should not be in possession of a treaty which is under discussion in the United States Senate. The complaint is unfounded, because the American Senate, unlike the Canadian Parliament, shares the treaty-making power, and must, therefore, be informed. Apart from this, it is notorious that the treaty was drafted in Canada by a Canadian statesman, and that no step in the negotiations was conducted by Mr. Bryce except according to the wishes of the Canadian Government.

The Confederates' plans for the forcible eviction from the Conservative Party of all Free-traders, Free-fooders, doubtfuls, and moderates have been advanced this week by the practical exclusion of Mr. Abel Smith, the sitting Unionist member for East Herts. Mr. Smith had a pistol put to his head in the shape of a pledge that he would support a 2s. tax on foreign corn, and a maximum tariff of 10 per cent. on foreign manufactured goods. This was ironically called a compromise. It is, of course, Mr. Chamberlain's old policy. Mr. Smith refused to accept it. The local Association has disowned him, but he keeps his position, which personally is a very strong one, as an independent candidate. The same deadly war is being carried on at Reading and at East Marylebone, where the Confederates have not yet succeeded in driving out Lord Robert Cecil. Lord Robert's meeting in St. James's Hall was practically broken up by "Confederates," who, borrowing a hint from the "suffragettes," appear to have acted through various London branches of the Tariff Reform League. Bitter recriminations have been exchanged in the party Press.

The French Cabinet, like our own, is discussing the Navy Estimates. M. Picard, it will be remembered, took office a few months ago, when a fierce onslaught, led by M. Delcassé, on the administration of the Navy Department, led to the fall of M. Thompson. A report prepared by M. Picard is said to assert that half the ships are practically valueless, and that France had sunk from the second to the fifth place among Naval Powers. M. Picard is a big navy man, and ambitious not merely to reform his Department and introduce efficiency, but to enter France for the naval armaments race. The spending of large sums is, of course, much easier than the securing of technical and administrative efficiency, and M. Picard's estimates were at first so heavy that M. Caillaux, the Finance Minister, threatened to resign. They have been revised since, and M. Caillaux is reported more tractable.

The Azeff scandal produced astonishing fruit on Sunday, when M. Lopukhin, a former chief of the secret police, was arrested on a charge of high treason. M. Lopukhin is believed to have revealed to the revolutionaries Azeff's relations with the police, and he certainly refused to deny to them that Azeff was an agent provocateur when asked to do so by the spy and high police officials. The arrest has caused a tremendous sensation in Russia, because it indicates the complete collapse of the effort to hush up the revelations made in Paris. With the association between police and revolutionaries so intimate that a police agent co-operates in the murder of some of the greatest Russian personages, the feeling is general that the whole State system is even more utterly chaotic than the most pessimistic had believed. The Duma discussed the scandal on Tuesday, and during the debate it was pointed out that the Government had denied the existence of agents provocateurs at the very moment that M. Stolypin held a letter from M. Lopukhin asking for protection against Azeff and Azeff's friends in the police department. No party in the Duma defended the employment of agents provocateurs, and the Government forbore to attend the discussion. The arrest of M. Lopukhin is generally believed to be an act of revenge for the exposure of Azeff, and the charges of high treason are discredited.

Lord Robertson, one of the Lords of Appeal, and a very familiar and, in his way, a brilliant figure in politics, died on Tuesday at Cap Martin, aged 63. He belonged to a vigorous, rather narrow type of Tory lawyer and politician, and his speeches in both capacities reflected at once the keen polish of his style and his somewhat infertile quality of mind. He was a strong Free Trader, and emphasised his dislike of Protection with the same unsparing force as that with which, a few weeks ago, he attacked the Licensing Bill. The vacancy among the Lords of Appeal will, beyond all doubt, be filled by the present Lord Advocate, whose personal and political claims stand alone. It is essential that the Law Lords should have a due infusion of men of broad and progressive thought, especially in view of the unsettled industrial problems which continually arise before them. Mr. Shaw's elevation, therefore, commends itself, not only as a proper recognition of a distinguished political career, but of a kind of service of which the country stands continually in need on the higher judicial seats.—Meanwhile, the Lord Chancellor has made three judicial changes, all of them well-considered. Sir Gorell Barnes goes to the Court of Appeal, and his place in the Divorce Court is taken by Mr. Justice Bigham, whose competence cannot be questioned. His successor again is Mr. J. A. Hamilton, a commercial lawyer of the highest standing, and of very large practice.

The Registrar-General's return of births, marriages and deaths for 1907 has two mutually destructive features, the decrease of the birth rate, which, standing at 26·3 per 1,000, is the lowest on record, and the fall of the death rate, which has sunk as low as 15 per 1,000, and is also the lowest known. Thus civilisation begins in some measure to defeat itself, through its tendency to save existing life on the one hand, and to avoid new life on the other. A welcome feature of the returns is that at last the increase of mortality from cancer has been checked, although science has, up to the present, achieved nothing more than exploratory work in regard to it. The more efficient working of sanitary law is specially seen in the remarkable decrease in child mortality. We are saving to-day thousands of young lives, though all through last century we threw them away.

We are glad to see that Lord Carrington has promised to create new central Commissioners in order to quicken up the working of the Small Holdings Act, and to "look after" those County Councils which have proved themselves to be "very slow movers." A second very admirable spur to small culture has been furnished by Mr. Frank Lloyd, who has offered, through "Lloyd's News," prizes of £1,000 for the best cultivated small holdings and allotments in seven typical English counties. The prizes are carefully divided among cultivators of ten acres, less than ten acres, and less than two acres in the selected counties, and "intelligence, care, industry, and economy" are to be considered rather than mere expenditure. Lord Carrington is to nominate the judges; and, for our part, we shall be happy to detail the results of this very interesting and promising experiment.

The "Manitoba Free Press" and other influential Canadian newspapers are denouncing with severity what they regard as "a conspiracy" of English Protectionists and their Press to deceive the people of this country by a gross misrepresentation of the Canadian situation. Appeals to Canada to cease negotiating commercial treaties with foreign countries until a Conservative Government is here in office, and declarations on this side of Canada's intention to seek commercial, and possibly political, union with the United States unless we give them preference, are stigmatised as "nauseating misrepresentations." Lord Milner and Lord Northcliffe are expressly named as giving circulation to these absurdities. The outcries of the "Daily Mail" and the "Observer" against the growing Americanisation of Canada, as illustrated by the proposal of Mr. Hill to extend his Great Northern system to Winnipeg, are cited as impertinent interference with matters which Canadians understand and we do not. Speaking of what is here called Mr. Hill's "threat," the "Free Press" remarks: "Nothing could delight the people of this country more than to hear more 'threats' of that kind, and see them carried out at the earliest moment." The notion that Canada will be influenced in her railroad policy or her tariff arrangements by anything said or done here is only entertained by Imperialists "who only England know."

Politics and Affairs.

THE NEW SCARE ABOUT THE NAVY.

> The Army and Navy present fields of possible extravagance, and certainly not of possible but of PRACTICABLE reductions. There is no man in this House who entertains that sentiment more profoundly than I do myself; but let me point out that there are only two ways, two PRACTICABLE WAYS, in which you can reduce expenditure upon the Army and Navy. What are they? In the case of the Army by reducing the numbers of your permanent fighting force. There is no other way of doing it. And in the case of the Navy by CONTRACTING YOUR SHIPBUILDING PROGRAMME.—The Prime Minister on Warlike Expenditure.

It seems to us extremely unfortunate that the visit of the King to Berlin should have been chosen by our Jingoes as a moment for the propagation of a new Navy scare, and by our naval organisers for the formal announcement that we are transferring a fresh detachment of battleships from the Mediterranean to the North Sea, where we already possess an overwhelming superiority of strength. A smaller, but still a significant, event is the production and ostentatious patronage by "society" of a play which plainly describes the invasion of England by a German army. Wisdom and tact in procedure are not, we imagine, dispensable weapons in the conduct of affairs, and they may, on occasion, weigh even heavier than material strength. But the ordering of our naval affairs becomes still more serious when a Liberal Government is invited by its opponents not only to write off the pledges of its chief and of his predecessor as to economy in the war services, but to initiate a scale of expenditure of unheard-of excess. Ten years ago, under a Conservative Government, the Navy Estimates were less than £24,000,000. In the aftermath of the South African War, a period of undoubted danger to the country, even of something approaching European combination against her, they never reached £37,000,000. We are now asked to raise them to £35,000,000 for this year and to £38,000,000 for the next. This is what the demand of the "Times" for six Dreadnoughts, each costing over £2,000,000 apiece, means. There is nothing new in this kind of pressure. It has been put upon every Liberal Government in our remembrance, and it always proceeds from the same quarter. But there is something especially daring, not to say insulting, in the present attack. The appeal is avowedly made to those members of the Cabinet who are supposed to be identified with the policy of the Liberal League. These gentlemen are to act against the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the rest of their colleagues, first, in order to enforce a definition of the two-Power standard which we venture to say the Prime Minister and every sensible man repudiate; and, secondly, to bring up the Estimates to a point in harmony with this doctrine. Where, then, do we stand? Is it conceivable that the Government are ready to abandon the express promises of the Prime Minister and his colleagues as to retrenchment—promises which the House of Lords has no power to qualify—and even to screw up war expenditure higher than their Tory opponents? This would seem to be the demand of the "Times." Under what circumstances is it made? The Prime Minister has handed over to Mr. Lloyd-George the control of the Exchequer, and the financing of Old Age Pensions on a wider scale than that which he himself anticipated. He has pledged himself to a large extension of this immense boon. He and his colleagues are also responsible for British credit during a severe depression which has not yet passed away. These two historic functions of Liberalism—social reform and economy in the war services—are to be abandoned at the behest of the "Times" and the "Standard," and the new taxes are to be converted into a form of war levy, set up in a time of profound peace in Europe and the world.

We may well ask ourselves what policy it is which calls for such an expansion of the lavish provision that the country has hitherto cheerfully made for the maintenance of the first arm of its defence. It can be no immediate danger. Judged by the Tweedmouth return, and by the plain facts of the naval situation, the British Navy stands in regard to its two closest European rivals much nearer a three or a four-Power than a two-Power standard. But, in fact, we have no European combination to deal with. It does not exist, save on lines of express co-operation with ourselves. We have therefore to come to the hateful and recurring calculation as to the Anglo-German situation. Here, again, no suggestion of an immediate balance of naval forces suggests itself. Our fleet is not less than four times as strong as Germany's in the modern criteria of fighting strength, i.e., in first-class battleships and first-class cruisers. Taking the last of the new types, the "Dreadnought" and the "Invincible," the British superiority is still more overwhelming. Germany has at this moment no "Dreadnoughts" fit for sea. By the end of this year she may have two or three. But we shall have ten. Or we may take expenditure. Germany is now spending £20,000,000 a year on her Navy, a great, in our view a gravely excessive, sum. At the highest point of her revised programme she will not greatly exceed 23 millions. We are spending 32 millions. Is it contended that a parity of strength, or anything like it, is produced by these two scales of expenditure?

The proposition, however, of our scare-mongers is not that an immediate ground of comparison exists between the two navies, as to which we freely admit that we can allow no parity of strength, and that Germany will vainly aim at attaining it. The argument is that, by some mysterious turn of fortune, and some all-powerful effect of the new German scheme of shipbuilding, this relationship of the two forces will be altered at some not precisely dated period towards the end of 1911 or the beginning of 1912. We should like to know what theory lies behind such calculations. Is it that Germany is preparing a blow at us, to be delivered in the fatal week or weeks when, owing to the rapid turning off of "Dreadnoughts" now on her stocks, we shall have only a small superiority in this one type of warship? If so, we have rarely heard a more ridiculous proposition. In the first place, no such inferiority can well arise. The Navy League "Annual" admits (p. 67) that up to March, 1911, we shall have a superiority of five ships in this largest class—a total of 14 to 9. Counting the omitted "Dreadnought" of last year, we shall, in the normal course of things, add four "Dreadnoughts" this year, and, we suppose, four next year. If we begin the first instalment in reasonable time this year, and finish the vessels in two years, we retain our supremacy of five ships, with some months to spare. No one can object to the Navy League's reasonable plea for a certain promptitude in securing the advantage we have named. Hitherto we have built these great ships faster than the Germans. Is it credible that within a few months we have lost this advantage, and that it has been transferred to the other side?

But this calculation does not exhaust the superiority of the British Navy at the point on which the alarmists, searching the horizon for a cause of fresh stimulation for the war of armaments, fix their eyes. Supposing that a collision between British and German "Dreadnoughts" resulted in the mutual destruction of these types of ships. What would remain? On the German side not one non-obsolete warship of over 13,000 tons. On our side, there would be nine "Magnificents" of 14,900 tons, eight "Formidables" of 15,000 tons, five "Duncans" of 14,000 tons, and eight "King Edwards" of 16,350 tons, practical "Dreadnoughts," superior to the slightly larger type in variety of armament. Against such a fleet no German Admiral would dream of keeping the seas. But that does not exhaust our strength. We possess thirty-five first-class armored cruisers, some classes of which, according to the judgment of the "Times," would be put in line of battle. Germany, according to the Navy League "Annual," has eight. Is it with such forces as these that, two years' hence, she will attempt to wrest from us the primacy of the waters and to invade our shores?

For these reasons we do not think that any reasonable man can conclude that either now or at any proximate period a challenge will be offered to the supremacy of the British Navy. What need, therefore, exists for a further enormous extension of naval armaments? There being no reason for such an extension, a whole forest of arguments presents itself against it. Is not the financial credit of this country, of which the Prime Minister was a recent guardian, an object of first-rate importance, in war as in peace? And is not the policy of this Government a peaceful, orderly, unaggressive policy, which has its inevitable expression in a moderate display of physical strength? If it is otherwise, then we can only say that any individual or group of individuals in this or any other Liberal Cabinet setting up a rival ideal will soon find themselves to be statesmen without a party. And, finally, is not the pursuit of economy in the Navy an object which Mr. McKenna, with his Treasury experience, was expressly urged to pursue? Is expenditure the one criterion of efficiency? We believe the Navy to be an entirely splendid and adequate force. But we are informed by friends as devoted as Lord Brassey that its strength in personnel is grossly excessive, and ought to be reduced. Has Mr. McKenna made any proposition on this point? Has the enormous expenditure on the new types been balanced by economies on other types and in other directions? These are questions which the First Lord of the Admiralty will have to face next Session, and to which, we hope, he will have a good answer. But on one matter no room for doubt exists. The Liberal Party sustains the Prime Minister and his colleagues for ends consonant with European peace and with social progress. If these are abandoned or qualified, the reasons for such a Government cease, and the whole body of forces, moral and political, which brought it into being is paralysed. We cannot conceive that within the next few days the Cabinet will take steps to create an irreparable breach between the forces which sustain Liberalism and those which are now directing it. And we hope that as soon as Parliament meets, the Government will be formally asked to reassure its followers as to our relations with Germany, and the means that have been taken to give them a complexion suited to two Christian and civilised States.

THE ANGLO-GERMAN TENSION.

We have referred in the foregoing article to the fatality of coincidences which seems to attend the efforts made by royal visits to ease the relations between Great Britain and Germany. By a luckless train of happenings, we seem to be repeating the incidents which destroyed the sentimental value of the Kaiser's visit to our Court. It happened to synchronise with the revision of the German building programme, and moved the "Times" to pen a leading article warning Prince Bülow that his presence would be unwelcome in England. It is true that in the diplomatic sphere there has been no overt or public conflict, but that is, after all, the constant feature of this long Anglo-German tension. The two Empires are nowhere at issue over any direct or concrete difference. Our quarrels are invariably over the body of some third Power, and France or Austria bears the brunt of our mutual suspicions. Even the Balkan crisis, thanks mainly to the reticence and self-suppression of German diplomacy, has led to no public encounter between Germany and ourselves. But it has been marked by an isolation of Germany which was, perhaps, even more deplorable than a real difference of opinion. French diplomacy, if the "Temps" at all represents it, has been of late alarmed by the extent to which Berlin has been ignored in all the Balkan negotiations. There has been no attempt to create a concert, or to invoke the joint mediation of England, France, and Germany. Our Foreign Office has spent immense pains in securing unity of action between London and St. Petersburg, and in the end it has pledged itself to promote a Russian solution, of which the egoism is only too apparent. At no point have we attempted to bring Germany into the combination, though her influence in moderating the claims and assuaging the suspicions of Austria would have been invaluable. In such a situation it would be an extravagance to hope that the formal courtesies of a royal visit can go far to remove estrangement.

This disquieting relationship would be intelligible, perhaps even excusable, if it were possible to see in it the working of some broad conflict of principle. When we first concluded our pact with France, progressives in both countries hailed the partnership as a natural grouping of two Liberal Powers in a league of peace, and bright hopes were entertained in this country that some new strength would come from it to the forces working for disarmament and for such causes as the liberation of Macedonia and the Congo. Those hopes are far behind us to-day. France was annoyed by our policy at the Hague, gave but a cold and halting support to our efforts for Macedonia, and never disguised her indifference towards the fate of the Congo. The entente has meant in practice three things—the penetration of Morocco under the cover of our support, a recurring risk of war with Germany, and the inevitable corollary of a close rapprochement with bureaucratic Russia. These consequences were the fault, not of the French people, the most pacific of all European nations; they flowed from the treaty itself, which was a sanction to a policy of expansion, an implicit denial of the ideal of a European Concert. With the inclusion of Russia in the triple pact, the last vestige of its Liberal character disappeared, and a new chapter of expansive Imperialism was opened, this time in Persia. It is hard to see what real advantage we have derived from these arrangements, save the questionable privilege of lending money to Russia. Was there any reason why we should not have put our relations with Germany on a footing as cordial as our relations with Russia? Germany is a Conservative Power, but Russia is reactionary. German diplomacy has often been tortuous and Machiavellian, but it has never revealed quite the same chaos of intrigue as Russian policy has exhibited in the Balkans, and exhibits in Persia to-day. It is the will to make terms which is lacking. Contrast for a moment the attitude of such a newspaper as the "Times" in the presence of such parallel incidents as that of Casa Blanca on the one hand, and the besetting of our Legation in Teheran by Colonel Liakhoff's men on the other. In the first case a trivial broil, in which our friends were involved, is exaggerated into a possible casus belli. In the second case, an affront to our own agents is passed over in silence. The obstacles which might have prevented a rapprochement with Russia—historic enmity, divergence of interests, incompatibility of political views, and the ill-repute of her official tradition—vanished at the first effort to come to terms. None of these obstacles exist to anything like the same extent in the case of Germany. Yet the mere shadows of them suffice to keep us apart.

Our diplomacy in the past three years has allowed itself to interpret continuity of policy in a spirit too passive and uncritical. It has been a loyal ally and a zealous partisan, but it has shown no fertility of ideas, no inspiration in method. It launched its programme for the Hague with little attempt to prepare the way at Berlin, and refused to utilise the right of capture at sea as the obvious line of approach to an arrangement about naval armaments. There has been in our dealings with Berlin no such unconventional departure as the sending of Mr. Bryce to Washington, though a special envoy, free from the jealousies and suspicions which are now so deeply-seated among our professional diplomatists, might have done much to slacken the tension. The method of royal visits has, indeed, been used, but unluckily it is in our Court that German critics are inclined to locate the seat of the tendency to isolate and checkmate their country. The causes of the estrangement are so vague that little direct negotiation is necessary to remove it. The method of approach which might best have succeeded, would rather have been some public and friendly attempt to secure German co-operation in a common European affair, like the Balkan crisis. By omitting that chance, we have confirmed her fears of isolation; by embracing it we might have done much to remove them. It is useless to go to a Power, which is sore and suspicious, with some direct proposal to reduce armaments. Such a proposal could be acceptable only in an atmosphere of cordiality and trust. There is now on both sides a brooding and sedulously cultivated fear, which condemns both alike to a competitive policy of defence. We are nearing the point at which mere nervous tension seeks relief in action, and the economic burden of armaments causes even sane men to suggest—as a writer suggests in a naval annual just issued—that an immediate trial of strength might in the end be the cheaper course.

There has rarely been a Foreign Minister whose aversion from war was so marked as Sir Edward Grey's. But we sometimes fear that his very hatred of war blinds him to its possibility, and leads him into precautions which are themselves a provocation. The idea that Germany is a menace to peace has seemed to excuse a policy of boycott and isolation which has rendered any stable equilibrium in Europe impossible. Germany will not acquiesce in the position which has been assigned to her. She has a place, and a leading place, in the European family, and it is a fatuity to attempt to settle such essentially European questions as those of Morocco and the Balkans without her. Inevitably she is tempted to arm, in order to make good her position, and to threaten France when she cannot reach ourselves. Sir Edward Grey may be satisfied of his own ability to keep the peace. But he is leaving for his successor a heritage of problems and temptations which it should have been the first object of Liberal policy to remove. The past three years have brought us no nearer to an understanding with Germany. If the tension continues, the chances are that on the hazard of the next election we shall stake the future of European peace. A Tory Government would have behind it the Navy alarmists, the deliberate Jingo school, and the pressure of classes which might see in war a means of combating the commercial rivalry of Germany. If Liberalism cannot remove this problem, it is hardly likely that Toryism would even attempt or desire to solve it. Unsolved, it threatens to thwart social reform, to ruin Liberal finance, and so to compromise at once Free Trade and the cause of peace.

A GREAT AMBASSADOR.

Everyone who knew both Mr. Bryce and America felt two years ago, when he was appointed to the British Embassy at Washington, that no happier choice could have been made. But they could hardly have foreseen how fruitful it was to prove. Four treaties already stand to Mr. Bryce's credit; three more have been negotiated with, we hope, in spite of some unfavorable circumstances, fair prospect of ratification; and it looks as though by the end of the present year the Anglo-American slate will have been wiped clean of every contentious issue. That in itself is a very remarkable achievement. It is true that the temper in which Downing Street and Washington and the peoples for whom they act approach their differences has happily within the past decade been revolutionised. None the less to have framed so many compacts and to have adapted them to the sensitiveness of Canadian and Newfoundland opinion on the one hand, and to the somewhat aggressive touchiness of the United States Senate on the other, is no mean feat. It ranks all the higher when one remembers that, when Mr. Bryce entered it, the influence and prestige of the British Embassy had been considerably impaired and that the social primacy it enjoyed in Lord Pauncefote's day had been pretty well wrested from it. But Mr. Bryce's political success is not to be measured solely by the number of agreements he has succeeded in concluding. Of much more moment is his conquest of Canadian and Newfoundland confidence. He is the first British Ambassador in Washington who has visited Ottawa during his term of office. He is the first who has secured for Canada a recognised status in the conduct of Anglo-American diplomacy. He is the first, in short, who has done something tangible towards disabusing the Canadian mind of the notion that the British Embassy in Washington exists to cultivate American good-will at the expense of Canadian interests. Too many British Ambassadors at Washington have forgotten that they represented the Empire as well as Great Britain. They have rather fallen into the way of looking upon Canada and Newfoundland and the diplomatic questions connected with them as unpalatable interruptions in their task of promoting Anglo-American amity. It has been left for Mr. Bryce—in such matters it usually is left for the "Little Englander"—to see his office in its true perspective.

But the political side of the British Ambassador's activities is, or should be, their least important side; and it is in the wide and fertile field that lies outside of protocols and despatch-boxes that Mr. Bryce has made his happiest innovations. His appointment was in itself a recognition, a very tardy one, of the fact that the kind of man who should represent Great Britain in the United States is the kind of man who for the past two generations has represented the United States in Great Britain. America has sent us an unrivalled succession of distinguished, broad-gauged, thoroughly human Ambassadors. Not one of them has been a trained diplomatist, yet all have been successes—and not least successful in their purely business and bargaining hours. They have come to us as national guests far more than as official representatives. They have felt themselves as much accredited to the people as to the Court. They have warmed both hands before the cheerful fire of English existence, have never screened themselves behind the ramparts of officialdom, have partaken freely in the public life of the nation. Mr. Bryce has broken all precedents by adapting their example to American conditions. He has made a point of seeing something of the country and the people. He has declined to confine himself to the Embassy on Connecticut Avenue and his summer home in Massachusetts. He has made himself an intimate part of the world of American letters and of the yet larger world of public endeavor. He has delivered addresses at meetings, congresses, and universities. He has not concealed—there is not the least reason why he should—his passionate interest in all that touches on American life. For the first time the British Ambassador is something more than a name to the masses of the people. He occupies, at last, a distinctive position. He is marked out from his colleagues in the Diplomatic Corps to a degree that corresponds with the special relationship that obtains between the two main branches of the English-speaking peoples. No one could have won this privileged position for the British representative but Mr. Bryce, and no one, having won it, could hold it more easily and acceptably. For twenty years at least no Englishman, no foreigner of any nationality, has had a quarter of his influence with American opinion. His book on the American Commonwealth became a classic within a year of its appearance, and still retains an unapproached pre-eminence, is still the text-book on the American system of government in America itself. All thinking America has long felt and acknowledged itself in debt to him, and even those Americans who do not think know him by name and reputation, and are aware that as an authority on their country and its institutions and its essential spirit he stands first and alone. Both he and his wife were acclimatised to the peculiar social atmosphere of Washington and of America long before they went there as their country's representatives. They knew beforehand what to discount, how to make allowances, what to ignore, how to accommodate themselves. Their knowledge, and the use they have made of it, have restored to the British Embassy at Washington all, and more than all, its former prestige, and have initiated for the two great branches of Anglo-Saxon communities a new, and, we believe, permanent era of friendship and association.

THE MANNER OF SOCIAL REFORM.

We are not disposed to over-rate the significance of Lord Dalmeny's secession from the Liberal Party. The Whigs have lost their old courage and popular sympathies, and we might fairly expect a revolt of a great Scottish landowner's family against the really effective policy of land reform devised for the north of the Tweed by Mr. Sinclair. One cannot take a strong course without stirring opposition. A policy that makes no opponents is like a man who makes no enemies, a colorless creation. We must frankly anticipate that if the Government go forward in earnest with their policy of social reform, there will be more than one voice to cry, "Socialism," and to denounce as revolutionary precisely those improvements which by going to the root of evils are the best calculated to avert the necessity for violent change. But we must not deceive ourselves. If the exigencies of social reform are to be put forward as a serious excuse for declining the encounter with the House of Lords, it must be reform of a far-reaching kind. If only agreed reforms are in the mind of Ministers, the retort is obvious that they would go forward as well under a Unionist as under a Liberal administration. If Ministers are to have anything to show as compensation for the loss of constitutional prestige which their policy of postponing the question of the veto inflicts on the House of Commons, it can only be some very decidedly democratic legislation which the opposite party would be most unlikely to adopt. Here, in fact, we stumble once again upon the old dilemma. If the legislation proposed is vigorous and democratic, will the Lords accept it? If it is tame and tepid, is it worth the cost of abandoning the fight and prejudicing the political career of democracy?

For the moment, however, we will not press this dilemma again. We are pretty confident that if the life of this Parliament continues the facts themselves will press it hard and repeatedly. We take for the moment at their word those Liberals who urge continuance in office for the sake of social reform. We assume that this reform is to be vigorous enough to make the game worth the candle, and we ask on what lines it is to be conceived. That it will be called socialistic, whatever it is, we may take for granted. The term has scarcely more force than a mere epithet of disparagement. It is applied daily to much that is in principle no more socialistic than the police force, and ethically much less so than a good deal of the official teaching of the churches to which men listen unruffled every Sunday. We will only say that on the side of democracy we see nothing to be gained by waving the socialistic red flag in the sight of an easily-roused John Bull, and for this reason we rather deplore academic resolutions affirming the Socialist Utopia, which add nothing to our knowledge of the roads which lead thither. What the Socialist who is enthusiastic for State action as such should concern himself with is not the word-painting of the possibilities of a regenerate life organised by blameless and certificated officials, but rather with the attempt to improve the amenities and mend the efficiency of State officialdom as it actually exists. The State institutions with which the ordinary citizen comes in contact are not, in point of fact, so worked as to make him desire more contact with them, or to fill him with enthusiasm for a world in which, say, every shop would be served on the principle of an average post office, and every business conducted on the lines of the Post Office Telephone system. That the average taxpayer should not fall in love at first sight with the average collector or assessor of taxes is, perhaps, natural enough. The tax-gatherer's task is not a happy one, but it might be conducted with more amenity than is sometimes found. To many middle-class men the only outward and visible sign and symptom of the Pension system which is bringing a new comfort and independence to more than half a million of the aged is that he is being worried earlier than usual and more actively than of old to pay his income-tax. This objectionable yellow paper is his concrete point of contact with the great State machine, and it does not fill him with enthusiasm. When he is pressed sooner and more heavily than before, and refers the change to pensions as a cause, his springs of benevolence are apt to dry up. To achieve social reform the State must act fortiter in re, but why not also with a little more of the suaviter in modo? Suppose, for instance, that instead of insistent and accelerated demands there were an attempt at suasion in the form of a more liberal discount. A nominal advantage is already offered to those who pay before each January 1st. Why should it not be a real discount, sufficient to induce payment three months before date, a discount that people would regard?

These considerations, however, touch the manner only of State action. They are important only as the oil that enables the wheels to turn. But they are not to be despised at a time when, if there is to be legislation, it will have to be such as will involve more of officialism and more of taxation. The great opportunity for social legislation this year will, of course, be the forthcoming Poor Law Report, which, arriving at the very moment when the question of unemployment is acute, naturally determines the point of attack. The problem of the unemployed is the most urgent part of the questions included under the general notion of poor relief, and will, we hope, be the first to which the Government will direct their efforts. We do not expect to find any panacea for this disease of modern industry; but, as we have often urged, we believe that some real mitigation can be found by applying different methods of treatment to the case of the skilled and unskilled workman respectively. The "right to work" at his own trade in his own way is one which, for the skilled workman, it is practically impossible to recognise. On the other hand, it is conceivable that he should, with a little assistance, make provision for himself by insurance against bad times. In fact, he does so already in many of the trade unions, and the trouble in his case arises very largely from the fact that union funds have proved inadequate to grapple with the whole expense. It is here that methods will have to be thought out of bringing national assistance to bear, and such assistance will cost money. On the other side, the unskilled workman is never able to provide adequately for seasons of depression. But his capacity is sufficiently unspecialised to make it possible to find him work, provided that any form of useful employment can be discovered which may, without prejudice to its efficiency, be increased or diminished as the fluctuations of the labor market require. That such employment may be found on a small scale in national afforestation has long been urged by a few social reformers, and their views are now endorsed by the Commission on Afforestation. We shall hope to see at least experimental legislation in this direction. It will be called socialistic. It will cost money, and if sufficiently drastic to be useful, it runs the risk of being thrown out by the Peers. But these conditions are all in the game, and if Ministers decide to play it in this way, they must take the risks.

Life and Letters.

THE GENIUS OF LINCOLN.

Foreigners, from De Tocqueville to Mr. Henry James, have complained of a lack of distinction in American life. So travellers, glutted with the glory of ancient temples and palaces in India, have found China uninteresting, for it contains so few great monuments. The complaint is raised against equality. For the architectural magnificence in India was reared upon forced labor and popular servitude. The distinction of manners and of personality which European visitors miss in America is a survival of feudal status. The imitative culture of the Eastern cities of the States has bowed shamefacedly before the taunt. For every nation has its own snobbishness, and this weak susceptibility to "a certain condescension in foreigners" has been America's. It is not true that Americans are "snobs" in our British manner; the worship even of aspiring American women for rank and social position does not carry the servile deference it carries here; the admiration of the millionaire is rather that of an image than of a personal superior.

But the imported culture standards of America have evoked a peculiar transatlantic snobbishness, which finds its plainest expression in the fact that most educated Americans are ashamed of their own distinctive literary man, Walt Whitman. The same deference to European valuations showed itself in a romantic parade of George Washington and "the fathers," and the craving for a national fame through war and empire, which even now is finding expression in the demand for a big navy and a world policy. Washington was certainly a great man, he was also a great Virginian, but he was not a great American in the sense of representing the life and spirit of the American experiment. The really representative American was he whose hundredth birthday is commemorated next week by all men and women capable of knowing in history a great man when they see him, Abraham Lincoln. The greatness of Lincoln was that of a common man raised to a high dimension. The possibility, still more the existence, of such a man is itself a justification of democracy. We do not say that so independent, so natural, so complete a man cannot in older societies come to wield so large a power over the affairs and the minds of men; we can only say he has not done so, amid all the stirring movements of the nineteenth century. For sheer romantic interest of personality and career there is, perhaps, one figure among popular leaders who seems to challenge comparison, that of Garibaldi. But though his personal magic, his practical resourcefulness, his fateful absorption in the passion of a national cause were not less admirable, there was not the same intellect behind all nor the same variety of achievement.

The keynote to such understanding of Lincoln as is possible is simply this fact that he was a common man, had lived a common life, and knew the common people. Once, in a dream, we are told Lincoln saw a great crowd of people and himself passing among them. As he passed he heard a scornful voice call out, "He's a common-looking fellow." "Friend," retorted Lincoln, "the Lord prefers common-looking people; that is why He made so many of them." The existence of this widespread commonalty explains the rarity of personal eminence in America. There has been and still remains a higher general level of personality than in any European country, and the degree of eminence is correspondingly reduced. It is just because America has stood for opportunity that conspicuous individuals have been rare. Strong personality has not been rare; abundance of it has built up silently into the rising fabric of the American Commonwealth, pioneers, roadmakers, traders, lawyers, soldiers, teachers, toiling terribly over the material and moral foundations of the country, few of whose names have emerged or survived. Lincoln was of this stock, was reared among these rude energetic folk, had lived all those sorts of lives. He was no "sport"; his career is a triumphant refutation of the traditional views of genius. He had no special gift or quality to distinguish him; he was simply the best type of American at a historic juncture when the national safety wanted such a man. The confidence which all Americans express that their country will be equal to any emergency which threatens it is not so entirely superstitious as it seems at first sight. For the career of Lincoln shows how it has been done in a country where the "necessary man" can be drawn not from a few leading families, or an educated class, but from the millions. Born in a log-cabin of a frontier camp, rail-splitter and farm lad in his early teens, roaming with his nomad father over the newly opening West, inured to labor, sport, and fight of wits and fists from boyhood, trader and boatman down the Mississippi, storekeeper, road-surveyor, soldier, bar-tender, when he began to settle down to law and politics in Illinois at twenty-one he had already gathered into his personality a wider knowledge of the real life of a people than it is possible for the product of Eton and Oxford in this country, or of the most efficient pedagogy of Germany, to furnish for the service of the State. Lincoln "had not any education to speak of." Fond biographers tell how his early reading consisted in Shakespeare, the Bible, Æsop, Bunyan, and other great books, to which a profound influence is attributed. But this belongs to biographical hypocrisy. Abraham Lincoln, though fond at times of reading, owed little to books, and would have gained little, if he had not lost, from the best literary education of his time and country. For an inquisitive mind, with a Shakespearean power of assimilation, this early wandering life, with its direct knowledge of all kinds of people and of work, filled with incessant talk and streaks of love-making and physical adventure among unsophisticated, hard-living men and women, was an incomparably good nourishment. This method he kept up through all his early political career, as he "rode the circuit" or "took the stump" for some election. In a democracy what is pre-eminently wanted for a man who is to "save the people" is well-grounded confidence, in himself, in the people, and in his power to do what is wanted. So it was that when the great issue of slavery was moving swiftly towards open rebellion, a certain miraculous stroke of popular perspicacity saw and demanded Lincoln. For the conditions of a society which made it possible for an obscure small country lawyer-politician to enter the lists with so renowned an antagonist as Douglas, to arouse a swiftly-expanding recognition of his powers, and to force himself untried to the helm of the State, were not fortuitous, but of the very substance of American democracy. Lincoln was truly the choice of the wisdom of the mass, recognising the hazard of the situation and the need, not for an Eastern wire-puller or a statesman from the Harvard law school, but for a man of the people.

Lincoln's own wisdom, simple, compact, original, and pertinent, and not any of the ordinary qualities which are attached to the term demagogue, gave him his hold upon the popular will, at a time when every intrigue which the malignity of enemies and the jealousy of political associates could devise was directed to his overthrow. Strong enough in will to indulge smaller weaknesses both in himself and others, he was able to withstand the secret general hostility which saps the power of an Aristides. He suffered not only fools, but even rogues, gladly. For he had that humor which even in its lighter qualities is essential to sympathy with the people. Like every "good American," he could jest at the rudest blows of fortune, and at the evils he most reprobated. Harassed incessantly in the opening days of his administration by the selfish clamor of impudent office-seekers, he could pause to lay his hand on the shoulder of an acquaintance who was passing in the White House corridor to say, "You haven't got such a thing as a postmaster in your pocket, have you?" —— stared at him in astonishment, as if suspecting a sudden attack of insanity. Then Lincoln went on: "You see, it seems to me kind of unnatural that you shouldn't have at least a postmaster in your pocket. Everybody I've seen for days past has had foreign ministers and collectors, and all kinds, and I thought you couldn't have got in here without having at least a postmaster get into your pocket."

His supreme greatness as statesman and as man is, of course, tested by the iron rod of single purpose with which he set himself to the policy of saving the Union, and for which he relentlessly kept under all other objects, even the suppression of the slavery he loathed. "My paramount object in this struggle is to save the Union, and is not either to save or to destroy slavery. If I could save the Union without freeing any slaves, I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing all the slaves, I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing some and leaving others alone, I would also do that." To pursue an inevitable war with just the maximum of humanity circumstances would permit, to stifle the passion of abolition until the time was fully ripe and the Union was safe, to steer a devious path of necessary opportunism through years of unceasing and unforeseen crises, when the cauldron of human passions kept boiling up towards anarchy, such an achievement of the indomitable will of man has not before been witnessed.

A fiercer light beats upon such a man than upon any throne, and exhibits many flaws and deficiencies. His was no tight-spun efficiency or immaculate morality. His long, awkward, loose figure was characteristic of the man. "He always loafed a little," one of his most intelligent biographers informs us. Probably he would have endorsed Lamb's saying, "It is good sometimes to take an airing outside the strict diocese of the conscience," as a maxim of practical utility. But no man capable of such a burden as he bore could be a light-hearted or light-living man, and no little part of the fascination of his influence is due to what those who write of him, for lack of a better term, call his mysticism, or some dark, impenetrable undercurrent of his life, perhaps deriving from the puritanic inheritance re-formed under the early solitude and struggles with the untamed powers of nature in his childhood. Whatever its source, this tragic background of melancholy always remained a softening and a healing influence in his dealing with his fellow-men; it neither weakened the exuberance of his sympathy nor marred his steadiness of judgment.

Though the representative American even of this generation has shifted from the type of Lincoln, he stands, and long will stand, as the most effective personality which democracy has yet produced, testifying in his own manhood, as in his own words at Gettysberg, to the meaning of the American Commonwealth, the resolve "that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth." The restoration of such government is surely the great duty which the American people of to-day owes to itself, to the world, and to Abraham Lincoln, as his rightful monument.

THE CHILD OF THE YELLOW PRESS.

In the slack season before Parliament opens, and with a view to the pushing forward of a policy, the "Yellow Press" has been booming "An Englishman's Home." All London is fighting to get into the theatre. At last, we are told, there is presented the unanswerable arguments for conscription. Employees rush straight from the play full into the arms of the recruiting sergeants of the Territorial Army. Other vigorous patriots promise sums of money to a fund for the performance of the drama in every village in England. The performance—as drama—is criticised in another column. It may be good that a clever combination of farce and tragedy, competently acted, should thus receive its reward. It would be good, also—if the play were not so obviously dangerous in subject and treatment—that something which, if not real life, is at least more nearly approaching it than the "eternal triangular duel" should score a success at a London theatre. The irony of it all is probably unnoticed by the applauding public. To some it may well appear as an anti-German manifesto, to others as a condemnation of the civilian by the volunteers, to others again as a condemnation of the volunteers by the regulars. Deeper than all or any of these is the condemnation of the typical child of the modern sensational newspaper.

For what is the obvious plea against the verdict of "guilty" pronounced against "Geoff. Brown," the Cockney Cad, and "Reggie Brown," the studious Limerick hunter? The only thing needed for the completion of the play would be the labelling of each of these types with placards entitled "the Harmsworth Brand." "We have been nourished," they might say, "in sheer self-defence in this unreal world of impudence, nonsense, vacuous sport and gambling. We began with our boys' papers and guessing competitions. We were insensibly led on to efforts after a pound a week for life by estimating the money in the Bank of England on a certain day, or amassing gain in hundreds of pounds for guessing missing words or the last line of 'Limericks.' On Sunday, committed by our austere parents to some such drivel as the 'Sunday Companion,' we found there the same cheery game smeared with a grease of piety; rewards and prizes here for guessing anagrams and acrostics representing Kings and Queens of Israel. We were led on to talk and read and chatter about 'sports' in columns about various football heroes, in descriptive reports of football matches, ever deepening in imbecility until they became the image of the lunatic asylum; the stuff that 'Geoff.' Brown reads out to the family about 'netting the muddied orange' and the ubiquitous spheroid, 'impelling the pill between the uprights.' Our thought and growing interest were sedulously directed away from consideration of any rational or serious universe. We were exhorted to demonstrate patriotism by 'mafficking' and informed that when, like 'Geoff.,' we fell into the fountain at Trafalgar Square and subsequently embraced a policeman we were performing a virtuous action." Suddenly into this world of foolishness and frivolity there intrudes some grim reality. It happens to be, in this particular case, an impossible foreign invasion. It might equally have been, as Mr. Wells has exhibited, Martians descended from the clouds, or a war in the air, or social upheaval from below, or the coming of a kindly comet from above to sweep the whole affair away. This slight world pales before the challenge of real things like the daylight judging and condemning a scene of a night's orgie. "Geoff." disappears before a welcome bullet while he is mouthing his fantastic humors. "Reggie," the Limerick hunter, departs to find a lodging with "Aunt Emily," taking with him, actually on the stage, those yellow-covered Harmsworth publications which have made him what he is. "These may come in useful," he declares, as he returns to rescue them from the crumbling ruins of his home. "This short, slender, pale man," says M. Hanotaux of Taine in 1870, "munching his throat lozenges, with squinting grey eyes behind his thick glasses, had at last seen things which astonished him—dying men, flowing blood, burning cities." Dying men, flowing blood, and burning fires intrude suddenly into "Harmsworth Villa." And the thing is revealed in its stupidity and impotence at a crisis; as it is being revealed—to the discerning mind—by the judgment of every hour.

And to-day the "yellow press," either seriously or in its customary indifference, turns against the monster of its creation: lectures and scolds him because he has not resisted its allurements of sporting gossip and ingenious gambling, and become absorbed in the work of national defence. This is merely in line with a policy which will exploit its own ignominies as readily as its own excellences. The "Daily Mail," when brought to justice for its attack on the soapmakers, printed the legal revelations at length, advertised them on headlines and placards, revealed itself as eating dirt and charging for admission to the spectacle. It is all "news," and, therefore, "stuff" to a syndicate organised on the principle that a newspaper serves the public with what it wants, and that the edition of to-morrow need never be ashamed of the edition of yesterday. In the "Daily Mirror," one day this week, the irony was almost defiant. In a double page of illustrations, on the one side were photographs of the "Englishman's Home," showing the products of spectacular sport and silly gambling falling amid their falling houses: on the other a negro on a raised platform pummelling an American, with tier upon tier of white blobs of faces—the Australian spectators—gazing with fierce approval. The reader passes—in such publications—from one frivolity to another. Now it is "Miss Charlesworth" on the music-hall stage, now the principal characters in some "sensational" divorce case, now a serial story in which the "bounder" expands himself, and is triumphant in an unreal world. In the midst of all comes an appeal which, if it were to excite even a limited response, would sweep all this nonsense away, and land in bankruptcy the vast apparatus of newspapers which exploit and encourage the hunger of the city-bred crowd.

The reply to such accusation would probably affirm that the charge was just but was a condemnation not of the supply but of the demand. The public wants guessing competitions, and football "slop," and so the public are supplied—on a strictly business footing. If the public wanted military intelligence, or articles on scouting and surgery, the syndicate would supply such alternatives with equal readiness. This attitude is not only in itself evil, it is a worse evil than if the attempt at corruption were part of a definite policy. This careless dismissal of responsibility for choice, selection, or guidance in the world of newspapers or journals is more menacing in its results than if the choice had been deliberate, and all its consequences faced. It is idle to affirm that here the public merely influence the papers, and not the papers the public. The work of corruption, for example—the word is not too violent—in the matter of frivolous gambling competitions, is a systematic whole, beginning with the papers designed for boys and children. From absorption in these, with occasional rewards of five or ten shillings, a box of paints, or a bicycle, the growing youth passes to the Limerick, the picture puzzle, and the missing-word competition. At the end this newspaper world becomes—to its victims—an epitome and mirror of the whole world. Divorced from the ancient sanities of manual or skilful labor, of exercise in the open air, absorbed for the bulk of his day in crowded offices adding small sums or writing letters, each a unit in a crowd which has drifted away from the realities of life in a complex, artificial city civilisation, he comes to see no other universe than this—the rejoicing over hired sportsmen who play before him, the ingenuities of sedentary guessing competitions, the huge frivolity and ignorance of the world of the music hall and the yellow newspaper. Having attained so dolorous a consummation, perhaps the best that can be hoped for him is the advent of that friendly bullet which will terminate his inglorious life. And as to this victim the next day his own newspapers, the high priests of his religion, will draw (as in one illustration this week of the death of "Geoff." Brown) the outline of the body in various positions as it falls, rejoice over his death, and shamelessly gird at him for being what he is—the faithfullest of worshippers at their shrine.

All of which is vehemently applauded by the "stalls"; by that luxurious and ease-loving society which is indignant with the lower classes for not offering themselves for conscription to defend their native land. The question whether they are being offered anything worth defending never crosses their minds, or is dismissed as tiresome. There was a sudden flash of it, however, in the play, when "Geoff." Brown turns for a moment to confront the advocate of "Bobs" and his policy with the reality of his own existence. Ten hours a day in a cellar office, looking at a dirty piece of blotting-paper, is aggravated by the spectacle of an advertisement opposite "Cheap trips to the land of the Midnight Sun." "Why shouldn't I do what I like?" he asks, defiantly, "in what time out of such an existence I can call my own?" Time and again various organisations of rich men have endeavored to explain that the disinherited populations should be pressing into enlistment, in order that those who have a stake in the country may sleep o' nights in safety, undeterred by fears of foreign invasion. Time and again the disinherited have exhibited a reluctance to respond to such an appeal. The great military Powers abroad can bear the immense burden of their military power because it ultimately rests on the back of the peasant proprietor; on the three million freeholders, for example, who beyond the Channel can interpret defence of France as defence of that tiny plot of ground and cottage which each can indubitably call his own. But our people have been swept from the land into the cities, until now whole square miles of the countryside are lying waste and empty, the abode of sport and pleasure instead of the breeding-place of men. These great territorial magnates, owning the land of England, are amongst the most clamorous for the "press gang" of conscription to be applied to landless laborers, who work for weekly wages in the country of which they cannot call a rood their own, in dwellings from which they can be dispossessed at the will of the owner; and to the city multitudes to whom "England" means the daily excursion, on some Bank Holiday, outside the encompassing labyrinth of the town. Their seriousness and disinterested enthusiasm would be more conspicuous if they were found accepting obligation; if, for example, they were offering freehold plots of property to all the young laborers who in return would enter the Territorial Army. Lacking such effective guarantees, the clamor appears as little but the selfishness of one class girding at the supposed selfishness of another; those who possess and enjoy filled with contempt because those who shamble through uncertain occupation in mean streets are not manifestly eager to defend property in which they have no lot or share. If conscription involved a real advance towards a social equality, especially in the ownership of land, its advocates would speedily decline in numbers and in position, just as "Imperialism" becomes a tremulous faith when it is interpreted as involving, not enrichment of every wife's husband, but some monetary sacrifice for the welfare of the poor. It is doubtful if even the Browns' household, with its absurdities and vulgarities and limitations, does not, after all, judge and condemn a far more dangerous ignorance and complacency. A theatre full of wealthy Geoffrey and Reggie Browns every night expresses its contempt for the Geoffrey and Reggie Browns of the middle classes and its disgust that the lower class Brown will not sacrifice his leisure and wages in order that they may continue their enjoyments undisturbed. In the smoking-room of Wyndham's Theatre there were young men using the same language and exhibiting the same character as the young cockney on the stage, with complete ignorance of the fact that the author was satirising not indeed them, but the poor unlettered imitation of their lives—the lives which, so far as the satire of "The Englishman's Home" is true and direct, are responsible for the kind of England whose ruin its author foretells.

ON ARTS AND MYSTERIES.

It recently fell to the writer's lot to read with some children, by way of a French lesson, a passage describing the various shops in the street of a country town. One could not help reflecting on the number of arts and mysteries which to-day for all practical purposes have vanished from the world, and how the reign of machinery has impoverished not only language, but life itself, for the people of this latter time. We could translate the craftsmen's names in our French lesson, but many of the words called up no sensible image, brought nothing definite and concrete to our minds. A "serrurier" is, of course, a "locksmith," but who nowadays has ever seen a locksmith at work? A "glover" is even to us as a "gantier," that is, a word of which we know the bare meaning, but of which our minds have no immediate apprehension. One told them that a "teinturier" was a "dyer"; but the word left them blank. For them "the dyer" was not a picturesque figure, kindly or churlish, at the corner of the street. The teacher had to make a mental effort to realise that the art was an operation carried on at the Perth Dye Works. Yet the dyer was for centuries a familiar figure everywhere, and the name is a common surname in all European tongues. "Tintoretto," the name of the glorious Venetian, is, of course, "the little dyer." St. Catherine of Siena's father was a "tintore." The boy Shakespeare, whose keen eyes took in everything, must often have watched the dyer at work:—

"My nature is subdued
To what it works in, like a dyer's hand," he afterwards wrote. But the dyer is now the shadow of a name; he has gone from the world; he is no more watched by the big eyes of curious children as he cleans a piece of velvet over a pan of charcoal.

To see things made, to watch the shapeless material being fashioned by the craftsman into some thing of beauty and familiar use, is always a delight to children. Especially it would seem to have formed part of the education of the old-time poets as they learned their craft and mystery. How they delighted in the names of common things, the carpenter's tools, the different parts of the rigging of a ship! Dante, Shakespeare, the old ballads, are full of these things. The craftsmen themselves are figures that continually appear in the literature of the Middle Ages:—

"Daughter, it's the carpenter.
Mending planks upon the stair."

This is a great note of "romantic" art and literature. One of the first fruits of the Romantic Movement was the recovery of all this lost inheritance, after the unutterable dreariness of classicism, untouched by any sound of the real living world, or breath of the wholesome air of every day. The Romantic writers had only to write as the people were talking all around them. However colorless the literary vocabulary might have become, the popular speech had never done so. The people, always working at their trades, and seeing other craftsmen at work, making and mending and adorning all sorts of things, tailors and carpenters, blacksmiths and whitesmiths, cobblers and scissor grinders, drew as many images and similes from these things as Dante himself. At the present day the word "whitesmith," for instance, is a shadow without substance. The process goes on, and more and more things are made and done by who knows what inhuman machines, by what dreary "appliances," in what barrack factories and deadly "works." Things come to us from distant impersonal "stores." We live in a world of the "ready made." The writer here lays down his pen and glances at to-day's "Times." The first thing his eye lights upon is a really jubilant half-column headed "The Passing of the Lamplighter." The writer says: "The old method of lighting and extinguishing street lamps by hand is at best a crude method of doing the work, and compares very unfavorably with the ease of manipulation which characterises electric light. Many attempts have from time to time been made to dispense with the lamplighter, but he remains a familiar figure in our streets. . . . An apparatus invented by Dr. Rostin at last promises to attain the object." He discusses another method which would only secure the partial, not the total abolition of the lamplighter, nothing less than which will content him. "Delenda est Carthago." He ends by prophesying—alas! probably only too truly—the speedy and universal adoption of the Rostin method. Once again an apparatus is to be substituted for a person. It is difficult to imagine the state of mind which finds this matter for rejoicing. This is the way to rob the common life of all interest and variety and romance, and one would imagine, to diffuse among the mass of the people a general imbecility. One remembers one's own childhood, the eager watching for the advent of the figure with the long pole, and the appearance of the twinkling spark at the top of the lamp-post, and one thinks of Stevenson's poem about the child who would not go to bed till he had seen the lamplighter on his rounds:—

"Oh! Leary, see a little child and nod to him to-night."

Twentieth century children will have no such things to remember.

The kings of all craftsmen who ever worked were no doubt the great painters who painted sacred pictures for the whole people in the age and atmosphere of faith.

"Hans Memmeling and Jan Van Eyck
Keep state at Bruges. In sore shame
I scanned the works that bear their name," cried the poet painter of a far other day. One can, indeed imagine no worthier human happiness, no nobler human destiny, than to have been the painter of "St. Ursula," or the "Adoration of the Lamb."

The Russian icon-maker is a sacred craftsman, far below these great creative heights indeed, who still lives and works at this very day. He paints the Saints by an immutable tradition, which prescribes what every detail of their gesture and dress must be. For instance, in pictures of the Council of Nicea, St. Nicholas of Myra must be painted without his mitre, because at that assembly he struck Arius in the face. A bishop must be "no striker," St. Paul tells us. In old England the sign-painter was often literally a painter of sacred pictures. In the sign of the "Crispin and Crispinian," at Strood, after at least five centuries, the holy Martyrs of Soissons may still be dimly seen, cutting leather and clouting shoes.

Two métiers, above all, belong to the world of romance, those of the miller and the blacksmith. These are personages of Grimm and Hans Andersen, of folk-tales, fairy tales, nursery rhymes, of ballad poetry and saintly legend. One thinks of the Marquis of Carabas, of St. Dunstan and St. Eloi. It is hard to say which is the most delightful sight, a windmill turning in the brisk March morning, or the glow of a blacksmith's forge, as the children are coming out of school, at twilight in the village street. Small boys delight to see the bellows plied, and the fire leap into clear rejoicing flame, to see the shower of sparks fly up from the hot iron, to assist at the mysteries of the shoeing of a horse. The farrier's quick ear tells by the first hint of a difference in the sound if he is driving the nail beyond the hoof; if so, he draws it out at once, and slightly bends the point. Horses, at any rate, must always be shod on the spot. But the miller, as our fathers knew him, is passing from us. One almost never sees a windmill turning. They stand up in the landscape, gaunt and dead. One thinks of the time when they were alive, of the great circles of the sails,

"The meal sacks on the whitened floor,
The dark round of the dripping wheel,
The very air about the door
Made misty with the floating meal."

The English language is full of proverbs like "bringing grist to the mill," coming from these brisk and cheery things.

The cobbler is another figure who plays a great part in folk-lore and nursery rhymes:—

"Cobbler, cobbler, mend my shoe, Get it done by half-past two."

our old rhyme runs, and the words are accompanied by the gesture of the long drawing out of the needle and thread. The sabotier, the wandering maker of sabots, may still be seen in Brittany. In a wood outside the town he "chooses a tree," like the idol-maker in the Bible, he cuts it down, and as he converts it into wooden shoes, he sings at his work.

All these things belong to a time when work was human and personal. In those days nothing was mechanical, everything was humanised and personified.

This is seen in the old-time technical names of things which still survive in various trades. For instance, in the roof, say, of a barn, the support under the ridge which connects the collar-beam with the tie-beam, if it is in the centre, is called by builders a "king post." If there are two posts, one at each side, they are "queen posts." The smaller additional supports, if they are attendant upon a "king," are called "princes," if upon a "queen," "princesses." This is the touch of poetry, the play of fancy that fades from the world to-day. The age of machines and appliances, of factories and stores, robs the worker of pleasure in his work, and hides reality and truth from the eyes of numbers who not only never make anything themselves, but have no notion how the things they use are made. "I am going to get the carpenter to make a garden seat to put here," said a friend of the writer to a lady as they paced the walk together. "Oh! does the carpenter make garden seats?" was the reply. "I thought they came up from the stores."

"THE CLANGING ROOKERY."

Nut Hill, across the thirty-acre piece, has a rosy outline against the western sky. The century-withered oak is sharply silhouetted in all its fingers, and up from behind it comes the first rook of the string, that any evening this winter has come that way from the great fallows to their roosting-place in the woods. We think with Tennyson that it must be "the many-wintered crow that leads the clanging rookery home." But it is not yet home that he leads them, and his string is proportionately silent—until the roosting-place is reached, and the business of settling down for the night begins.

The string passes morning and evening within a hundred yards of the group of elms that holds the nests of last year, and frequently, both at morning and at evening, the rooks pay a visit to see that their summer habitation is properly weathering the storms. To-night, as in the golden glow of the sun's promise they approach the rookery, the troop, not excluding the many-wintered one, yields to the exciting suggestion it arouses, in a frenzy of "break-necking." As they pass, high up, a bird towards the rear suddenly dives towards earth, as if shot, then, two hundred feet lower, retrims his wings, and allows the impetus to slide him up again. Meanwhile, nearly a dozen of his companions have followed his example, and the air is full of downward darting, upward gliding rooks, and with the excited clamor that accompanies the manœuvre. "Means rain," says the gardener, who cannot resist standing to watch the performance he has witnessed annually for over sixty years. It may, for the rooks' resting-time falls in the time of the equinoctial gales, and "break-necking" means nesting.

Already the morning inspection of last summer's nests has become a little more than mere noting. A stick here and there has been readjusted, or just taken hold of and released, as we take up and put down again a garden tool that we encounter while the garden is in the hands of winter. Very soon, the ground beneath the nests will be littered with newly broken sticks, the peaceful "caw, caw," will be showered again on the house as though descending on the sun-beams, the slightly more agitated bickerings will be heard of rooks protesting against the rape of their tie-beams by lazier nest-builders, and all the comedies and the tragedies of the rookery, as far as we can understand them, will be re-enacted for our benefit.

The rooks will come again, of course, to our elms. There are other and more eligible trees. A neighbor has an ideal thin line of tall oak, into which he is taking pains to attract a rookery. He has woven baskets of green twigs, as much like rooks' nests as he can make them, and has fixed them in the tops of the trees, and this year he has filled them with waggon grease, and has watched the rooks with pleasure come and help themselves to the questionable dainty. It is a plan that has certainly succeeded before, and if some of the rooks that have roosted this winter with ours in the wood have been made homeless by the timber merchant, our neighbor may now get a "black republic" in his oaks. Though it is a question of a whole colony or none, we do not fear for our rooks. It is rarely that they change their quarters, except under dire compulsion, and when they seem to do so we give them credit for seeing some grave reason not apparent to us. No one suggests that the fact that their young are shot in May is a reason, and many go so far as to say that if this annual battue is omitted, the rooks will protest, as though on Malthusian grounds, by moving to livelier quarters. A feeble rookery has before now been driven away by a pair of crows taking too frequent toll of their eggs or young, and we do not doubt that great colonies have sometimes seen fit to move because a new style of agriculture has deprived them of their forage.

The habits of the rook have always been, and will always be, a subject of great interest to man, especially as they are wrapped in a mystery that we can never hope entirely to pierce. The gardener believes and is not alone in the belief, that the rook has become the wisest and most conventional of birds, because he has always lived within sight of human habitation. But the whole crow tribe, to which he belongs, is a wise one, and most of them are exceedingly chary, in this country, of coming near mankind. It is not so with the crows of India, or with the hooded crow when at home in Norway, where they hang closely about the house, and pick up, together with material trifles, doubtless many shreds of human wisdom. The crow wisdom, in which the rook excels, is an almost uncanny development of communalism. Two crows going through a hostile country give a very good exhibition of the art of scouting, while an army of rooks has always been noticeable for the careful way in which it sets sentinels. The sentinel who starves in a tree, while his fellows are engaged in loot, is a fine exhibition of unselfishness for the common cause. If sometimes he swoops down without waiting to be relieved, have there not been also human sentinels who have deserted their post? The reflection leads us up to those old stories still told of corvine courts martial, wherein defaulting sentinels and others are said to have been condemned and solemnly executed. They are possibly all myths, though we live in secret hope of some day seeing them authentically verified. But the undoubted things about rooks are, after all, interesting enough.

The social practice of the rooks has by no means eradicated their individual vices. The strong arm of the law, if there be such, is powerless to prevent one rook from pilfering in the openest fashion from the unguarded nest of another, so that during the building season there is almost always one rook guarding every nest, while another fetches the material. The grand offence against the community is to build in a tree, however near, that is not considered to be within the city boundary. Now, as in the days of Gilbert White, such a nest is "plundered and demolished at once." White also told us that some unfortunate young pairs are not allowed to build anywhere, till the rest have finished. "As soon as they get a few sticks together a party comes and demolishes the whole." Our own observation of these more or less corporate proceedings leads us to liken them to nothing so much as to one of those "rags" that periodically mark the annals of Army, University, or public school. The original rook attracts the attention of some self-constituted band of confederates, and the community is too little sympathetic to interfere in the individual's behalf. Let us hope that "rag" justice is somehow leading the rook towards some higher plane of civilisation.

It is not so much the bird's crimes against his fellows as his offences against mankind that concern the gardener. The rook has received the name of frugilegus, or fruit collector. We know how worthy the name is when the walnuts are a little beyond the pickling stage. Then a frequent joy with him is to take an acorn or other handy object, and play ball with it, dropping it for another to dive after it headlong, and become the dropper in turn. And a careful and apparently conscientious observer startled the world the other day with the theory that in spring, rooks use small seed potatoes as gauges wherewith to get the dimensions of their nests right, choosing the tubers according to their memory of what an egg is, and then throwing them away with the rejected sticks that lie beneath their nesting-trees. Those potatoes, like the trials by jury, are something for the curious and not too sceptical, to look for.

We do not value the rook for his fruit-collecting qualities, but his Latin name appeals vaguely to us as a shield of virtue. We expect him to collect wire worms and other grubs, that we sometimes fail to recognise as a carnal diet. And now we are finding, as though it were a new fact, that the rook is so crow-like as to like eggs and young birds, and seems to know no difference between the offspring of the blackbird and the pheasant. The story even comes from Scotland that this new (?) carnivorous habit has given many rooks there the black whiskers that belong to the carrion crow, and that, generally, the rook is falling under the vices that characterise the villainous corbie. In so far as egg-stealing is a new habit, it comes of increased opportunities in the way of a flesh diet, and increased restriction of the supply of lesser life that arable fields afford. While agriculture wanes, a passing phase we truly hope, the rook is not of the supreme importance he once was. But we hope the country will long hold those whose æsthetic joy in him overwhelms the annoyance caused by his occasional departure from usefulness.

Present-Day Problems.

OXFORD AND THE PEOPLE.

We live in an age when it is becoming increasingly difficult, without conscious and deliberate thought, to believe in Democracy. In spite of the successes of the democratic idea among Eastern nations, for whom for generations we believed it had no message, our leaders, who have touched, and tasted, and handled it, are perplexed and disillusioned. One veteran Liberal teacher, thinking aloud in the House of Lords, shakes his head over these very successes. Others point to difficulties undreamt of by the confident idealists of half a century ago. The consistent and rational elector of the Benthamite school has become a frivolous and excitable "man in the street," who dissolves the deepest issues into frivolities, and is responsive, too often without knowing it, to the temper and suggestions of a sensational Press. English class distinctions, always the stoutest barriers against the democratic idea, have been accentuated by the increasing segregation of men of different classes and occupations into separate cities or suburbs and quarters of cities. Above all, those who are impressed—as Socialists and men of science are alike impressed—with "the belief that social arrangements can be transformed by means of conscious and deliberate contrivance," and with the urgent need of carrying this belief into action, are dismayed at the untrustworthiness of the weapon which Democracy sets in their hands. The people are discontented, and desire a change. But they have no open vision, and cannot tell a false prophet from a true. And Science asks from them what it rarely obtains from less heavily burdened spirits—a combination of moral earnestness and intellectual concentration, without the promise and inspiration of revolutionary change. It is no wonder that some of our more daring thinkers, alike among scientists and socialists, have grown impatient of the slow stumbling march of the democratic host, and have encamped with the aristocrats or the bureaucrats under the banner of efficiency.

Yet those to whom Liberalism is more than a programme and Democracy more than a system of Government, who feel that the creed of our grandfathers, however crudely expressed in the formulae of a narrow philosophy, gave utterance to some of the deepest elements in man's nature, can never rest satisfied with such a solution. To them one of the leading tasks of the new century must be to bring about, not merely a reconciliation, but an alliance, permanent, heartfelt, and fruitful of good, between Science and Democracy, between the movement towards greater social equality and the new conception of intellectual duty that inspires modern students and thinkers.

There is only one place in the community where such an alliance can be effected, and that place is the University. For the University—in England at any rate—has preserved throughout the centuries—in however attenuated a form—the double ideal of its medieval founders, the association of comrades in the pursuit of knowledge. This ideal, so familiar to the medieval world, when both knowledge and fellowship were confined, and thus intensified, within the limits of a great ecclesiastical corporation, has maintained itself with difficulty in the chaos of modern life. Continental Universities serve knowledge with devotion and insight; but their specialised Faculties have displaced the common culture of the humanities, and their students, living in lodgings, are never fully initiated into the fellowship of corporate life. But in England the college has always outshone the University, and "Fellow" has always seemed a title more enviable than "Professor." The industrial revolution, which passed like a blizzard over so many corporate relationships in English life, has left the college system almost untouched. Seen from the inside (not from the windows of a West End club) Oxford and Cambridge are among the most democratic places in England, and the newer Universities are open to the same influences. We need only broaden the basis and extend the range of a time-honored University system, so as to adapt it to the new democracy. For the democratic educational movement of to-day is not individualist; it does not seek, through free competition, to lift men out of their class, nor to enable them (in the words of the old-fashioned Radical who muses in "Blackwood") "to purchase education as they may purchase boots and hats." It desires rather to dignify and enrich the life of the working class itself, and to teach it to play its rightful part, with responsibility and honor, in the complex work of the modern State.

Viewed in this light, as a practical attempt to promote this alliance between Science and Democracy, the interesting report recently issued* on Oxford and working-class education, may fairly be regarded as of epoch-making importance. It deals, it is true, with only a small portion of the field—with the higher education of adult workpeople. It does not touch the burning question of the admission of students from the public secondary schools. It does not touch (except indirectly) the question of degrees for women. And it leaves on one side the whole group of pressing financial and administrative problems, from the raising and spending of college revenues to the composition of the chief legislative body, over which the efforts of the reformers were vainly expended the other day. But no one who reads the Report with care, and notes the scope and spirit of its recommendations, will doubt that it is destined to have indirect effects over the whole field of University reform. It may even pave the way, both by the combination of interests which it represents and its careful handling of a broad and difficult question, for that Royal Commission for which so much work has been accumulating during the last generation.

The Report is the work of a Joint Committee of University and working-class representatives, seven on each side, headed by the Dean of Christ Church, with Mr. Shackleton as Vice-Chairman. The working-class representatives were appointed by the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Union Congress, the National Conference of Friendly Societies, the Educational Committee of the Trades Union Congress, and the Workers' Educational Association. This last is a body which, since its foundation by a group of workpeople six years ago, has secured the affiliation of over a thousand working-class and educational associations throughout the country, and which, not only by its constitution, but by the spirit diffused among its members (as all who have come under its influence will testify), is truly representative of working-class educational ideals, and of the spirit of comradeship in which they are pursued. The University representatives were nominated by the Vice-Chancellor of the University of Oxford, in response to a resolution passed at a conference convened by the Workers' Educational Association in August, 1907. The Report is unanimous; its recommendations had already been accepted in part by the University before it was issued to the world, and the new scheme of study which it advocates has since the New Year been in full working order in eight working-class centres.

Broadly speaking, the object of the Committee is to democratise and deepen, to endow from permanent sources, and adapt to the use of workpeople with small leisure, the work of the University extension and working-class educational movements, and to bring them, both through the students and the teachers, into closer contact with Oxford itself. Under its scheme work is done through classes of not more than thirty students (women as well as men), who pursue a course of study over a period of not less than two (generally three) years, with fortnightly essays. A certificate, awarded on the work done in them, will entitle the student to enter upon a diploma course at Oxford. Thus the class teacher will be enabled to be in close touch with his students, and can give them something of the stimulus and guidance which are so marked a feature of the tutorial system at Oxford and Cambridge at its best. Anyone who has attended one of these "tutorial classes," in one of the Lancashire towns, for instance, marked the keenness of the faces during the hour's lecture, and enjoyed the keen thrust and parry of the hour's discussion that follows—as keen as that at a hecklers' meeting, though concerned with subjects so "useless" as the Elizabethan Poor Law or the Mercantile system—will come away feeling that here is a true University outpost, and perhaps a little ashamed (if he has ever lectured in a University) of the decorous languor of certain lecture-rooms nearer home. Where a body of keen students is gathered together, there, in the good medieval sense, is a University, and in the North at least this moving University is apt to adjourn from the lecture-room to the club, and spread itself out, in the familiar college manner, over the best part of a conversational evening. The latest reports to the Oxford Committee speak of over 200 students at work, and cry out for one thing only—books, more books. For books for University students are expensive; free libraries do not stock them, and the Workers' Educational Association, which has pledged itself to satisfy, and is satisfying, the appetite it has stimulated, cannot undertake indefinite liabilities.

The work at Oxford is directed by a Joint Committee, similar in constitution to that which has issued the report. Its creation last autumn marks the first admission of democratic and non-University representatives on to an administrative body at Oxford, "half of which," as the President of Corpus genially complains, "need not be members of the University, but may be members of trade unions." Its establishment marks the admission of an important principle already recognised and acted upon by some of the younger Universities—that the duty of a modern University does not cease with the teaching of resident students, but includes consultation with those best fitted to advise it outside as to educational movements in the country and the needs and desires of new classes of students. In the future, if Oxford sins, as she has sinned in the past, she will no longer sin in ignorance. The curtains of her Common Rooms, that have muffled and distorted so many appeals, have now been pushed aside, and "members of a trade union" have even been seen at High Table. What destiny has in store for this new alliance, sealed in the stronghold of lost causes, between scholar and workman, Time, who loves to blend his colors, alone can show; but at least the future of England and democracy is the brighter for their meeting.

The Drama.

PATRIOTISM, PASSION, AND PUGILISM.

In "An Englishman's Home," at Wyndham's Theatre, an anonymous "Patriot" makes a well-meant effort to allay those fears of invasion which certain generals and journalists have of late been conspiring to foment. The play shows, in the first place, how only an incredible concatenation of accidents could give invaders any chance at all; it shows, in the second place, with what dauntless heroism the invaders are encountered; in the third place, with what rapidity resistance is organised and the enemy sent to the right about. All this is very encouraging; and even if we have at some points to discount our "Patriot's" optimism, we cannot but feel grateful to him for his powerful and plausible sedative to jumpiness and antidote to panic.

He marshals his argument with singular art. It begins, if the expression be permissible, with a brilliant flash of silence: we hear nothing, absolutely nothing, as to how the invading force has eluded the fleet. So far as the action of the play is concerned, the British Navy does not exist. The argument is conducted on the tacit assumption of its impotence. The author "ignores the weight of the elephant." But since the problem works out in our favor, even with the weight of the elephant ignored, how manifestly must it do so with that far from negligible factor thrown in! The "Patriot," in short, declares: "We can give an invader fifty points in a hundred, and yet beat him." But the public well knows that this is a purely hypothetical calculation, and that, in fact, the invader, or would-be invader, could look for no such advantage. Thus, by a master-stroke of what may be called silent rhetoric, the author establishes in the hearer's sub-consciousness an immense reserve fund of security, to be drawn upon if the process of his more explicit argument should at any point seem unconvincing.

Next he sets forth the conditions which render invasion possible—to wit, a general strike of the postal and telegraphic services (why not also of the railways?) and a long continuance of impenetrable fog. It is clear that such an utter paralysis of our means of communication and intelligence—a paralysis which causes a half-penny paper to sell for two shillings in Essex—is in the highest degree improbable. It means something very like a revolution; and the natural inference is that with a revolution, but not till then, the invader's chance will come. As for the fog, I think we must interpret it in a symbolic rather than a literal sense. It so happens that almost at the moment when "An Englishman's Home" was produced I was on board a steamer groping and hooting its way through a dense fog up the estuary of the Thames: and it did not strike me that these were precisely the conditions any sane invader would choose for his landing. The author seems to assume that the fog, which blinds and bewilders England, is transpicuous to the eyes of the foreigner; and as this optical impossibility is represented as a large factor in what little success the invaders achieve, we have here another strong reinforcement to our sense of security.

But it is, after all, the intrepidity of the British character which the "Patriot" chiefly emphasises. Here, I think, he somewhat exaggerates. His most prominent personage is a young man, an auctioneer's clerk, in whom all the characteristics of the Cockney cad are found in high pefection. He is loud, bumptious, impudent, lazy, vulgarly cynical; and his whole soul is absorbed in that form of sport which consists in looking on and yelling while other people play our great national games. He is anything but an agreeable specimen, and he is drawn with unflinching fidelity. Yet when danger comes, is he downhearted? No! Taken prisoner by the invaders, he "cheeks" their commanding officer with magnificent coolness: and when the shells begin to whistle, instead of blenching and cowering, his gallant British heart feels nothing but exhilaration. This he expresses by dancing on a table between a window and a mirror; so that he naturally gets a bullet through his heart. Foolhardy, you say? Yes; but think of the pluck of it! Foolhardiness can always be corrected and reduced to a rational fortitude; it is fool-cowardice that a country has to dread. If the British Mafficker can be trusted to face shrapnel-fire with the spirit of this humble hero, then Britain is safe indeed. But can he? I wish I could share the "Patriot's" confidence. Here, again, a personal experience recurs to me. I was once, by accident, under shell fire for about ten minutes; and I remember how strongly the impulse to take cover was developed by the descending sizzle of the first shell, and with what alacrity I obeyed it. For my own part, then, under the circumstances set forth by our "Patriot," I feel sure that the cellar would have had greater attractions for me than the dining table; and I strongly suspect that Messrs. Geoffrey Smith and Reggie Brown, in the play, would have shared this preference.

Finally, the "Patriot's" confidence in the promptitude and resource of the War Office is most reassuring. Thanks to the strike and the fog, the country is taken utterly by surprise; and we see that, very naturally, the handful of volunteers who first come in touch with the enemy, are rather helpless, bewildered, and uncertain where to turn. But twenty-four hours have barely elapsed before the national resistance is fully organised; we learn that the whole force of the British Army has been interposed between the invaders and London; and, as the curtain falls, we hear the skirl of the pipes (ever the accompaniment of victory) and see the tables turned upon the proud invader. The ringing cheers with which the final tableau is greeted are, in effect, an enthusiastic vote of confidence in Mr. Haldane. They show that the theatrical public, at any rate, has not been misled by the panic-mongers, and unreservedly accepts the patriot playwright's demonstration of the adequacy of our existing system of defence.

Let me now confess that this ironic analysis of "An Englishman's Home" probably does some injustice to the anonymous author. We may take it for granted, I think, that he is not responsible for the touches which finally stultify his argument, and make his play seem to mean precisely the opposite of what he intended. The skirl of the pipes, and the ridiculous final tableau, cannot have formed part of his original intention, but must have been added merely as a spoonful of jam to induce the British public to swallow a rather bitter pill. I suspect interpolation, too, in the part of Captain Lindsay, of the Cumberland Fusiliers, who describes the mobilisation of the British Army on motor 'buses. Some of the faults of logic, on the other hand, are the author's own. The silent elimination of the first line of defence necessarily weakens his case, and so does the emphasis laid on extremely exceptional and improbable circumstances as conditions precedent to invasion.

The plain truth is, however, that, with all its logical weaknesses, inherent and superadded, the play nevertheless serves its intended purpose, and brings home to us, with startling vividness, the folly of over-security. Quite seriously, I conceive the author's design to have been symbolic rather than realistic. He set forth, not to draw a prophetic picture, probable in all its details, but rather to depict and satirise what he rightly or wrongly considers to be a morbid condition of the national mind. It is not fearlessness that Geoffrey Smith exemplifies when he dances on the table, but the invincible stupidity which cannot conceive the existence of danger, the real presence of war. Symbolic, too, is the figure of old Mr. Brown, who in the first act, while the invaders are creeping up to his threshold, gives his whole mind to the study of diabolo; in the second act, sends for the police to turn out his unwelcome guests; and in the third act sacrifices his life to his mad rage, not at the downfall of his country, but at the interruption of his habits and the damage done to his villa residence. The fog, again, is introduced, I imagine, not so much to cloak the movements of the invaders, as to symbolise the bewilderment, and the total lack of light and guidance, with which (in the author's opinion) we should confront such a sudden peril. There is undeniable power and imagination in many scenes of the play. Again and again the shafts of satire go straight to the mark—especially those aimed at the football-cum-music-hall mania of the modern young man and woman. To my thinking, it does not greatly matter whether the actual risk of invasion is or is not exaggerated: the spirit of the play is good, wholesome, commendable. It is not a bellicose or a jingo spirit. The frame of mind which it satirises is not a guarantee of peace, but an invitation to war. Even if our insular inviolability is more real than the author believes it to be, we turn it into a curse rather than a blessing when we make it an excuse for bad citizenship, and for stupid triviality of life and thought.

It should be added that—though the precise moment of production is doubtless unfortunate—the play is tactfully written, and cannot give just offence to any foreign people. The invaders are invaders in the abstract. There is not a word to assign them to any existing Power, nor is there a word of animosity to any nation whatsoever. The conduct of the invading force is absolutely correct and even humane. The shooting of Mr. Brown is inevitable under the laws of war. In brief, there is no vulgar appeal to international malice, hatred, and uncharitableness. The play merely asserts what no one but Count Tolstoy denies—the right and duty of organised defence in the event of invasion.

Mr. Lawrence Grossmith's Geoffrey Smith is a remarkable performance — the irrepressible British bounder on a heroic scale. The cast, for the rest, is uniformly competent, without brilliance. To those who are trying to "boom" the play into a great national event I would venture to offer a word of advice. Now that it is fairly started and thoroughly advertised, they can afford to drop the childish turning of the tables at the end. Let the curtain fall upon the volley which closes the career of Mr. Brown; let that part, when another company is started, be played by an actor with something more than the steady-going adequacy of Mr. Charles Rock; and the piece may score a success indeed. The scene of Mr. Brown's frenzy is a superb opportunity.

I am sorry to have to deal quite briefly with "Olive Latimer's Husband," by Mr. Rudolf Besier. It is a remarkable play, more than confirming the estimate of the author's ability which one formed from "The Virgin Goddess." Mr. Besier has very distinctly the gift of inventing a dramatic complication and developing it in an effective way. He shows, as yet, no great originality in the study of character. In the present play we do not get really into the depths of Olive Latimer's nature—we learn no more of it than is necessary for the conduct of the action. A psychologist would have shown us much more of the subtle workings of her heart than Mr. Besier does. Contrast—though I admit it is scarcely fair to drag in Ibsen—contrast what we know of Olive Latimer with what we know of Rebecca West in "Rosmersholm," whose position is not quite dissimilar. Nevertheless, the character is credible enough so far as it goes, and the inweaving of "plot and passion" is very ingenious and very skilful. Unfortunately, Mr. Besier has been ill-served by his actors. I have seldom seen a play so inadequately presented from first to last. Of Mrs. Patrick Campbell's performance of the leading part I shall only say that it entirely confirmed the impression left by her Deirdre and Electra, that her strength lies in poetical rather than in modern drama. Of the other members of the cast not one—with the possible exception of Mr. Wilfred Draycott—seemed really well chosen or well inspired.

Mr. Shaw's "Admirable Bashville," revived at the Afternoon Theatre (His Majesty's) is most delectable fooling, done with excellent spirit. Nothing infuriates Mr. Shaw so much as the suggestion of any resemblance between his humor and Sir William Gilbert's; but if the satire of "Cashel Byron's Profession" be not Gilbertian, I do not know what is. "I don't think much of my profession," says the Pirate King, "but, contrasted with respectability, it is comparatively honest"; and here we have in a nutshell the philosophy, the social criticism, of "Cashel Byron," and of its dramatic transcript. In the form of the transcript, some people, I see, suspect Mr. Shaw of the intention of satirising Shakespeare. I do not share that suspicion; Mr. Shaw knows perfectly well the distinction between parody and satire. As parody his work is delightful: as satire it never "bites" for a moment. Irresponsible, irresistible fooling—that is the first word and the last respecting "The Admirable Bashville." To me, at any rate, it is irresistible; some people, I gather, resist it with a good deal of success. Miss Marie Löhr is singularly unlike the Lydia Carew of the novel—but what does it matter?—she, too, is irresistible. The rest of the cast are all more or less good; but one missed, in the part of the Policeman, Mr. Aubrey Smith's extremely amusing reproduction of Mr. Shaw himself.

THE ART OF THE EAST.*

To the art lover of the West, for whom the classical art of Greece and Rome spells the beginning of all art worthy of the name, and the Italian Renaissance its climax, the subject of ancient Oriental painting and sculpture is apt to seem abstruse and perhaps a little uninteresting. This is largely due to ignorance born of want of opportunity to study the East as closely as the West; it is also owing, in great measure, to our innate lack of sympathy with Oriental ideals, and to a natural predisposition in favor of what is more familiar and more easily intelligible. Consequently it was not until a few years ago that the Western mind at large began to suspect that there was anything in Oriental fine art, that was not too rude and primitive to be considered seriously. A few savants, of course, knew better, and in this country the Eastern treasures at the British Museum bear witness to the fruits of their knowledge. But for the most part education in Oriental art took the form of the acquirement of a few hasty generalisations based on somewhat dubious facts, and in most cases concerned with the applied rather than the fine arts. Thus it was commonly realised that China had a great tradition in the making of porcelain, that precious carpets came from Persia, and that India was the country for an attractive but flimsy architecture, stuffs, inlay and filigree work. Japan also was credited with the production of color prints that more than held their own against anything of the kind in the Occident. The fact, however, that India could boast a great school of ancient sculptors, and several considerable painters; that the Chinese school of landscape painting, centuries before the Renaissance artists touched landscape seriously, was the prototype of the most modern landscapes now produced; that Persia had her school of miniaturists; and that Japan's color prints were but an offshoot of the art of painting which she learned from China and moulded into traditions of her own; this was left for discovery by a few students of Oriental life and character, who found in Oriental art the corollary or the complement to what had been laid bare by other kinds of Oriental research.

Quite recently, however, the public interest in art has shown some signs of turning towards the East. Whistler may be said to have popularised the Japanese print in England by borrowing, in his own work, from Hokusai and Hiroshige. The Japanese Alliance has doubtless done something to stimulate our interest in the inner refinements of our ally's national life, past and present, and further stimulus has been provided by the Japanese plays and pictures that have been imported. Similarly, though not to the same extent, political developments in India and China have helped to call attention to the artistic question in those countries, and to broaden the narrow view that the former never had any art of its own except what was Græco-Roman, and that the latter confined her best energies to porcelain. Doubtless, also, the new spirit that has come into the study of all art history, the spirit that regards art as part of the social and political fabric of a nation, is largely responsible for our wider appreciation of Oriental art. It would, indeed, be hopeless to attempt to understand Indian or Chinese art, without reference to the Buddhist creed which influenced its manifestations as potently as, and for a longer period than, Christianity swayed the art of Europe. Yet, with all these developments favorable to a more sympathetic attitude towards the painting and sculpture of the East—half of which would still appear hideous to the uneducated European and the other half incomprehensible—there lingers a host of misconceptions that will have to be done away with before the road is open to any proper appreciation.

We therefore welcome such volumes as "Painting in the Far East," in which Mr. Laurence Binyon treats of Chinese and Japanese painting, and Mr. E. B. Havell's "Indian Sculpture and Painting"; not only because the three countries dealt with have been connected artistically, as well as politically and religiously, from time immemorial, and the books taken together comprise a fairly complete survey of the whole of Oriental art, but also because they indicate those misconceptions to which we have referred, and thus give the student a chance to start independent investigation without any à priori arguments to put him on a false scent. Mr. Binyon's book summarises Chinese painting since the fourth century, and gives the important contemporary movements in Japan, concluding with a chapter on the color printers; it is interesting to note, by the way, that Hokusai, though admired in his own country, has not the honor there that is accorded him outside, and ranks below many of the masters of the fifteenth-century Chinese Renaissance. Of Indian art Mr. Havell is an even warmer champion. His work contains an almost bitter denunciation of the sham classic and Gothic architecture which the Europeans have imposed upon the natives; an equally vehement indictment of the arbiters of taste in the sister arts, who have not only failed to appreciate the artistic treasures of the country, but have taught the rising generation of educated natives to despise their own heritage and find nothing good but the third-class European pictures, &c., imported from outside. An apologist for Indian artistry, he places it on a considerably higher pedestal than does Mr. Binyon; claiming, indeed, that great injustice has been done to the purer styles by representing a degenerate Græco-Roman style, like that of the Gandhara sculptures, to be typical of the best. It is possible that he exalts Indian painting a little more than it deserves. Mr. Binyon and the majority of older critics give it a very secondary importance, compared with that of Indian sculpture. Yet his estimate, if open to contention, is not merely factious, and it is rendered doubly interesting by the very fine reproductions in color that embellish this handsome book. If Mr. Binyon's work, indeed, is quite adequately illustrated, this one is still more sumptuous.

We sincerely trust that these publications will finally explode several fallacies, in the form of general maxims, that have hitherto distorted the popular view of Oriental art. One of the most misleading of these generalisations is to the effect that, whereas European art is an art of form, the Asiatic is one of color. The coloring of Chinese porcelain and Japanese color prints fostered this notion; besides which there was the general idea that color, being sensuous, belongs to the sensuous East, and form, being intellectual, to the intellectual West. This apportionment may have a basis of truth, but it is not borne out by the stern facts about Chinese and Japanese painting. A vast proportion of the earlier Chinese landscapes were painted in monochrome, and both in Chinese painting and its Japanese derivative the advent of color synchronised with the decadence. Moreover, Japanese art, including the color prints, is mainly a linear art, dependent on the balance and rhythm of line. Another point which Mr. Binyon brings out very clearly is that of the realistic quality of Japanese art. The latter is based, from first to last, on the intimate observation of nature, and its primary aim is to represent nature. The difference between it and our own lies in a different conception of what nature and realism mean. Thus, while we talk of the decorative quality of a Japanese print—as if no other quality existed—the Japanese regard, first, its truth to nature, and then, incidentally, its decorativeness. And they do not, like Europeans, divorce the decorative from the realistic in pictorial art; the purely decorative painting and the purely realistic one, as we understand these descriptions, have no place in their æstheticism. Often what to us is a lively pattern of colors is to them simply genre. The shortest way to the understanding of Japanese pictures is, however, through the recognition of the fundamental difference between the arts of the East and West. This may be briefly expressed by saying that Europeans seek to represent the material facts of nature, and Orientals the ideas connected with those facts. Especially true is this of Chinese landscape, which is essentially the landscape of ideas, and in its execution the landscape of suggestion rather than delineation, the personal impression rather than the studiously wrought record of Earth's features. Landscape among all Oriental artists was the favorite medium for the expression of ideas. In this respect, again, they differ from Europeans, who have always regarded figure-painting as the more important branch. But then landscape contained for the Oriental everything that made life beautiful, and everything that was worthy of glorification. It was the visible embodiment of his ideal, just as the glorification of mankind was the root principle underlying the art of the Italian Renaissance. To the Christian painter man typified nobility in nature. The follower of Buddha was impressed mainly by his comparative insignificance.

A study of Buddhism would seem to be a necessary preliminary to any profitable investigation of Oriental painting and sculpture; while for certain periods of Chinese painting and Indian sculpture the history of Confucianism and Mahommedanism would reveal much that is otherwise inexplicable in the symbolism of these ancient arts. The European, however, forgetting that half of what he has learnt of Renaissance art would be unintelligible to him were he wholly ignorant of the social and religious history of medieval Italy, is very apt to pronounce judgment on Eastern Art without even the most superficial investigation of the circumstances surrounding it. If these two books can persuade him not merely to study Oriental art in the light of Oriental history and character, but also to discard utterly his European and so prejudiced standpoint, they will perform a great service to the cause of the wider culture.

Letters to the Editor

THE SHANGHAI CONFERENCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—All that is best in England must respond to the Eastern uprising, whether in near Turkey or in far China. The moral struggle of the latter, as you have said, is one of the greatest any nation has ever entered on. In the centre, and in many districts where it is being pressed home, it is as brave as it is great. (We have yet to hear of any of our Peers who have died through their efforts to qualify as temperance reformers.) Lord Morley has—no doubt truly—said that Britain's stipulations aim at helping, not hindering, the Chinese. Unfortunately, they are still bound hard and fast by the old treaties, and energetic viceroys and mandarins are stopped by Great Britain whenever they attempt to introduce the monopoly and registration system adopted by Japan in Formosa, the United States in the Philippines, and ourselves in Ceylon. Sir J. Jordan compares this to the position of England if she tried to suppress spirit drinking, whilst prevented by treaties from introducing efficient local control or stopping importations from abroad. We collect 283 per cent. duty on spirits. China as she is may only levy 16·3 per cent. on opium imports.

The Indian administration might help both China and India by adopting the recommendations of the late Mr. Haridas Veharidas, that the Indian cultivators should be distinctly notified that they are "not in any way bound to cultivate opium." It was objected at the time that this would result in "great loss to the opium revenue." It would do so still, as foodstuffs have become yet more profitable—an additional reason for withdrawing all pressure to plant the poppy.

Lord Curzon and Lord Morley have both declared that moral failure only can shatter Britain's position in the new conditions of the East. The Commission will test the sincerity of this country quite as searchingly as that of China. Will our religion of the West be fearless enough to win the respect of the great religions of the East? Will Britain's policy be wise enough to place her at the front of this great awakening?—Yours, &c.,

JOSHUA ROWNTREE.

THE CAUSE OF THE PROGRESSIVES' DEFEAT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I suggest to you that you are being "bluffed" by Mr. Graham Wallas. It was something much more tangible than "suggestion" or "sub-conscious inference" which caused the defeat of Mr. Wallas and the Progressives in March, 1907. The malignant posters would, I am convinced, have had but little effect if it had not been for the fact that some of the most strenuous Progressives, who had always supported the advanced party on the School Board, were disgusted by the bluffing tactics of the L.C.C. majority—their refusal to call to their aid men like Lord Stanley of Alderley; their contemptuous way of dealing with the work of the School Board, as if by taking it over they were only adding one more committee to the couple of dozen then in existence. It was this great blunder (foreseen, probably, by those who passed the 1903 Act) which ruined the party.—Yours, &c.,

THE LORDS AND THE BUDGET.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of Saturday last you term rejection of a Budget by the House of Lords an "unconstitutional action," while in a previous issue you admit their right to reject such a measure. Passing by the argument that an action done "of right" can hardly be "unconstitutional," other points deserve consideration.

It is a doctrine of the British Constitution (and of the Liberal Party) that all taxation demands the consent of the taxed—that taxation demands representation. Now members of the House of Lords are by law incapable of voting or taking part in the election of members of the House of Commons; also most peers are large taxpayers. If, therefore, your contention that they have no right to reject a Budget be upheld they would have no voice whatever in spending the money which they are taxed to provide, and this, as before mentioned, is contrary to our British doctrine of constitutional freedom. In suggesting that if the Budget be rejected it should be immediately re-introduced and again passed, word for word, and sent a second time to the Lords, you overlook the well-known rule that no rejected measure may be submitted a second time during one session of Parliament, and the suggestion that the King would consent to create sufficient peers to pass such a measure without a General Election is unthinkable, except on the assumption that the King would take sides in a party fight—a supposition for which we have no shadow of warrant.—Yours, &c.,

BERNARD S. HARWOOD.

Colchester, January 27th, 1909.

[The Lords' right to reject a Budget is certainly nominal, but it is not actual. How can an unrepresentative House reject the entire annual provision made by the people's representatives for the country's needs? The technical difficulty to which our correspondent refers could, we think, be got over. But its suggestion shows how hard it is even to conceive the Lords' rejection of the Budget.—Ed. NATION.]

THE PEOPLE OR THE LORDS?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The able letter of Mr. Fowler Shore in to-day's "Daily News" only voices, or rather expresses, the conviction becoming general that the Government are not in deep earnest respecting the vital matters before the country. Those in official places, surrounded by official circumstances and official advisers, are always prone to forget that they exist for the sake of results. Earnest allies, attracted to the cause from many varied points, have for a long time been asking themselves what is the good of a Government with an overwhelming majority in the Commons if they cannot settle the Education Question, if they cannot carry forward the flag of Temperance Reform—to mention only two of the great issues. "'Tis not in mortals to command success," but they can at least "deserve it." The Government do not "deserve it" if they remain in their place a single day for purely official reasons. "For God and the Commonwealth" should be their cry, and it is fortunate for present day Democracy that in the New Reform Club is a band of earnest persons who place conviction before mere party adulation.

Let the Cabinet take their courage in both hands, and, while remembering Wellington's maxim, always to secure the means of retreat before giving battle, act zealously, and assure the Lords of an immediate increase in their numbers, if they do not, in the words of our great poet, Mr. Swinburne, "clear the way."—Yours, &c.,

A NEW YEAR ENTERTAINMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In an article entitled "A New Year Entertainment," in last week's NATION, the writer has apparently come to the conclusion that the Charlesworth episode is of a very educative character, on the ground that it helps to expose our social system. I much fear that the only moral the public will draw from Miss Charlesworth's conduct is that advertising by means of lies is a very paying business. This young woman has been so successful in her mendacity that she is at once offered a big salary by the enterprising manager of a London music hall, and the public will no doubt show their appreciation of her "cleverness" by going in hundreds to see the "famous red cloak" of this modern young lady. I venture to suggest that this young woman's behavior will not assist in "exposing the higher civilisation." Nothing will change the public's love for vulgar display except a complete change in spirit, and this can be brought about, or at least assisted, by a high-toned Press. If all the newspapers in this country were conducted on the high tone of THE NATION there would be some chance of the public getting to dislike cheap sensationalism.—Yours, &c.,

TAXATION AREAS AND TARIFF REFORM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—You rightly define "ability to pay" as a first test in the consideration of the incidence of taxation. In determining general policy upon a question of finance, it is not always practicable to apply the rigid rule of logic; otherwise all would be simple as A B C, and taxation would be settled on the basis of the principle that wealth—the supreme good from this point of view—should be taxed not at all, or very lightly, during the process of its manufacture. Further, the vitality of the working classes in their relation as consumers must not be impaired, or the output of their labour would be injuriously affected, for are not the workers wealth-creators? Reasoning on A B C lines, the State is regarded as representing the sum of all the interests within it, sectional interests, however powerful, being obliterated, and the one thing considered and decided—the single interest of the amalgamated bread-winner, the Patriarch-State. That is the ground which those take who find in Tariff Reform a lamp to their feet and a light unto their path. Thus the State becomes a mere wealth-producing machine, and all who do not bear a hand in its working must stand aside. But increased wealth implies increased wages—and so the workers are to be brought into line upon election day.

And what of the others who, though not producers, are yet in their several stations vital links in the social chain? What of the spinsters of limited income who toil not, neither do they spin—what of the spectacled annuitants in clubs? What will be the fate of all those in this old and rich country who are subsisting upon wealth not directly employed in the main arteries of trade? They simply won't count. If the country is really about to be swept by a combination of capitalists and industrials the Tariff Reform broom with its cruel bristles will assuredly touch these and such as these on the raw.—Yours, &c.,

MR. SEAMAN'S PRONUNCIATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent "L." accounts the Oxford Dictionary the highest authority on English pronunciation. The authority cannot be accepted. The sounds given by the dictionary are sometimes academic, representing theory rather than practice; when it is not theoretical, it does not always give the best practice; and occasionally, if one may say so, it savors of North Britain. Thus it prefers to pronounce the aspirate in "humor," a practice for which "G. W. E. R." could doubtless find an appropriate epithet. To the first vowel in "deist" and in "deity," it assigns the same sound—the vowel of "deed," the Scottish usage, whereas the best English speech pronounces "deity" with the vowel of "did." It will be remembered that the late Dr. Richard Morris, a great English scholar, on principle never pronounced any aspirate—a warning not to trust scholars implicitly in this matter. Does "L." know that the dictionary gives to the vowel of "girl" the same sound as to the vowel in "gird"—a point which may also be left for "G. W. E. R." to encounter?—Yours, &c.,

THE LYKE-WAKE DIRGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In last week's number of THE NATION I see that one of your correspondents gives an ingenious explanation of the word "slete," in the Lyke Wake dirge, but I think a more obvious and likely explanation is that the word was originally "salt," thus making the line read:—

"Fire, and salt, and candle-light."

Until quite recently it was still the custom in some parts of the North to place a plate of burning salt at the feet of the dead, to keep away evil spirits, and this, with the burning candles, would naturally suggest the line.—Yours, &c.,

PLAY THE GAME.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The poet Virgil can hardly have known the special meaning of the phrase "playing the game," which passes current with us Englishmen. Consider the story of the footrace near Mount Eryx, told in the fifth book of the Æneid. To do any sort of justice in English prose to Virgil's inimitable Latin is quite beyond my power. Luckily a mere summary will serve the purpose in view.

Among the many competitors in the race, five only need mention. These five were Nisus and Euryalus, bosom friends, Salius, Helymus, and Diores. The special prizes offered for competition were three, and three only.

When very near the goal, Nisus, who had led from the start, and was far ahead of the second man, Salius, slipped and fell in a patch of mud. Having lost his own chance of winning, and observing that Salius was well in front of Euryalus, Nisus as he rose from the mud purposely contrived to upset Salius. Euryalus spurted, and amid deafening applause was hailed the winner. Next after him came Helymus, with Diores close at his heels in the third place.

Salius vociferously protested that Nisus had robbed him of his due by means of a dirty trick. The audience, moved, it would seem, partly by the tears and partly by the beauty of Euryalus, took Euryalus' part to a man. Diores, whose right to the third prize obviously depended on the exclusion of Salius, made himself conspicuous by the vehemence with which he backed the silent and tearful Euryalus.

The umpire decided against Salius, but consoled him with an extra prize. Thereupon Nisus urged that his claim was at least as strong as that of Salius, so to Nisus also an extra reward was given.

One would like the candid opinion of a dozen English public schoolboys on (i.) the umpire's decision, (ii.) the tears of Euryalus, (iii.) Euryalus's consenting to accept the first prize, (iv.) the action of Nisus in deliberately upsetting Salius, and (v.) the vehement clamor of Diores.

In view of recent debate about the "Marathon" race in this country, perhaps the most interesting thought suggested by the story is that to Virgil and his contemporaries "play the game" and "play to win" would have appealed as identical exhortations.—Yours, &c.,

A CHEAP EDITION OF PATER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I must cordially endorse "L. B.'s" and "A. T. W.'s" pleas for a cheap edition of Pater's works. One would be glad, too, to have cheap and complete editions of Shakespeare's contemporaries, as "A. T. W." suggests.

I have besought Messrs. Dent to include Smith, the Cambridge Platonist, in their excellent library—I fear unsuccessfully. Will some one second my resolution?—Yours, &c.,

THE ELIZABETHAN DRAMATISTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In answer to your correspondent "A. T. W.," who has "never been able to understand why none of the works of the great contemporaries of Shakespeare have yet been issued in 'Everyman's Library,'" will you allow us to state that a complete edition of Marlowe's plays and poems, with an introduction by Edward Thomas, is among the fifty new volumes of "Everyman's Library" which are to be published at the beginning of March, while editions of Ben Jonson and other Elizabethan dramatists are under consideration.—Yours, &c.,

COWPER AND FREE TRADE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Permit me, as an old Free Trader—one who took part in the Anti-Corn Law Agitation and knew Cobden and Bright—to call your attention to the words of the poet Cowper, expressing clearly the principles that are the basis of Free Trade. Free Trade means free intercourse between the nations of the earth, and, as Cobden once beautifully wrote, "Free Trade—the international common law of the Almighty."

These sentiments are poetically expressed by Cowper in his poem on "Charity":—

> "Again—the band of commerce was design'd
> To associate all the branches of mankind;
> And if a boundless plenty be the robe,
> Trade is the golden girdle of the globe.
> Wise to promote whatever end He means,
> God opens fruitful Nature's various scenes;
> Each climate needs what other climes produce,
> And offers something to the general use;
> No land but listens to the common call,
> And in return receives supply from all.
> This genial intercourse and mutual aid,
> Cheers what were else an universal shade;
> Calls Nature from her ivy-mantled den,
> And softens human rock-work into men."

How different these principles are compared with the jealousies entertained by Tariff Reformers towards foreign nations. There is no doubt that hostile tariffs would excite jealousy amongst other people. One of the reasons why foreign nations are disposed to acquiesce in the possession by this country of such a large share of the habitable portion of the earth is that we indulge in no preferential tariffs nor exclusive dealing. This was a matter which was very favorably commented upon by Mr. David A. Wells, of America, in the "North American Review" of April, 1896, in which American sympathy was claimed for England because the latter grants no privileges to her own people in respect to trade and commerce which are not equally accorded to the people of all other countries.

Free Trade is the handmaid of peace, and it is very significant that the Tariff Reformers are generally the people who cry out for increased armaments. How inferior are these jealousies compared with the spirit of Tennyson's lines:—

> "Ah! when shall all men's good
> Be each man's rule and universal peace,
> Lie like a shaft of light across the land?"

SUFFRAGETTE HISTORY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your correspondent, "Veritas," evidently considers that she has made use of an unanswerable argument when she refers me to the provisions of Lord Brougham's Act and the Interpretation Act, 1889. Unfortunately, however, the definitions given in those statutes are expressly confined to Acts of Parliament passed after the year 1850, so that their relevancy with regard to the construction of Magna Carta is not altogether obvious. I may also point out that neither of the statutes in question, or, for that matter, any other statute, contains a definition of the word "man," or any statement that men shall always include women. This may be so stated in the "British Freewoman," but it is none the less quite inaccurate. See Charlton v. Lings, L.R., 4 C.P. 374.

Nor is it quite easy to appreciate the relevancy of the statement that all companies of freemen included women, even if it were true—which it is not. Even under the doctrine of contemporanea expositio it is impossible to construe the expression "liber homo" in Magna Carta as including women, merely because by custom this interpretation came to be placed on the expression in other documents dealing with an entirely different subject matter, at a much later period. In the year 1442 a statute was passed which recites that in Magna Carta "is no mention how Women, Ladies of great estate married or sole, shall be put to answer, or before what Judges they shall be judged upon indictment," and expressly extends to these great ladies the provisions of clause 39 of Magna Carta as to the rights of a "liber homo."

With regard to the opinion of Sir Edward Coke, since the researches made by the late Bishop of Oxford and other great modern historians we know a good deal more about the early charters than was known to the writers of the seventeenth century. Magna Carta contained 63 clauses, of which Coke only gives 38—and these not quite accurately—and even Hargrave and Butler admit that Coke's translation of mediæval expressions is sometimes erroneous.

It is quite true that in the Second Institute Coke lays down very widely that "homo doth extend to both sexes," but he also states with equal confidence that "liber homo" includes a villein (villanus), although the two are expressly contrasted in clause 20 of Magna Carta. I never intended to deny that in certain collocations the word homo, like the Norman French home, included a woman, e.g., in the ancient writ, "Homine capto in Withernamium." But the mediæval homo was closely connected with homagium—the honorable submission of the fraunk home or liber homo, as opposed to the feaute, or fealty, of the villein; and women could not perform homage except by their husbands. That Coke never intended to extend full hominal rights to women is clear, since in the fourth Institute he treats it as established that women are incapacitated from voting.—Yours, &c.,

THE EFFECT OF "BLUFF" IN POLITICS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In your interesting leader of the 30th ult., you correctly state "that 'bluff' is becoming an agent of no small weight in the manufacture of popular opinion. Announce a proposition, however absurd, or a line of thought however unacceptable to the sensible man, repeat, adorn and even magnify it with the arts of advertisement and rhetoric and, with the peculiarly impressionable 'mass-mind,' you will have gone some way in establishing the position you have advanced." You further express your agreement with Mr. Wallas that this art or suggestion was largely responsible for the creation of the hostile body of opinion which destroyed the progressive majority on the London County Council.

Do not these facts constitute an emphatic condemnation of our present electoral method? The selection of those to whom the government of a city of five million inhabitants or to whom the destinies of a nation are to be entrusted is determined in the long run by the action of those voters who can be "bluffed" by the arts of advertisement. Mr. Wallas, in the interesting work to which you refer, gives a vivid picture of the final "rally" at the close of an L.C.C. poll, on the results of which the representation of the constituency depended. Why, it may well be asked, should the representation of all the "sensible" or even all the "average" electors depend upon the results of a final "rally" of the least desirable section of voters?

When will Liberals recognise the urgent need of such a reform of our electoral methods as will reduce the effect of "bluff" to its proper proportion? When will Liberals demand that the elector of average intelligence shall be able to obtain his share of representation, irrespective of the action and votes of those whose impressionable "minds" are swayed by the arts of suggestive advertisement? We are face to face with a great constitutional struggle, in which the victory of the House of Commons is certain only if it can make good its claim to be representative of the nation. There may, however, arise from this last work of Mr. Graham Wallas a very strong impression that the great mass of our electors are wholly unfit for the exercise of the franchise, and any such impression must tend to weaken the position of the House of Commons. It is already possible to declare that the election of individual members of that House has turned upon the votes of electors who have been "bluffed" by advertisement or gramophone. How can such a House claim to be representative?

Such an impression can only be dispelled by getting back to the actual facts as shown in the number of votes polled at elections. It will then be clearly realised that although these "bluffed" electors have had such an enormous and baneful influence in determining the results of elections, yet they constitute but a small section of the whole body of electors. Nevertheless, if the House of Commons is to retain its authority and prestige, if this House is to maintain its pre-eminent position in the Constitution, then its composition must cease to depend so largely upon the votes of "bluffed" electors. It must be made representative of the whole, and such a reform can be accomplished only by the introduction of a system of proportional representation.—Yours, &c.,

THE SPEECH OF THE PROVINCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—My answer to Mr. Campbell is late because my Nation went astray in the forwarding. Such words as "humane" and "humiliating," unless when they begin a sentence, have no aspirate, but their first letter is y. In spite of the y I say "an humiliating" (yoomiliating). So do all who were bred in the old speech. Of the two authorities to whom I referred Lewis Campbell, I have the authority of the grandson of one. He follows his grandfather, as I follow mine, and we do not mean to change. My statement of the rule should have allowed an exception when the aspirate precedes a diphthong, such as the y of "hyena," but even of this exception I have my doubts.—Yours, &c.,

THE OPIUM TRADE IN THE COLONIES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The writer of "China's Anti-Opium Crusade," in your last issue, concludes a friendly article with the astonishing suggestion that compensation from the Imperial Treasury may fairly be claimed by our eastern colonies if they are compelled to forego revenue derived from licensing opium dens.

Here is an immoral means of raising revenue. Surely it is not seriously propounded that the discontinuing of an utterly wrong practice establishes a claim on the Imperial Government? As well might the Federated Malay States expect compensation for stopping the profitable but iniquitous licensing of gambling farms.—Yours, &c.,

Poetry.

THE MILKMAID'S SONG.

A milkmaid, on a Summer's day,
Was singing as she milked away.

The heavy, sullen Cows had come
Racing, when her voice called them home.

A three-legged stool, a pail that glows,
To sit and sing, and milk her Cows.

Her cheeks were red, her eyes were bright,
And like that milk her neck was white.

The Birds around her tuned their throats—
In vain—to take her perfect notes.

The Cow gave up the last milk-drop,
And tarried till her song should stop.

Now, what gave I, to hear her song,
As home she went, and I along?

"Wilt marry me, sweet maid?" I said.
She laughed in scorn, and tossed her head.

And she had milked the crimson flood
E'en to my heart's last drop of blood.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

MR. EDWARD CLODD is at present engaged upon a work dealing with "The Pre-Animistic Stages of Religion." The book grew out of a paper read by Mr. Clodd at the recent Congress on Religions at Oxford. Mr. Clodd has written an interesting article on Darwin for the current issue of "The Bookman," and he is also contributing a volume on "Lucretius and Modern Science" to Messrs. Constable's new series, "Philosophies Ancient and Modern." A study of Bergsen by Father Tyrrell will shortly be published in the same series.

THE promised cheap re-issue of "Hours in a Library" by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. next week challenges the estimate formed by a forgetful generation of Sir Leslie Stephen as a critic. He himself was a pessimist in regard to the value of criticism. For a historian of Utilitarianism he is sadly obtuse to the utility of literary criticism. Criticism alone keeps literature alive. It need not be even of the highest order. That of Stephen lacked the higher qualities of poetic imaginativeness or originality. But it is the best type of mundane criticism, full of vigor, amusement, and pith. In the direct descent from Bagehot, Sydney Smith, and the wits of the "Edinburgh Review," Stephen is a most relishing writer about books. He shares the hatred of Lewes for metaphysics, shuns the chemical analysis of critics such as Brunetière or Symons, but also shuns the absurdity of generalisations such as Arnold's, turns nothing sour with his test tube like some contemporary writers, but blows the froth off pretension with a cultured common sense that has few equals. For pleasant talk, with plenty of plums in it, about Southey, Balzac, Defoe, Crabbe, Pepys, Walpole, Johnson, Trollope, Disraeli, and the like, there is still no one better—unless it be Bagehot.

READERS of Mark Pattison's "Memoirs" will remember his description of the school, known as "Noetic," or Intellectual, which sprang up in Oriel College at the opening of the nineteenth century. He narrates its scornful invasion of accepted sluggishness, its appeal to first principles and disallowance of authority, the new intellectual ferment which it generated and maintained in Oxford. He tells how this burst of mental activity provoked a reaction in the college of its birth; how the "Tracts" were at once a complement and a challenge to the Noetic teaching. Their doctrine of apostolical succession captured the clergy, who found "the Grace of Orders" an easier working hypothesis than the laborious self-culture insisted on by Whately and Arnold. Reinforced by Keble' poetry and Newman's magnetic personality, they created a counter-movement so vehement as for a time to eclipse their predecessors.

BUT Tractarianism settled on its lees, and Noeticism revived; became audible in "Essays and Reviews," shaped the utterance of Colenso, Stanley, Jowett, Gore; developed into the fearless inquiry and the "higher criticism" of to-day. In his "Reminiscences of Oxford," Mr. Tuckwell regretted that no history of the Noetics had been written; in his "Pre-Tractarian Oxford: A Reminiscence of the Oriel Noetics," announced for immediate publication by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., he appears to essay the task. It contains sketches of Provost Eveleigh, Copleston, Whately, Dr. Arnold, Hampden, Hawkins, Baden Powell, Blanco White. The illustrations are photographed by Mr. F. Hollyer from the original portraits in Oriel Hall and Common Room. Mr. Tuckwell's qualifications for his task hardly need stating. No English writer dealing with scholarship and with reminiscence wields a more delightful pen, or reveals a more interesting personality.

THE biography of George Selwyn, by Mr. S. Parnell Kerr, which we have previously announced in these columns, promises to be one of the most entertaining of the many biographies to be published during the present season. The title is "George Selwyn and the Wits," and Mr. Kerr has been able to use a series of unpublished letters addressed by Selwyn to a relative, and containing many intimate and personal touches. Selwyn enjoyed a great reputation during the eighteenth century, but though almost everybody of distinction was numbered among his acquaintances, it was not until the Historical Manuscripts Commission published the documents found at Castle Howard that more than two or three of his letters—and these dating from his early years, and of little interest—were known to exist. These, together with the fresh letters to be published by Mr. Kerr, give form and outline to Selwyn's mysterious and elusive, but none the less engaging, personality. The book is to be published in March by Messrs. Methuen.

ANOTHER book to be published shortly by Messrs. Methuen is "The Trials of Five Queens," by Mr. R. Story Deans. The five queens are Mary, Queen of Scots, Anne Boleyn, Katherine of Arragon, Marie Antoinette, and Queen Caroline. Mr. Deans's object has been to treat the trials as a lawyer who is solely concerned with the guilt or innocence of the accused, rather than as a historian, who necessarily approaches the subject from its political aspect. With this aim he gives a close analysis of the evidence brought against each of the queens with whom his book deals, though it can hardly be hoped that the controversies regarding their guilt or innocence can now be settled.

THE name of Ambrose Bierce is probably unfamiliar to most English readers, though a volume of his short stories, "In the Midst of Life," published in this country about twenty years ago, created a stir in the world of letters—not greater than its lurid brilliance of imagination deserved. So far as we know, his other books have not been issued in England, despite the force and precision shown in his realistic descriptions of war. His tales of the supernatural are also full of power, and the late James Payn compared them with Poe's masterpieces. An edition of his collected works, in ten volumes, is now in progress in America, each volume to contain an introduction by some distinguished man or woman of letters. Perhaps it is not too much to hope that some London publisher will place the edition upon the English market.

ON Wednesday last M. Jean Richepin delivered the fourth of a series of lectures which have been organised by the Berlitz School of Languages, working in connection with L'Université des Annales de Paris. M. Richepin's choice of Paul Verlaine as subject brought together a large audience, who followed the lecture with close attention. Verlaine, he said, was "un pur classique, un pur poète de la vraie souche Française," though his greatest excellence lay in the lyrical quality, which is rare in French verse. Victor Hugo might be compared to a great forest tree spreading its branches far and wide, Leconte de Lisle to a cypress rising up against a background of white marble, Banville to a climbing rose, the topmost tufts of which ended in a feu d'artifice that seemed ready to burst into stars. Verlaine was a different sort of plant. He might be likened to an exotic orchid—"une fleur une peu bizarre"—above which a sweet song-bird was pouring forth a flood of melody. M. Richepin made several references to his own relations with Verlaine, adding that of all the great poetic spirits with whom he had come into personal contact Verlaine was the greatest and the most memorable.

THE DECAY OF THE FRENCH MONARCHY.*

It has often been remarked as one of the ironies of history that Louis XIV. received the official title of "The Grand" at the moment when he ceased to deserve it. All the glories that gather round the great age of Louis XIV. belong, so far as they relate to his conduct and his personality, to the first twenty years of his direct rule. It is then that we see him resuming and redecorating the best traditions of the French Monarchy as the power which protected the peasant against the noble, intervening in person to see that justice is done, and attacking particularist abuses with the energy of a Richelieu. During those years Louis XIV. co-operated with a Minister who had at any rate a synthetic and complete policy for France. The vices of Colbert's system are not less conspicuous than its merits. In particular, his economic illusions led him to recommend the fatal war with Holland, whose trade, on his reading of economic science, might be appropriated by a conqueror. His industrial legislation, making the Government not merely the centre of organisation, but almost its only motive power, tended to sterilise energy and genius. His reform of municipal administration, correcting fraud and extravagance, was accompanied by reactionary encroachments on popular liberties. But his ideas were, as a whole, at least constructive and coherent. He was of very different calibre to the Ministers who followed him, occupied only in extemporising new methods of raising revenue for the pleasures of a Court; and as long as he was the King's master France prospered and grew.

The new volume of M. Lavisse's great work opens two years after the death of Colbert, who had lived long enough to see the prosperity he had developed begin to crumble, and to crumble fast. It would be difficult to find a period in which, in the history of a nation, decay sets in so rapidly as that through which this volume conducts us. There runs through its pages a note of sorrow and indignation as the writers trace the blind infatuations of pride and selfishness that destroy one after another the gifts of statesmanship and fortune which had brought France her commanding eminence in the world. What, for example, could have been a more wanton destruction of the results of Colbert's industrial policy than the revocation of the Edict of Nantes? One of Colbert's chief methods of naturalising "la grande industrie" in France had been his encouragement to foreigners to settle there and teach their methods to French workmen. Now the Protestants, whom Louis XIV. drove out from France when he allowed his religion to get the better of his judgment, had created, as this volume points out, the prosperity of Rouen, Elbœuf, Sedan, Lyon, Tours, and many other towns and parts of France. In some respects the decadence of French industry and commerce was due to the exaggeration of Colbert's system by his successors; in this case it was due to their violation of it. There was no room in the designs of a Colbert, as there was no room in the designs of a Richelieu, for a sovereign who would let his statesmanship become the dupe of his confessor. What, again, could be more destructive of Colbert's system than the series of expensive wars which played so large a part in the last thirty years of Louis's reign? Colbert's financial measures had reduced the expenditure of France by twenty-two million livres in four years. The Extraordinary War Budget rose from 38 millions in 1683, the year of Colbert's death, to 100 millions in 1706. The great contest for Louis' ear between Colbert and Louvois, in which Colbert had suffered defeat, had had, as one of its main issues, this issue between war and peace, between expenditure on military purposes and expenditure on commercial and internal development. From the day of that fatal decision Louis XIV. took farewell of the dreams of national riches and commercial power that had filled Colbert's mind, and for a time had kept in check his own love of pomp and pleasure. Statesmanship was now concentrated not on large ends of public policy, but on the incessant and restless search for some new way of maintaining a warlike king and a prodigal court.

In this volume we have all this degeneration described in detail, in the working of the bureaucratic system, in the fiscal shifts and stratagems of one Minister after another, in the popular risings that tell, again and again, that the peasants' burdens have become unendurable. These thirty years are indeed a kind of moral syncope, with a warning to any statesman who could diagnose the symptoms, that the system itself was threatened at the heart.

Everything depends on the monarchy, as the centre of circulation and vigor, and the monarchy suddenly stops. All that now interests the king who had once made himself famous by having a nobleman put to death for the murder of a peasant is the choice between different ways of obtaining revenue. The life and health and power of the nation no longer count. With the Government once in this settled frame of mind, only one conclusion is possible. Taxation follows the line of least resistance. De Tocqueville said that the great vice of the ancient régime was that taxation fell on the backs of those who were least able to combat it. Of no time was this truer than it was of the last part of this reign. Colbert had managed to reduce the taille, the most oppressive of the burdens of the poor, from 53 to 35 millions. But during the devastating war of the last years expenditure flew up, and the peasant was the easiest Frenchman to tax. New taxation was inevitable, and whatever its professed form at the outset it soon developed the invidious and discriminating features that were the curse of French finance. This happened, for example, in the cases of the capitation and the dixième. The capitation, as M. Sagnac remarks, was in its origin a progressive innovation. It was a tax that had been employed to raise money for extraordinary municipal expenses. Vauban proposed to introduce it into national finance, and to abolish the taille. He meant it to be universal. The Government added it to the taille, and, though it began by making it universal on paper, the old inequalities sprang up very soon. The rich were able to escape their fair share by paying something down. The dixième was established by a royal declaration in 1710, and the history of this tax is interesting as an illustration of the fatal course that French finance followed. It was professedly provisional, but it lasted to the close of the ancient régime. It was professedly universal, but from an early stage it fell almost entirely on the poor. Not only could the privileged classes elude it or buy themselves off—the principle of differentiation was formally recognised in the discriminating assessment of the property belonging to nobles and property the owners of which were not noble. In Languedoc, for example, the nobles, whose property represented a third of the property of the province, contributed less than a seventh to the taxation. Not less demoralising to government and order was the other principal method of raising revenue. In 1692 appeared the famous Edict in which the King explained that elective mayors were not independent enough, and that he intended to create mayors in all the towns except Paris and Lyons, who would hold their office for life. These new mayors would be free and impartial, and would have time to study and master their problems. These offices were put up for sale; in 1704 the same change was made in the appointment of aldermen and other municipal magistrates; and in 1706 alternative mayors were created, so that there might be two offices to sell. There was no end to the possibilities of expansion on these lines, and offices were multiplied indefinitely. Seven times during the reign of Louis XV. the towns were allowed to repurchase the right of representative government, and as often the right was withdrawn and sold to individuals.

The nation that was paying this overwhelming taxation was all the time receiving nothing for it. It was, indeed, re-receiving something less than nothing. The arbitrary power that Louis XIV. had brought to a climax, pushing the system of intendants into those parts of France that had hitherto been outside it, had lost its energy for action, but had not lost its energy for obstruction. It would not, or could not, act; but it would, and could, prevent others acting. Every process in industry and agriculture was confined in the web of officialism and réglementation that overspread France. Deprived of leadership, inspiration, and constructive ideas, the French monarchy settled down rapidly into the condition so aptly described by M. Lavisse as despotism everywhere, a despot nowhere. When once the life and vitality had gone out of the great centralised scheme that Richelieu, Mazarin, and Colbert had created, the scheme itself produced stagnation. Meanwhile, the misery of France, which finds a fierce expression in local insurrections, grows at a terrifying rate. It is described by intendants, by Bishops, by seigneurs who return to their estates. Two declarations have passed into history: one that of Vauban—that a tenth part of the population of France was living by begging; the other that of Fénelon—that France had been transformed into "un grand hôpital désolé et sans provision."

It is a melancholy volume to write; but it has at least one redeeming page. No time or country can show nobler individual records of moral courage. If Louis XIV. listened to flatterers only, it was not because flattery was the only language his subjects knew. One of his greatest soldiers, Vauban, was scarcely less famous for his skill in fortification than for his denunciation of the ravaging of the Palatinate, and his protests against the King's neglect of the miseries of the poor. Fénelon attacked Louis the XIV.'s wars as well as his pleasures. "You hang a poor wretch who steals a pistol on the road in desperate need, and you make a hero of the conqueror, the man who subdues unjustly his neighbour's territory." Boisguillebert exposed the causes of the nation's decline, and pressed on the Government drastic remedies. Men like these, as M. Sagnac observes, were the precursors of the eighteenth-century philosophers. They were not the only precursors of the spirit and the forces that were to destroy the ancient régime, for already the peasants were learning, as M. Sagnac says, l'habitude de la revolte. It was in the midst of such warnings for the fate of the Monarchy that death came at last to the man who had given to that Monarchy its final form. History has been tender to his memory. M. Lavisse sums him up as a sovereign whose one fixed idea was to win glory for himself by procuring the humiliation of others in a foreign policy that was "mélange de prudence, de roueries, et de coups d'orgueil qui detruisaient en un moment tout un long artifice." In domestic affairs he was not the despot éclairé that Colbert hoped to make him. He preserved the anarchy which existed under the appearance of monarchical order, and he developed the strange confusion of vices that beset and composed the ancient régime. And yet the imagination has always found something to like in the man who had his good qualities and even his virtues—beauty and grace and happy speech; who maintained his grand rôle to the end; who represented France brilliantly in her brilliant day, and refused to acknowledge the calamities that overwhelmed her.

A HUMANIST POPE.*

In "Aeneas Silvius" we have a biographical study of exceptional excellence—judicious, sympathetic, and true to life. It is dedicated, with great propriety, to Professor Sully: seldom has the connection between the work of the historian and that of the psychologist been more convincingly shown. It is because the writer has been able to throw himself into the personality of another, and by the scientific use of the imagination to repeat his experience, that he has achieved so signal a success. The easy and tolerant humanist who, by the irony of fortune, became Pius II., is somewhat of an enigma when judged by the standards of thought and conduct which became current in the post-Reformation period in and outside the Church. Those standards were not his, and it is impossible to fit him into them. Neither were they those of his time: to his contemporaries the enigma, so puzzling to a later generation, was no enigma at all. Perhaps it is because our own time in some respects resembles the Renaissance that he appeals to us. Mr. Boulting's book belongs to the twentieth century. It might conceivably have belonged to the eighteenth; scarcely to the seventeenth or nineteenth.

* "Aeneas Silvius" (Aenea Silvio de' Piccolomini—Pius II.). By William Boulting. Constable. 12s. 6d. net.

At no period of his life was Aeneas a theologian. Theological questions had no interest—it might almost be said no meaning—for him; the controversies of the Reformation, as such, had he lived to witness them, would have left him cold. With a practical end in sight, he could be strenuous; but enthusiasm for ideas was foreign to him: the world in which he lived was a concrete, not an abstract, world. He was no ascetic; he could "sport with Amaryllis"; nor was he always careful to do so "in the shade." Of Ultramontanism as a doctrine he knew little; like Gallio, he "cared for none of these things." Yet he did more than any other man of his generation to rehabilitate the Papacy, which he regarded as the keystone of civilisation, the basis of social, political, and religious order. Opportunist as he was, he had a sincere sense of duty. He scrupulously observed the ecclesiastical obligation of chastity—a rare thing in his time; his death was accelerated by his unsparing exertions in the cause of the proposed crusade of 1464. He was a typical Italian gentleman of the Renaissance; a kindly, wise, and good man. To criticise him from the point of view of sectarian Catholicism or Protestantism is stupid. He was neither a Jesuit nor a Puritan; his was an earlier, an ampler, a less differentiated world. His association with the Conciliar party was brought about by the accident of his having entered the service of a cardinal who, as an adherent of Martin V., was a persona ingrata to his successor, and appealed to the Council, then sitting at Basel, for redress. There was the future Pope "introduced to a scene where he could witness the infant stumblings of religious liberty."

They did not impress him favorably:—

> "We have become a horrid monstrosity, such as the world has never seen or heard before. . . . If you ask my opinion, there are few on either side whose acts are directed by their conscience. God knows which side has the truth."

This he wrote in 1437; and in 1453:—

> "Councils! Why, I saw cooks and stablemen sitting with Bishops at Basel, and giving laws to the Church. . . . The appeal to the Universal Church, that is to say, to men of every station, to women and children as well as to men, to the laity no less than the clergy—in early days, when the body of believers was very small, such a thing was possible. Now, an appeal to the Last Judgment would show as much practical sense."

What led him in the end to attach himself to the Pope was not the theological argument for the Papacy, but the practical needs of the Church of the time. "The King's Government must be carried on," said the Duke of Wellington, when reproached by the High Tories with betraying the interests of the party: Aeneas was of this mind as regards the government of the Church. And neither a Council nor a succession of Councils could govern it; the Papacy was the one institution which possessed the prestige, the continuity, the relative independence necessary. It is considerations of this concrete order, not a Petrine text or a catena Patrum, which created and sustained it from the first. The theological argument was an after-thought; its purpose was to account for and justify theoretically an existing fact. Here is the difference between the mediæval and the modern Papacy; the political necessity which lay at the root of the former has disappeared. The arguments, which were subsidiary to this necessity, survive in vacuo; the centre of attraction, round which they revolved, is gone.

The substitution of the Conciliar for the Papal system promised little for the reformation of the Church in head and members which all good men desired. In spite of his safe conduct, the Fathers of Constance had burned Huss: those of Basel trafficked in indulgences as shamelessly as any Borgia or Medici; loose women flocked to the Council in their train. Aeneas, trusting facts rather than theories, believed "that the directive purpose of God declared itself in events"—a belief which, when the Church and the world were co-extensive, resolved itself into faith in a Providential world-government. The question was, How was reform best brought about? We are not sure that he was wrong in believing that more was to be expected from the Pope than from the Council. He was not the first, and will not be the last, statesman whom the unreasonableness and impracticability of reformers has thrown, as the lesser of two evils, into the opposite camp. Nor, it must be remembered, was the Papacy on which he fell back the developed theocracy of the Catholic reaction. Balanced by the Empire, it was the centre of the existing political system; the pivot on which society, as then conceived, turned.

Men are guided by forces of which they are imperfectly conscious: the causes of events are seldom those that appear on the surface, or would be recognised by the actors in the drama in which they occur. It is only by bearing this in mind that we can understand the controversies of the past:—

> "Questions of Church Government and theological issues appear dull to the modern mind, but they were vital in the fifteenth century, when so little social or political doctrine was formulated: they were the only arguments that could be found to give point to influences that men felt, but could not express. The great causes of human action then lay, for the most part, concealed and dumb; they lurked behind many a Papal Bull and the insurgency that evoked it; they stimulated many a rallying cry of religion. A hundred alien interests were bound up with the contest between Council and Pope."

This consideration is the key to history; it unlocks many doors. To take one prominent instance—the hatred of heresy, which to us is so strange a feature in the mediæval world, was not primarily religious; to suppose this is to take words for things. Heresy was to the mediæval what socialism is to the modern citizen: it allied itself with economic discontent, and indulged in dreams of social reconstruction which were dangerous to property and threatened the foundations of order. The brotherhood of the first Christians haunted men's imaginations; latent in the heresies of the age was what seemed to some the social doctrine of the Founder of Christianity, to others a crude and impracticable Communism. Repression was inevitable, and the means of repression at hand were brutal—the rack, the gallows, and the stake. To-day the pressure of society is heavier and more uniform; its action is more massive, and so can afford to be less acute.

We cannot imagine Aeneas, even as Pope, a persecutor; but he had the Latin sense of the paramount claim of society and of the subordination of the parts to the whole. The guidance of circumstances, for which he had waited, came; he accepted it, and there is no reason to think that his acceptance was insincere. He was too sagacious to dream of the Papacy of Innocent III. or Boniface VIII.; but he believed in the necessity of a central power; he magnified his office and advanced the interests of his See. A representative Pope he was not: he was neither an official nor an enthusiast; and with few exceptions the occupants of the Holy See fall under one or other of these categories. But seldom has a better or wiser man filled it. The Church would be stronger, religion more flourishing had there been more Pontiffs such as he.

A few of his aphorisms may be quoted:—

> "A miracle should always be regarded with distrust."
> "No boldness is ever quite safe, and no injury lasts for ever."
> "Laws are not everlasting."
> "The King is given to the nation, not the nation to the King."
> "You must not go to courts for holiness."
> "Judgment in beliefs follows desire."
> "Nothing is more wobbling than a lie."

One technical inaccuracy may be corrected. Mr. Boulting speaks, in connection with the ordination of Aeneas, of his "vow of celibacy." This vow is only taken by a religious. In the case of a secular clergyman the obligation of celibacy rises not from a vow, but, according to some, from a tacit contract; according to others, and more probably, from positive law.

BETWEEN THE OLD AND THE NEW.*

Among the misconceptions that have prevailed widely, and have held their ground tenaciously in the minds of both clergy and laity, is that which assumes a kind of chasm to lie between the prophecy of Malachi and the Gospel of Matthew. "For four hundred years the Holy Ghost was silent": this was a phrase that was often heard from pulpits; and may perhaps be heard still, in quarters where learning is slow to find an entrance, or where, perhaps, a lack of the sense of humor prevents the grotesqueness, or even the blasphemy, from the believers' point of view, of such a notion being recognised. Perhaps the misconception has gained strength from the further misconception that a semi-Popish attempt to bridge the chasm has been made by the inclusion of the "Apocrypha" in the Authorised Version of the Church of England. Recent scholarship has made it sufficiently clear that there was no such chasm at all; that, at any rate, those who believe in the inspiration of books of the Old Testament, such as Esther, Daniel, Ecclesiastes and Canticles, must admit that the Holy Ghost was active long after the days of the most distinguished Hebrew prophets; while a catena of writings of the biblical type, whether in Hebrew or in Greek, neither of them of such purity as to satisfy the philologist, can be drawn up, extending over the whole period, and throughout the first Christian century; while a sound criterion as to inspiration would perhaps exclude from the "canon" some documents that have found a place therein, and it might very well include others that at present are officially outside. This new volume, by Mr. Fairweather, is perhaps the best one to recommend to anyone who is really anxious to find a learned and trustworthy guide to the literature of the period in question. Already he had issued a smaller volume, "From the Exile to the Advent," dealing with the same subject; and now the book before us shows what knowledge and judgment lay behind the first essay, to which competent critics gave a warm welcome. Much more, however, than the literature is here handled in masterly fashion. All the characteristics of post-exilic Judaism are dealt with, including the developments which mark off the post- from the pre-Maccabæan periods, as also the distinguishing characteristics of the Herodian age. But what will probably prove most attractive to readers is the account of the "Apocalyptic Movement and Literature," contained in the sixth and seventh chapters. Here we have discussions on ten of these books, beginning with Daniel and ending with the "Sibylline Oracles"; and the last chapter of the work is concerned with Hellenistic Judaism, and especially with the significance and importance of the "Book of Wisdom." And finally, the notes, covering sixty pages, contain much interesting matter, otherwise to be gleaned only with difficulty from many larger works; and they carry us right down to the question of Christ's own belief as to the nearness of the end of the world, and even to the allegorism of Origen.

To call attention to a few interesting points: New light is thrown (p. 154) on the moral side of Sadduceeism. Its genius was "distinctly political," but, so far from being, as is commonly supposed, intellectuals and sceptics, they were "sheer worldlings at heart, and also reactionaries and conventionalists in religion." Of the book of Daniel, as the most distinguished and influential of the apocalyptic writings, fitly described as "Tracts for Bad Times," he says:—

> "Of the pre-Christian books belonging to this once popular species of literature, none other is so inherently charming, nor achieved such immediate success, nor became invested with such inherent sanctity."

It appears that the impious "King," who appears in the later chapters either as Nebuchadnezzar, or Belshazzar, or Darius, is throughout Antiochus Epiphanes:—

> "He is the tyrant whose pride, sacrilege, and arbitrary intolerance are so graphically mirrored forth and so amply punished, while the Jews who are the victims of his cruelty are miraculously delivered. All this by way of consolation for the oppressed." (p. 221.)

As to the question whether what seems to be thus deliberately composed as fiction can be put forth as divine revelation, expressed in allegorical form, the author distinguishes:—

> "Although in most cases apocalyptic writings must be pronounced literary fictions, they may, nevertheless, in some cases record real visionary experiences. It is psychologically conceivable that writers whose ideal it was to attain to ecstatic vision should sometimes have realised it through prayer and fasting." (p. 252.)

Thoughtfully as well as learnedly written throughout, and in a style that makes it eminently readable, the book is a credit to the United Free Church of Scotland, as well as to its author. In an Appendix is contained a Bibliography, with brief annotations on the scope and value of the works included. Some hundred and thirty publications are given in chronological order, starting with Prideaux' "Old and New Testament Connected" (1716), and ending with two books published in 1908.

BYE-PATHS OF EVOLUTION.*

THE ensuing year will bring no lack of reminders of the epoch-making period whose jubilee occurs in November, 1909, prior to which comes the celebration of the centenary of Darwin's birth this month. That little heed was paid in scientific circles to the avant-coureur of the "Origin of Species," issued by Darwin and Wallace in July, 1858, is evidenced in the fact cited by Dr. Poulton that Huxley had not heard of it. For in a letter to Lyell a year later, wherein he discusses the transformation of species, he makes no reference to the now classical paper. It was only when Darwin sent him an advance copy of the "Origin" that he learned what master-key to the problem of the mutability of life-forms lay in the theory of natural selection. His exclamation was, "How extremely stupid not to have thought of that!" Doughty champion of the theory from that time until his death, he nevertheless maintained that full proof of its validity would be obtained only when experiments in selective breeding from a common stock resulted in the production of varieties more or less infertile with one another, a result which he suggested experiments skilfully conducted might bring about "in a comparatively few years." But failure would not have troubled him, because it could not affect the evidence producible from other sources, as palæontology and embryology, in support of the doctrine of organic evolution. Like the colors of the spectrum, the gradations of human progress melt indefinably one into the other, and attempts at sharp division, as Comte's "Law of the Three States," and Draper's "Ages of Faith, Enquiry, and Reason," like the equator, have only the warrant of convenience without actuality. Hence there is justification in drawing a line between a pre-Darwinian and a post-Darwinian period, since history can tell of no such momentous and revolutionary change in man's attitude towards all phenomena as that wrought by Spencer and Darwin. How far-reaching is the significance of the movement to which these renowned men gave enormous impetus is brought home in Dr. Poulton's "Essays." As reprints, they suffer from repetitions incidental to interrelated subjects, and the book would have lost in bulk and gained in clearness by excision and remoulding. This applies notably to the last three chapters, which deal with mimicry and natural selection; in Dr. Poulton's words, "with the value of the visible surface of animals in the struggle for life." In this most fascinating branch of evolution he is facile princeps, and his gift of popular exposition could here have been exercised with advantage to those who may be deterred by the technical treatment of the subject.

The opening chapter summarises the history of a long and only recently extinct controversy between geologists and mathematicians as to the life-period of the globe. While the one required hundreds of millions of years for the deposition of the water-laid, fossil-yielding rocks, the other would grant only a paltry ten or twenty millions. But the data wherefrom Lord Kelvin—Darwin's "odious spectre," as he called him—deduced so narrow an estimate, were challenged by Professor Perry. Lord Kelvin had assumed that the matter of which the globe is made up is uniform throughout, and, therefore, that the rate at which it cooled to the life-developing stage was uniform. But Professor Perry produced evidence showing that the interior of the globe is probably of better conducting material than the surface rock, whereby the cooling of that surface would be enormously quickened, and the life-period pushed back to the time required by biologists. Then comes an important factor in the age of the sun, on which Professor Perry contributes a footnote:—

> "Assume that there is radium in the sun, and this gives us almost any multiple we please to imagine of the total energy assumed by Helmholtz. We are now in a position to say that the physicist can make no calculation as to the probable or possible age of life on the earth."

The revisions in this chapter should be extended. For example, both Sir J. W. Dawson and Professor P. G. Tait are spoken of as still living, and the statement that "the melting of snow on Mars is considered to be thoroughly well authenticated" should be qualified by Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace's opinion that the polar caps of that planet are due to solid carbonic acid.

In the essay entitled "A Remarkable Anticipation of Modern Views on Evolution," Dr. Poulton does graceful service in recalling to a generation to whom he is barely a name the pioneer work of J. C. Prichard, a physician of the early eighteenth century. In his "Eastern Origin of the Celtic Nations" he formulated the theory of the linguistic brotherhood of the leading Indo-European races, a theory revived by Max Müller in his brilliant paper on "Aryan Mythology," some of the inferences from which, based on unstable equations, are, however, no longer tenable. Still more remarkable was Prichard's anticipation of Weismann's theory that only characters predetermined in the germ are available for transmission; characters acquired during the life of the individual being non-heritable. With a brevity that the German savant might envy, Prichard says:—

> "The law of hereditary conformation exists with a certain latitude and sphere of variety, but whatever varieties are produced in the race have their beginning in the original structure of some particular ovum or sperm, and not in any qualities superinduced by external causes in the progress of its development."

The birth and barrenness, and subsequent revival, of ideas would be interesting matter for a chapter in the history of human thought. Analogous to the foregoing example is one recently noted by the present reviewer in Howell's "Epistolæ Ho-Elianæ," where an unlooked for anticipation of the modern theory of heat as a mode of energy is given in a letter, dated 1638, to Sir Kenelm Digby of "sympathetic powder" fame. Howell says: "For motion is the fountain of heat; as cold dulleth, so heat quickeneth all things." An example more to his purpose is supplied by Dr. Poulton in the re-discovery of the Abbé Mendel's practically forgotten experiments in mutation, hasty deductions from which are made occasion of onslaught on Dr. Bateson. We can leave the disputants to fight their battle, the more so as Mendel's re-discoverer, Professor de Vries, emphasises the harmony of his work with that of Darwin. The admirably full Analytical Index is beyond praise.

THERE is plenty of justification for this little book. The life of a schoolmaster must always be interesting, not only to the generations of boys who have come under his rule, but to those of us with whom all speculation with regard to education is of importance. The method pursued here, however, does not make for the best kind of biography. We never for one moment come very near the mind or the heart of Brown of Charterhouse. How could we, when the eight chapters of the book are each by a different hand, each being the mere "impression" of one or other of his old pupils? It is true that Dean Stanley, a pupil, succeeded very well in presenting Dr. Arnold to us, but Stanley was a man of exceptional insight, and almost of genius. There is no great insight, let alone genius, displayed by the half-dozen old boys of Charterhouse, who have between them made this volume; yet each separate essay is exceptionally interesting. Brown's early years were passed at Christ's Hospital when the Bluecoat School flourished in Newgate-street. An exceptionally bright boy, he carried away an abundance of knowledge from that school, for which, long afterwards, he wrote a special song. This song he himself translated into Greek, Latin, French, and German, and all his verses are produced here. He passed for a time to a schoolmastership in Yorkshire, and thence to Kensington School, which has now disappeared, but to which he would seem to have given for six years a very considerable success. Sir George Marshall, by the way, who writes on his work at Kensington School, should not have attributed to Haig Brown that little joke about "rowing in the same boat, but with different sculls." That jest had vogue long before the head master of Kensington School was heard of.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, Limited,

The life-work of Haig Brown, however, is associated with Charterhouse, of which he was appointed head master in 1863. Brown followed the school's destinies from Smithfield to Godalming, and there cannot be a doubt but that he was a triumphant success as a schoolmaster. There is no hint, however, here that he was anything more than a good common-sense business man, in addition to being a good scholar. Such a combination is rare enough, and to ask more is unreasonable. There was none of the magnetism that was the undoubted gift of Dr. Arnold, although one of these essayists (J. E. D. Campbell) calls Arnold a "prig," as Mr. Swinburne once called him a philistine. Mr. Campbell, however, whose article on Brown's "Scholastic Work as Head Master," is the best in the volume, admits his limitations, and states the fact that there was no organised teaching of English literature, that subject being non-existent in the curriculum of the sixth form. There was also no organised teaching, we are told, of modern history, and the most superficial attempt at ancient history. Mr. Campbell hints, however, that there is a well-known public school in existence that is still working by a time-table drawn up in 1789. We like two stories told by Sir Arthur Stokes, one of a lady who asked Brown if all the boys at Charterhouse were the sons of gentlemen, to which he replied: "We do not include the education of the parents"; and on another occasion, when a father—a rich self-made man, who was anxious to get his son into the doctor's house—remarked that "money was no object with me." Brown replied: "No, sir, nor with me." Only once in his career did Haig Brown come before the public. It was upon the occasion of a case of diphtheria in the school, when a parent withdrew his son because one of the boys, who had been sleeping in the same dormitory, had died. Dr Haig Brown refused to let the boy who had been withdrawn return to the school. The boy's father wrote to the newspapers. There was a fierce controversy. All the sympathies of the biographer are with Dr. Haig Brown, but not sufficient evidence is given here to justify the head-master. We are told that there were reasons for his action that are not disclosed. We assume they were disclosed to the parents of the other boys, otherwise the conduct of these parents is inexplicable. The father, who withdrew his son from the school, acted, it seems to us, as any parent would have done who did not feel oppressed by a superfluity of children. Dr. Haig Brown remained Master of Charterhouse from 1863 to 1897. In this latter year he retired to the old buildings of the fraternity—the master's house in Smithfield. Here, from 1898 until his death in January, 1907, the old schoolmaster passed his declining days. He died where Colonel Newcome died. It is clear from this volume that the Carthusians were proud of him.

CURRENT FICTION.*

In "David Bran" Mr. Morley Roberts has given us an interesting rather than a finished piece of workmanship. As with his "Rachel Marr," though in a less degree, we feel that the elemental passions of his Cornish fisher folk would find more fitting artistic expression in a play than in a novel. A poetic drama, with the scenes cast into a wilder old-time atmosphere, might give the author scope for working out his psychological study of the passions of love and hate, whereas the framework of modern fiction and the atmosphere of contemporary life seem to produce a photographic effect that is out of keeping with these fierce, primitive emotions. Mr. Morley Roberts might also recognise that his style, deficient in fine shades, would gain dignity in the expression of strong, simple dialogue, and if actors could be found for his virile fisher hero, David Bran, and the two women, Lou and Kate, who give him their love, the moral scheme would gain by being set in an actual atmosphere of tragic passion. As it stands, the psychological blot on the novel has nothing to do with the moral aspect of the situation, which is common and world-wide, but in the repentance of the old mother, Mrs. Bran, after she has failed to murder the woman she hates—Lou Treverris. It is inconceivable that a puritanic nature of this fiercely fanatical type could ever reconcile herself to the woman Lou, who has stolen her son from his lawful wife and set his steps in the path of sin. Even if she herself has sinned and misread the sign sent her by God, she could never say what Mr. Morley Roberts puts into her mouth: "The sins of the flesh are not so sinful as those of the mind." But, apart from this unreality, there is much psychological strength in the analysis of the emotional stress and storm between the man David and the women Lou and Kate.

In "The Potter's House," a study of the puritanic social atmosphere of a little village community of New England farming folk, Mr. Eldridge has narrowly missed achieving a powerful novel. There are at least three characters in the book delineated with uncommon force, and these are the stern, self-righteous young minister, Simeon Craig, the brutal and sullen young farmer Ashgrave, who is ostracised by his neighbors, and his mistress, the girl Amanda, who is finally revolted by the reckless and brutal force of her lover. What is interesting in "The Potter's House" is that the author, while limning the puritanic atmosphere in all its hard-edged, harsh, and biting strength, is himself cognisant to the full of the backslidings and spiritual depravities of the good people of Padanaram. This is rare in an American novel, and it suggests that the author, reared in such a New England community in youth, has returned to it in after years with a spiritual outlook broadened and humanised by contact with new horizons. Or is it merely the contrast between a backward rural district and the spirit of town culture? In any case the scenes which draw for us the animal riot of Ashgrave's senses, when he has defied the threatening hostility of his neighbors, and dared them do their worst, after taking into his household the Catholic lad, Henri, and attending mass with him at the Catholic mission at Belmont, are drawn with much insight into the load of bad conscience that seems to be a special inheritance of the New England breast. Ashgrave's riot of sinful licence is merely the excessive and morbid discharge of the same passions which Craig, in his fanatical self-repression, is storing up. The author arrives at this conclusion when, at the end of the novel, Craig, who is in love with Amanda, finds the whole structure of self-repression crumbling at her voice, and urges that it is a sin for her to violate God's ordinance, and refuse to marry the man who loves her most—himself. Unfortunately for Mr. Eldridge, his powers of artistic construction are by no means equal to his powers of psychological analysis, and the unnatural complications which he has introduced into his plot in order to keep in the background Amanda's destined mate, Barnaby, destroy much of the force of the situation. The author has yet to learn that unnecessary detail in a work of art weakens the force of its appeal. As a first novel, however, "In the Potter's House" is certainly highly promising.

In Mrs. Wharton's latest volume of stories we find the particular note which is characteristic of American fiction at its best—the Boston note we might perhaps term it—which takes its most individual manifestation in Mr. Henry James's work. Mrs. Wharton might be accused by a hasty critic of "imitating" that master, but the fact is that while she has assimilated something of his manner, her particular strength, as in his art, lies in the subtlety of the mental analysis. The cleverest story in the volume, "The Pretext," though built upon the very old situation of a man simulating love to a woman as a screen to cover his real love affair, reveals a quiet poignancy of feminine acceptation in the heart of the unfortunate heroine, Margaret Ransom, which no masculine novelist could have seized. Women writers are always nearest the heart of the secret when they place their sex in the emotional centre and ours on the circumference, and it is for this reason, perhaps, that the stories "The Pot-Boiler" and "The Best Man" and "The Trust," which are told through the medium of a masculine outlook, are less true to nature and less true to art. They are amazingly clever, of course, full of fine strokes and even finer reticences, but they have not the atmospheric certainty or the emotional truth of "The Pretext." "The Verdict," again, which narrates the feelings of a fashionable but essentially mediocre painter, Jack Gisburn, when he is asked to sketch the face of the dead unpopular genius, Stroud, a few hours after the latter's death, though intensely dexterous, is not really a fine piece of art. The author has put her own feminine sensitiveness into Jack Gisburn's brain, and this transference of feeling is the characteristic defect, by the way, of the Boston school.

AN EXPONENT OF GREEK PHILOSOPHY.*

One may doubt whether this country has ever produced a philosopher who combined a learning so encyclopædic with a judgment so independent and so bold as the late Professor Adamson. He had a memory as remarkable as Macaulay's, and there was hardly a corner of the history of philosophy, and, indeed, of the criticisms and controversies which rage round the history of philosophy, which he had not explored. He carried his immense learning lightly, and almost gaily, and in his own speculations pursued a rather daring line, half sceptical, half realistic, which made him a rebel against the tendencies that have dominated English philosophy since the days of T. H. Green. He had in conversation an immense range of interest and illustration and a spontaneous humor and humanity. Perhaps because he had so deep a contempt for facile and irresponsible work, these gifts are not apparent in his scanty writings and in the lectures which are now being recovered from the note-books of his students. His method in lecturing was to dictate. He was lucid and trenchant, but he seemed consciously to avoid any digression that would have carried him away from the sheer straight line of his logical advance.

The lectures on Greek philosophy which have now been published under the editorship of Messrs. Sorley and Hardie are a typical example of his method. To a young student who came to them for his initiation into Greek philosophy they would seem uninteresting and repellant. A ripe student, who knew his Ritter and Preller thoroughly, not to mention Burnet and Zeller, will, on the contrary, feel that he has before him a document which will repay the most conscientious study. Even when he deals with the romantic and poetical work of the pre-Socratics, Professor Adamson confines himself to a severely businesslike attempt to pierce through the alluring and fanciful statement of a thought to its central logical significance. He rarely indulges in detailed controversy over the significance of an obscure and disputed passage. But the more carefully his condensed expositions are read, the more will the serious student feel himself in the presence of a mind whose every statement is a considered verdict. His handling of the logical and physical problems raised by Megarians and Atomists is particularly valuable and interesting. In dealing with Plato, and still more with Aristotle (to whom more than a third of the book is devoted), Professor Adamson is reacting against the recent English tendency to go to these masters mainly for pregnant hints, for texts to be developed, and, in a word, for edification. He restores the physical and logical speculations of Aristotle to their central place in his system, and comes near ignoring his ethics and his politics. In his own temperament there was nothing either of the mystic or the preacher, and he is peculiarly successful in expounding a thinker whose mind was as objective and purely scientific as his own. Perhaps the most original section of the book is the relatively full exposition of Stoic doctrine with which it closes. It ignores the later Romans, brushes aside the ethical and legal developments of Stoicism, which were its larger and more permanent contributions to civilisation, and treats it solely as a Greek school which had a tradition continuous with the Platonic-Aristotelian philosophy, and even represented a return to some earlier thinkers, notably Heracleitus and Antisthenes. There is of course, absolutely nothing new in this view, but the manifest zest with which Professor Adamson rescues even the Stoics from the atmosphere of edification gives his statement the value of a personal exposition and a summary with a meaning.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

The average literary palate has grown rather fastidious in the matter of colour books descriptive of this or that locality—thanks to the very great number and variety of these that have been issued during the last two or three years. It demands, in addition to attractive illustrations, some literary quality that will make the volume easily readable; the ponderous style of writing is held inexcusable in anything nowadays except a county history, and lightness of touch is essential; the book must, above all, "have atmosphere." We are not sure that the "Devon: Its Moorlands, Streams, and Coasts" (Chatto and Windus, 20s. net) of Lady Rosalind Northcote has all the necessary qualifications. It is certainly less light than Mr. Henry Harris's "My Devonshire Book," recently reviewed in these columns; neither is the writing of it so conspicuously finished, nor the construction so adroit, as to challenge comparison with the classics. On the other hand, it contains a vast amount of historical information capably put together, and no one is likely to quarrel with Mr. F. J. Widgery's illustrations. These are not only serious and sensitive renderings of fair country, but are also quite in keeping with the text, which is nothing if not serious. Devon would be a wonderful shire if it could boast nothing beyond its fine variety of natural scenery, the manufacture of such fascinating articles as cream, cider, and lace, the possession—in Haccombe, near Torquay—of the smallest parish in England (in 1908 it contained nine persons!), and—in Plymouth—a town that has given its name to more towns than any other town or city in the world. There are said to be forty Plymouths outside this kingdom, as against twenty-nine Londons and seventeen Aberdeens. But these things are only a small tithe of its total interest. Along the course of its rivers, the Otter and the Axe, the Teign, the Dart, the Tamar and Tavy, the Taw and Torridge, are towns and villages, castles and country houses, that emanate the spirit of historical romance; besides which there are Dartmoor in the south and Exmoor in the north, with their wild beauty, their tors and rocking-stones, each district a nest of legends and facts of the past. We learn a good deal of the Devonshire castles and country houses from these pages; also family histories, including that of the Northcotes, which Lady Northcote seems to have taken great pains to investigate. Indeed, the whole book shows evidence of careful and exhaustive research, and this fact, combined with that of the authoress' genuine affection for and appreciation of her subject, should recommend it to the many Devonians now scattered throughout the land.

Of the seven plays by Mr. W. L. Courtney that are contained within "Dramas and Diversions" (Chapman and Hall, 5s. net) only one has been seen on a London stage. This is the "On the Side of the Angels," a rather sombre drama of modern life, which was produced by "The Pioneers" at the Royalty Theatre in 1906. "Gaston Bonnier," however, was written for and performed by Professor Herkomer at his now historic theatre at Bushey; "Undine" has been translated into Spanish and produced at Barcelona, while the acting rights of "Bridals of Blood" were acquired by the late Sir Henry Irving. Of the remaining three, "The Death of Kit Marlowe" appeals by its Elizabethan atmosphere rather than its dramatic possibilities, and even more emphatically must the daintily written "Father Time and His Children" and the farce "Pericles and Aspasia"—which reads more comically than it would act—be dubbed "Diversions." "Bridals of Blood" is certainly the most serious of these efforts. It is founded on the German of Ludwig Fulda, and its action takes place round the character of Henry of Navarre. History is "adapted" with more than ordinary freedom, but this

"As I turn over the leaves and re-read the passages I have marked, I utterly despair of conveying within my appointed limits any inkling of the author's fertility of thought and illustration."—Mr. WILLIAM ARCHER, in the Morning Leader.

"A spacious mansion of delight. . . 'The New Word' is a book of rare enchantment, with something of the freshness of the world's youth about it."
—Mr. HARRY JONES, in the Daily Chronicle.

"It is impossible to do Mr. Upward any justice by quoting him, unless we quote nearly the whole of his book, because it all hangs together, and it is all good. . . 'The New Word' is a book to add to the small store by the side of your bed. It is full of Scholarship and Wit, and it is full of Hope."

licence, we are told, is that of the original author, not Mr. Courtney's; neither does it affect the dramatic qualities of the piece or the merit of the blank verse in which most of it is written. Without knowing how much of the characterisation is drawn from the original version, it may be said that the personalities of Catherine, the dowager Queen, the half-demented King Charles, Margaret of Valois, and Navarre himself, are finely visualised against their lurid background of murder and intrigue; the play, moreover, abounds in the possibilities of strong color and striking situations. We say "possibilities," because it is difficult to judge it from a dispassionate literary standpoint, without reference to its actual presentation, and in these times the finest drama, especially historical drama, can be made or marred irretrievably by its staging and acting. "Bridals of Blood" would require the best to do it justice.

The latest addition to the "Highways and Byways" series deals with "Surrey" (Macmillan, 6s.), and has been written by Mr. Eric Parker. Like most volumes in the excellent series to which it belongs, it is delightful reading, and one feels that some of the places described must be visited at the earliest opportunity. Mr. Parker has been successful in catching the spirit in which a book of the sort should be written. He chats with his reader, and the information with which the book is packed is given in manner far removed from that of the ordinary guide-book. Ruling out the part of Surrey which is now London, and confining himself to the open country, or country villages, or towns, Mr. Parker begins with the Old Way, the Pilgrim's Way, which has seen so many travellers, from the worshippers who went to Stonehenge down to the modern motorists. Once started, it matters little where Mr. Parker takes us, so rich is Surrey in scenery of varied type, as well as in historical and literary associations. Kew, Richmond, Staines, Dorking, Box Hill, Crowhurst, Epsom, Thorpe, Runemede, Guildford, call up a crowd of memories, and Surrey has been associated—to name but a few—with Sir William Temple, Dorothy Osborne, Swift, Nelson, Lady Hamilton, Jane Austen, Horace Walpole, Pepys, Cobbett, and Boswell. Mr. Parker is to be congratulated on having written a book which is sure to heighten his readers' interest in what is, to Londoners, one of the most accessible of English counties. Mr. Hugh Thomson's illustrations have his accustomed delicacy and grace of outline.

Messrs. Cassell have just issued a souvenir volume, "Peace and the Churches" (6s. net), of the visit made to this country by representatives of the German Christian Churches in May and June of last year. The book contains a record of the proceedings printed in English and German, and is illustrated by a great number of photographs. There are Forewords by the Archbishops of Canterbury and Westminster, Dr. Clifford, Prelate Kleinedam, Dr. Dryander, Mr. J. Allen Baker, M.P., and others. The book is handsomely produced, and is sure to be valued by all interested in the movement for International Peace.

On Tuesday there was quite a revival of speculation in Paris, and our foreign market was greatly encouraged. The reason assigned was the solution of the Turco-Bulgarian difficulty by Russia's proposal that she should lend Bulgaria, at 6 per cent., some of the money she has just borrowed from France at less than 5 per cent. in order to enable Bulgaria to pay the indemnity to Turkey. It is a comic transaction; but one must suppose that all parties like it. Anyhow, the main thing was to smooth out another crease in the Balkans. Meanwhile, everything looked smooth financially. The Bank's position has become steadily stronger, and easy money seems to be assured. The Canadian loan, though only half subscribed, stood at a premium. Then suddenly came the announcement of an Indian loan for no less than 7½ millions. This, on the top of a Canadian loan for six, is almost bound to depress the price of Consols and other gilt-edged securities. The loan bears interest at 3½ per cent., and its issue price is 97. The peculiar feature of it is that the whole has been underwritten by the India Council. One cannot help thinking that the India Government might take steps in future loans to encourage the participation of native Indian investors. Nothing could add so much to the security of the loans and the borrowing power of India for railways, irrigation, and other productive purposes. Nevertheless, this loan, as well as the Canadian, will probably be absorbed. A leading Stock Exchange man told me on Thursday that he had seldom seen so much new money coming forward for investment in bonds.

The Lancashire and Yorkshire.

The other day the Lancashire and Yorkshire dividend had to be reduced from 4¾ to 3¾ per cent. The report shows that the decrease in traffic receipts was about £150,000, half of which was accounted for by merchandise (mainly cotton, no doubt), and the remaining half by passengers and minerals. Half the loss was made up by reductions in working expenses. Receipts have not yet begun to improve; but this year is almost certain to be better than last; so the stock at 90 or 91 looks a fairly good investment. The English railway meetings have been quite lively; but so far the attempts to eliminate senile or grossly incompetent directors and to improve the management have been unsuccessful. If only half a dozen honest Harrimen could be reared on English soil!

The Abuse of Inside Knowledge.

Mr. John D. Archbold, of Standard Oil fame, once confessed that when he feared certain oil wells were about to dry up he hurriedly unloaded all his stocks upon unsuspecting buyers. "Was this honorable?" asks a New York critic. "Or let us suppose that a powerful railroad system evinces a desire to purchase a weak road, is it fair that the insiders should make speculative uses of their information?" One American authority expresses the opinion that it is this inside jugglery of stocks that is driving the outside investor from stocks to bonds, since the latter are less susceptible to manipulation, and cannot be influenced by changes in dividend rates, which are a common source of enormous profits to directors. This unscrupulous abuse of inside knowledge is one of the blackest features of high finance in the United States. The "Journal of Commerce" remarks that if it cannot be dealt with by law, "moral suasion should be brought to bear upon the managers of our country's large affairs, so as to induce them to refrain from these highly questionable practices."

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

Diary of the Week.

The King and Queen have made a brilliant success of their visit to Berlin, the details of which were arranged both by the Kaiser and the Municipal authorities, so as to present a mixture of splendor and of delicate family sympathy. Thus the rooms in the Royal Castle reserved for King Edward and Queen Alexandra were filled with English books and with many memorials of the common home life of the two Royal Houses, and of reminiscences of English history. The fact that the souvenir contained a special tribute to four great English sailors will, we suppose, be regarded as a special touch of German Machiavellianism. We observe that the "Times," which first suppressed the important disclosure of Mr. Chamberlain's effort to bring about an Anglo-German alliance, proceeded to record the King's second day in Berlin in a dry and meagre article of a little over a column in length, against over three columns in the "Morning Post," over six columns in the "Daily Telegraph," and between three and four columns in the "Manchester Guardian." We understand the political view which dictates this belittlement of one of the most interesting European events of our times, but we do not gather how the conductors of the "Times" reconcile it with ideas of efficiency in the conduct of a newspaper.

The Berlin speeches on both sides have been of the most cordial and encouraging character. At the State banquet in the White Hall of the Royal Castle on Tuesday night, the Kaiser declared that the German people saw in the visit a "new pledge for the future peaceful and friendly development of the relations between our two countries." "I know," he added, "how much our wishes for the preservation and strengthening of peace are in accord, and I can offer your Majesty no better welcome than the expression of the firm conviction that your Majesty's visit will contribute to the realisation of these our wishes." To this the King replied that the Kaiser had given "eloquent expression to" his own feelings, and added that his coming "purposes not only to recall before the world the close ties of relationship between our two houses, but also aims at the strengthening of the friendly relations between our two countries, and thus at the preservation of the general peace towards which all my endeavors are directed."

Less formal, but equally cordial, language was used by King Edward at the pleasant reception at the Rathaus, where, after drinking a cup of wine presented to him in the name of the City of Berlin, the King added, "It is my earnest desire that the relations of the two peoples may always be the best." These expressions find a significant echo in the German newspapers, and are approved not only in the French Press, but in the still hostile Austrian newspapers. The "Berliner Tageblatt" says Germany cannot keep pace with the British in naval armaments, and suggests a naval agreement on condition that Great Britain "reduces the speed of her naval construction." Other papers assume that not merely family but political considerations have dictated the visit. The "Morning Leader" has also received a sheaf of very satisfactory utterances which suggest a desire, expressed by the "Vossische Zeitung," for a definite understanding. We cannot think that this is a message which the Government will ignore. The popular side of the visit, which the King knows so well how to emphasise, seems to have been brilliantly managed. The Berlin municipality were delighted with his visit, and his luncheon with the officers of the First Dragoon Guards, of which he is Colonel, appears to have been a specially cordial function. The King has conferred the Star of the Royal Victorian Order on the Chief Burgomaster of Berlin.

On Tuesday, the day of the arrival of the King at Berlin, France and Germany signed an agreement which puts an end to their long and dangerous dispute over Morocco. The German Government on the one hand declares that it has only economic intents in Morocco, and recognises that France's special political interests are closely bound up with the consolidation of order and peace in Morocco. The French Government on the other hand pledges itself to the maintenance of the integrity of Morocco, and to the preservation of economic equality, and undertakes not to oppose German industrial and commercial interests there. Both Governments undertake not to seek any economic privilege in Morocco for themselves or any other, and agree to associate the subjects of both States in any concessions these may secure. The Franco-German agreement, in other words, guarantees the "open door" in perpetuity, not merely for thirty years, as in the Anglo-French agreement, and apparently it gives Germany a special advantage not conceded to England, in the matter of co-operation in concessions obtained by French subjects. By ending the Morocco squabble it makes the task of bringing England and Germany together much easier, for this long dispute has hitherto given a recurring anti-German edge to the Anglo-French understanding.

Our Paris correspondent writes: "It is little more than two months since for twenty-four hours the possibility of war with Germany hung in the balance. The German Government had unexpectedly demanded an apology for the Casablanca incident, in which France seemed prima facie to be the aggrieved party, and the demand had been refused. In the view of the French Government the demand meant either bluff or an excuse for a quarrel. Orders were sent to the army to be in readiness to mass on the frontier, and every preparation was made for war. Now the situation has happily changed, and it would seem that the eternal question of Morocco is settled. The agreement between France and Germany is admitted, even by those who are far from satisfied with the Clemenceau Ministry, to be a feather in its cap.

"It has been received here with almost unanimous approval. The only dissentient notes are struck by a few Nationalist organs such as the 'Eclair' and the 'Soleil,' while even the 'Gaulois' applauds. Those who have always defended the Delcassé-Pichon diplomacy maintain that it is now justified. An agreement with Germany, they claim, was made possible by the firmness shown in December in rejecting an indefensible demand, and they add that, had M. Rouvier shown the same firmness, instead of dismissing M. Delcassé in obedience to Berlin, an understanding would have been arrived at before. M. Delcassé himself, who heartily approves of the agreement, considers it to be a justification of his policy, which has been continued by M. Pichon, and also a result of the entente cordiale, which has made France strong enough to hold her own. The hope is generally entertained that the agreement may lead to an improvement in Anglo-German relations. It is reported that it was facilitated by certain combinations between French and German capitalists interested in African minerals; and in the 'Humanité' M. Marcel Sembat quaintly maintains that the real authors of the agreement are Krupp and Schneider rather than Bülow and Clemenceau."

We deal elsewhere with the character and implications of the new South African Constitution, which was given to the world on Tuesday. Its reception, both in the Imperial and in the South African Press is, on the whole, favorable. It has some detached critics, among them Mr. Schreiner, one of the more isolated politicians of the Sub-Continent. Mr. Schreiner thinks the scheme illiberal, probably on the ground of its rather perilous treatment of the native franchise, and is of opinion that it ought to be made the subject of a popular referendum, instead of a mere reference to the Parliaments. More important is Mr. Hofmeyr's general approval, qualified with a reserve as to the Cape representation. The Press, South African and Progressive, is friendly. The two important organs of Dutch opinion—"Ons Land" in the Cape Colony, and the "Volksstem" in Pretoria—attach especial weight to the clause which makes Dutch and English official languages of the Union, and puts them on a perfect official and Parliamentary equality. The powerful Mr. Steyn is also favorable, and this secures Dutch support. Among the organs of the mining interest, the "Kimberley Advertiser" unites with the Johannesburg papers, the "Star," "Leader," and "Rand Mail" in general approval, though there is a rather ominous note from the northern Colonies as to the retention of the native franchise for the Cape. Natal is heavily bribed by the terms of union, and will probably accept them, but grumbles, after her fashion. Commercial interests seem solidly favorable, and the party leaders on both sides are firm in support. The new Dominion is to be called simply "South Africa."

The "Daily Mail" considers that it is in a position to state that the Cabinet has accepted the proposals of the Admiralty, and that the naval programme for the coming financial year is to include the laying down of five improved "Dreadnoughts," to be followed by a sixth. The last arrangement is to be contingent on German progress in new construction, which is said to be twelve months in arrear. There is no truth in any one of these statements. The Government has not decided on any such programme. Germany is not in arrears with her construction. It follows that the further suggestion that the scheme of new construction will involve an increased expenditure of from three to four millions is equally baseless.

Mr. Harcourt made an interesting speech on Saturday, reverting to the late Prime Minister's resolution on the Lords, which he adopted, and described as "an historic landmark in the annals of our Parliament." He declared that the friction in our parliamentary system was now "accumulated," and was "contrary to public weal," affecting as it did the governing power of democracy. Four courses were open to the Liberal Party. The House of Lords could be ended, or amended—that is to say, reformed—the relations of the two Houses could be revised by law, and, finally, the party could go on as if nothing had happened. Mr. Harcourt objected to the first, second, and fourth courses, and declared for the third, which meant, in his view, the adoption of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's plan. By this they would practically arrive at triennial Parliaments for acute party issues, leaving two closing years for less contentious measures.

The German Secretary of the Treasury is having a much less pleasant job than Mr. Lloyd George is likely to have. He has just had to ask for permission to issue another £7,500,000 Treasury bonds, after exhausting £23,750,000 since last March. Meanwhile his scheme of taxes for raising an additional £25,000,000 of revenue is having a bad time in the Finance Reform Committee of the Reichstag. The taxes on gas, electricity, and advertisements are pretty certain to be rejected. The spirit monopoly is bitterly opposed by the Conservatives; but the severest struggle is being fought over the death duties proposal. The novelty of the death duties is that they are to be imposed on estates left to near kin, and for that reason, though the suggested tax is light enough, and although Baron von Rheinbaben declares that four fifths of German land will be exempt, the landlord party and the Centre will have nothing of them. The alternative would be an Imperial tax on capital—for some direct sources will have to be tapped—and this measure has the support of the Liberals; but the Government is pledged to the States not to make this entrenchment upon direct sources of revenue. The Reichstag Committee was expected to settle the fate of the death duties this week; but its decision has been delayed by negotiations for a compromise, and by the week's ceremonies. Nobody is optimistic enough to expect that the Government will get the full £25,000,000 of new revenue required to balance income and expenditure and to restore German credit.

We are surprised to see that Mr. Haldane has given his blessing to the action of Lord Rothschild, as Chairman of the Directors of the Alliance Insurance Society, in declaring that in future clerks engaged for work at this office must be members of the Territorial Army. Mr. Haldane might at least have waited till Lord Rothschild had extended this system to his own office, which he has not yet done. On Wednesday Mr. Haldane, speaking at the Ritz Hotel, and bestowing common praise on the "Daily Mail" and the play which describes the invasion of England by a German Army, declared that the basis of what he called "our great overseas army" must be voluntary. But how is a force voluntary when employers make service in it a condition of employment, and diminish the earning power of young men who do not care for military drill, or are not physically suited to it? Does Mr. Haldane mean to confine his preference for voluntarism, as against what he called the "debatable question of conscription," to an overseas force? It seems surprising that a Minister of War should openly patronise a play which holds up to ridicule a body in whose future he is interested. But does he mean it to remain voluntary? We observe that he concluded his speech, according to the "Times" report, by saying that a good deal might be said for compulsion, so long as it was not applied to people between seventeen and twenty-one, that is to say, to recruiting for the Regular Army. We hope that questions will be put to Mr. Haldane when Parliament meets, and that a very specific answer will be required of him.

The Italian Chamber has been dissolved, and the General Elections have been fixed for the latter end of March. The Chamber, whose career is ended, was elected in November 1904, and when it met counted nearly 350 Ministerialists and a variegated Opposition of 140. During its life it was ruled by five Ministries: by Giolitti for a few months, by Tittoni for a few days, by Fortis for nine months, by Sonnino for a few weeks, and finally again by Giolitti, whose second term outlasted the Chamber. Signor Giolotti has been induced to dissolve the Chamber before its seven years are up by the difficult position of his Foreign Minister, Signor Tittoni. Signor Tittoni was bitterly attacked last December in connection with the annexation of Bosnia-Herzegovina, but pulled through then because it was believed that he had secured from Austria as the price of his approval the concession of an Italian University for the Italian-speaking subjects of Austria. It turns out, however, that all Baron Aehrenthal means to give is an Italian faculty of law, and that in Vienna, not in the Italian district. Signor Giolotti needs Signor Tittoni during the elections to get him Conservative support, and therefore he has preferred a dissolution rather than the immediate sacrifice of the Foreign Minister.

The Azeff scandal brings forth new and more sensational revelations every day, and, according to the "Times" correspondent, the Russian Press is unanimous in recognising it as "one of the gravest predicaments that have ever befallen Russia." The Government has issued a statement denying that any official, Ratchkoffsky, the foreign organiser of the Secret Service, or any other, took part in any Terrorist act and asserting that "there has been no hint of Azeff's participation in political crimes against Government officials." M. Lopukhin, it explains, was arrested because he had made known Azeff's co-operation with the police to the Social Revolutionaries. Full explanations are promised when the Duma discusses the matter. This statement satisfies nobody. It seems pretty certain that M. Lopukhin was not responsible for Azeff's exposure, and Azeff is said to be still in St. Petersburg, drawing his £300 a month from the Treasury. The Duma Committee has accepted the Cadets' interpellation on the Azeff scandal, and the extreme left promises on this occasion to produce the most damning proof of the active co-operation of Azeff and other officials in Terrorist outrages. The Social Revolutionaries' Committee in Paris are understood to have handed over to the Socialist deputation the documentary evidence in their possession.

Dr. Sven Hedin, the greatest of living travellers, gave a brilliant lecture on his last journeys in Thibet to the Royal Geographical Society on Monday, and Lord Morley, in moving the vote of thanks, justly said of Dr. Hedin that on no one of his enterprises had he shed blood or raised ill-will. The journey involved incredible hardships, most of it being over enormous snowfields, while the temperature went down to the freezing point of mercury,—38·6 degrees C. Dr. Hedin began, of course, by disguising the fact that he was a European, but he was at last discovered and confessed. Dr. Hedin said cheerfully that Himalaya made "not only a natural defence of solid granite, but it was double, and it would be amusing to see a Northern enemy try to jump over those two walls, with the Indus-Brahmaputra grave between them."

The anti-Japanese agitation remains lively in the United States. Nevada, Nebraska, and Oregon have made platonic demonstrations, but the centre of trouble is California. The Legislature of that State has killed the Bills aimed at preventing Japanese owning land or becoming members of corporations or living in the white quarter, but the Assembly has passed the Bill for excluding them from the public schools. Mr. Roosevelt calls this the most offensive of all, one combining the minimum of efficiency with the maximum of insult. In a long message to the Speaker of the Assembly, he urges the rejection of the Bill and loyal co-operation in a further trial of the Government's policy of action through friendly agreement with Japan. That policy, he argues, is working very well, and in six months has reduced the number of Japanese in the United States by 2,000. Mr. Gillett, the State Governor, likewise recommends the defeat of the Bill. It has still to run the gauntlet of the State Senate, where it is likely to be defeated, and if it gets safely through that Mr. Gillett will probably veto it. If he fails, there still remains the Supreme Court to test its constitutionality. The editor of the "San Francisco Argonaut" expresses sound opinion when he says that "the situation is really less serious than it is made to appear," that "the whole trouble has been magnified in the official correspondence," and that "there would have been no trouble if there had been less haste and more discretion at Washington."

Politics and Affairs.

THE FRUIT OF THE BERLIN VISIT.

The striking success of the King's visit to Berlin will, we hope, discredit in advance the comment of our anti-German fanatics that no substantial meaning lies behind the passage of compliments between the King and the Kaiser, and the almost identical messages of good-will for the British and the German Empires that the two sovereigns exchanged at the banquet in the Royal Castle of Berlin. We shall, indeed, play an unwise and a churlish part if we fail to acknowledge the splendor of the King's reception, and the hospitable, generous, and even affectionate spirit that the German Emperor and people have thrown into it. For the meeting, with its atmosphere and graceful exhibition of family warmth, happens to coincide with a change in the European situation which may be of the utmost value in the working out of the future relations of the two countries. The Franco-German agreement in Morocco puts an end to a difficulty which we may regard either as a series of misunderstandings or as the storm-centre of a great political movement, with Germany acting the part that the downfall of Russia at the hands of Japan suggested to her statesmen. The latter is the reading of the "Times," and, we imagine, also of our own Foreign Office; the former is, we hope, at once the less ambitious and the more probable interpretation. In any case the Moroccan affair is at end; a simple declaration of mutual economic désinteressement has wiped out the whole panoramic picture of vast State designs which our fears and those of France had, rightly or wrongly, constructed. Did Germany mean so much, and is she content with so little? Did she mean to show France plainly that with the humiliation of the allied military Power she must come into harmony with the German system or risk a repetition of 1870, and did our firm action avert this European disaster? Let this theory have what weight it may, and, incidentally let it open our eyes to the nature of the changes in our foreign policy that, since the French entente, have fixed this country as an active member of a combination of European Powers from which its most powerful neighbor is excluded. But the incident has passed. Germany, which initiated the negotiation, has behaved with exemplary moderation. She has accepted the "open door" to trade in Morocco, as distinguished from all political interests, and French opinion is content and even warmly appreciative. Now, therefore, that our friend across the Channel is fully satisfied, and that the two Royal houses are on cordial terms, we have to ask again what material fruit the people of this country are to reap from the double appeasement, material and sentimental, in the Anglo-German situation. The comment at once arises—If France and Germany can attain a settlement of their most vexed question, cannot we? To this end the remarks of the Berlin Press are plainly directed. The "Post" and "Germania" ask clearly for an Anglo-German understanding. The "Berliner Tageblatt" suggests that Germany should meet us in naval matters if we reduce the speed of our naval construction. We seem, therefore, to have reached a golden hour in Anglo-German history. Let us see to it that it does not slip away unused.

We confess that we cannot think it possible that a Liberal Government will inform the world, on the meeting of Parliament, that the foreign situation is unchanged, and that the veiled war of naval armaments is to go on as before. That would be a grave assumption. If diplomacy and material strength have no relation to each other, if a cordial reconciling visit is of no account, and the European peoples are invited to go on bearing indefinitely the ever-increasing burden of an armed peace, we have conceded one argument of the war-makers, that preparation for an early Anglo-German struggle is the better, because the cheaper, expedient. This is the moral which a writer in the "Fleet Annual" of 1909 draws from Mr. Asquith's supposed readiness to build against America and Germany, and from the coming Naval Estimates. "Ministers," says this writer, "know that the Estimates they are now preparing mean not the 'preservation of peace,' but a 'declaration of war.'" Would that be an improper conclusion from such a premise? We cannot think so. We are well within sight of a Navy costing forty millions a year, an end to be attained, with absolute certainty, within the next three years under the estimates kindly prepared for this Government by that historic ally of Liberalism, the "Times" newspaper. Six "Dreadnoughts" (at 2¼ millions apiece, and a maintenance charge of over £200,000 a year) are to be laid down this year, six the next. Supporting charges are to be incurred in smaller vessels and in new dock accommodation. If there is any word for such preparations but war expenditure, we do not know it. We have, in a word, arrived at a point when, unless the whole moral and material force of the Liberal Party is unflinchingly exerted, all influence over peace and war, and the well-being of two great communities, will have passed completely out of its hands.

That party has, we submit, three vital tasks before it. The first is to ask for a full statement on foreign policy. That is long over-due. We have a great respect for Sir Edward Grey, and a strong friendliness towards him. But he will acknowledge that the time has come when he must be asked for an account of his long and interesting stewardship, and that he owes such a declaration both to the country and to the party which has so generously trusted him. There is an excellent precedent for such a representation to our own Foreign Minister. Germany has a far less developed representative system than our own, and she possesses nothing like our Sovereign Parliament. But Prince Bülow has never hesitated to speak freely and fully to the Reichstag on Foreign Affairs; and now that a happier turn has been given to the anxieties of the last three years, the House of Commons has a right to at least an equal measure of satisfaction. Sir Edward Grey has, we sincerely believe, been a worker for peace. It would be an insult to a Liberal statesman to suggest that he has had any other public end in view. When, therefore, we learn from the Foreign Secretary that, as things stand, Germany and England are friends, the Liberal Party can with confidence ask that the Naval Estimates shall be accommodated to the diplomatic position.

Is this second demand unreasonable? The "Times," at the instance, we are afraid, of the permanent heads of the Admiralty, has called for twelve "Dreadnoughts" in two years. This is a demand for twenty-four, or, more probably, twenty-seven, millions. Any estimate based upon it commits the nation for a long future, the financial implications of which are of the gravest possible character, while they snatch from it all hope of a period of constructive social reform. It is understood that the special point of alarm is that the German strength in "Dreadnoughts" will be so rapidly accumulated towards the end of 1911 or the beginning of 1912 that it and the parallel British force will be almost equal. The calculation can only be made on the theory that no more British "Dreadnoughts" will come in to our fleet of these vessels by the dates we have specified. But if this be the fact, the whole plea is a specious evasion of the facts. Let us say that we are bound to build four "Dreadnoughts." If either four or six "Dreadnoughts" are added to the list of completed vessels within three years, they will give us an ample predominance in this one class. If neither addition comes in, nothing is gained for the critical period by insisting on the larger quota. Moderation, therefore, in addition to its enormous gain from the point of view of policy, which again vitally affects the future scale of ship-building in Germany and in England, has common sense on its side. It has the further advantage of avoiding a most sensational plunge on a single class of vessel on whose supreme merits well-equipped experts and students of the Navy like Sir William White and Lord Brassey are sceptical. We thought that the lesson of the Hamilton programme had not been entirely thrown away. But it seems that the method of "scare-building" is so deeply implanted in the British Admiralty that nothing can eradicate it.

It is at this point that we hope the Liberal Party in Parliament will take up its third and perhaps its most important position. It is time for Liberals to say that the lines of defence for this country must lie finally with its statesmen, and not with its "experts." The Navy Estimates are again being inflated, through the now accustomed campaign of these latter gentlemen for a "good Press"—be it well understood, a Tory Press—in its favor. How long are we to endure these methods, inconsistent as they are with the true power of the permanent Service and their security against party criticism? They imply two evils, the divorce of armaments from policy and the practical obliteration of Liberal statesmanship. Liberal Governments now act in the matter of the war services under threats of resignation by gentlemen, grown bolder with impunity, who have secured beforehand the public opinion they exploit for a narrow and often disputed technical view. This journal has hitherto defended Sir John Fisher from the unsparing attacks of a rival interest on the Service. But we confess we doubt whether the country would not have greatly benefited if, two years ago, the heads of the factions whose war cries then filled the Press had been simultaneously relieved of their duties, and a much-needed lesson learned in the self-effacement of officers on service. It is not too late for the Parliamentary Party to come to the rescue, and to assert policy against technique. We observe that the "Daily Chronicle" states without contradiction that about one-fifth of the Cabinet, including the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the most powerful living representative of historic Liberalism, have made a determined stand for moderate Estimates. If this is true, we have only to add that behind this one-fifth lie nine-tenths of the Parliamentary party and all the moral force of Liberalism. But if the present party unity on the Navy is broken up, it is not only the Government which will suffer irreparable disaster. The blow will have been delivered at the heart of Liberalism, at the hopes of democracy, and at the cause of European peace.

ANOTHER BRITISH NATION.

The draft constitution for the tenure of South African States is, in the first place, remarkable as a testimony to the healing and reconciling powers of common nationality. For underneath the bitter quarrels in which from time to time the several States engaged, deeper even than the racial fury of the recent war, was the sense of a common country and a growing nationality which would demand and obtain political expression. Those who have closely followed the movement towards closer union have recognised from the first as the happiest augury of success this truly patriotic note in the conduct of the leading representatives of races, political parties, and even economic interests. Though spilt blood is the worst cement, and war the worst approach towards a union of hearts, it is doubtless the case that the terrible commercial, financial, and social debility which was the inevitable aftermath of war helped to ripen in the minds of thoughtful South Africans the urgency of the work of political reconstruction. The quick bestowal of full self-government upon the two new Colonies made early action practicable, while the success of the Dutch-British party in securing the control of the Cape and Transvaal Parliaments assuaged the soreness and removed the suspicions among the rural population that would have retarded the acceptance of any form of Union or Federation which appeared to bear the impress of a distinctively British Imperialism.

The scheme itself is remarkable alike for its courage and its discretion, its logic and its compromise. Although the status of province is retained for the several Colonies, and provincial Assemblies will still exercise certain governmental powers, the triumph of the principle of Union over Federation is pretty complete. The statesmen who formed this convention learned important lessons from the United States and the closer experience of Australia, regarding the dangers and difficulties of any central government confronted by the rights of sovereign States. Even the larger powers exercised by the Canadian Dominion, with its reservation of all rights not expressly delegated to the Provinces and its general power of legislative veto, have not prevented serious collisions of feeling and of interest. The South African Constitution seeks closer unity by stricter limitation of the powers of the Provincial Councils, which hardly exceed those possessed in this country by County Councils and other elective units of local government, and through the appointment by the central government of a Provincial Administrator as the chief executive officer, and of an Auditor of Provincial Accounts in whom will be vested a strong central control over provincial finances. If these proposals are adopted, British South Africa will, to all intents and purposes, become a single self-governing State, containing within itself full legislative, executive, and judicial control, with the exception of such almost nominal limitation upon legislation as is contained in the right of the Crown to disallow Acts, a dwindling control over foreign policy, and an appeal in special cases from the Supreme Court of South Africa to the Privy Council.

There are many interesting provisions in the proposed electoral machinery. One of the most important is the adoption of proportional representation by the single transferable vote for the election of members of the Legislative Assembly and of the Provincial Councils —an experiment which will furnish the first really adequate test for this reform of electoral method. In allotting the number of members of the Central Parliament of the several Provinces a variety of delicate considerations arose. The reluctance of Natal to enter a union likely to be dominated by Dutch-British has been overcome in part by assigning to her and to the Orange Free State a considerably larger representation than their population would have warranted. But this early over-representation of the two smaller Provinces in the Assembly, and their representation on equal terms with the Transvaal and the Cape in the Senate, are only temporary aberrations from "equality." The former will be automatically corrected as the population of South Africa increases; the latter is partly corrected by the power of the Governor-General to nominate eight Senators, partly by the complete ability of the central government to revise the constitution of the Senate after ten years have expired.

Indeed, the elasticity imparted to this written constitution is remarkable, and will appear to those who distrust democracy excessive. No limit is set upon the power of the bare majority in any Parliament to amend the Constitution, save in certain clauses relating to electoral rights and one or two minor matters, which require a two-thirds majority of the total number of members of the two Houses to alter them. Nowhere in any Constitution have so large powers been claimed for the people of any country, if we accept an interpretation of the term people from which all women and almost all non-European adult males are excluded. It must be confessed that the least satisfactory aspect of the Constitution lies in its bearing upon native questions. For though, as was expected, there is no direct or present interference with the franchise now enjoyed by natives in Cape Colony, our reading of Section 33 finds no adequate formal guarantee for the maintenance of that right when the Central Government shall determine that the time has arrived to adopt a uniform native policy applicable to the entire country. For if the issue ever came to an actual division of voting power between the Cape and the three Provinces opposed at present to a native franchise, the latter might command the majority of "not less than two-thirds of the total number of members of both Houses" necessary to secure a union franchise law that should exclude from qualification all natives other than those actually upon the register. Indeed, the possibility, perhaps the probability, of such a policy appears to obtain recognition in clause 35, which provides that "No person who at the passing of any such law is registered as a voter in any Province shall be removed from the register by reason only of any disqualification based on race or color." A certain ambiguity of wording in clause 33 even leaves it doubtful whether a bare majority vote of the Union Parliament might not prevent the registration of the next generation of Cape natives. While admitting the difficulty of formulating any scheme of native representation acceptable to the majority of white South Africans to-day, we cannot but consider as a blot upon the democratic character of the Constitution that it expressly precludes the vast majority of British subjects in South Africa from any voice, direct or indirect, in the representative government of their country.

A related and not less important issue is raised by an elaborate schedule appended to the Constitution in which the transfer of the Imperial Protectorates of Basutoland, Bechuanaland, and Swaziland to the Union Government is contemplated. The strange provision is attached that the administration of such territories shall be entrusted to the Prime Minister, advised by a small Commission appointed by the Governor-General. The provisions virtually endue the Prime Minister with the final and prevailing voice both in the administration of and the legislation for these territories. It is curious that such exact conditions should be attached to a business which lies entirely within the competence of the Imperial Government. Though it is legitimate enough that South African statesmen should look forward to a time when, by the test of experience, they shall have made good their claim to be entrusted with the control of these Imperial territories, we cannot hold it safe or reasonable that, at the very outset of their difficult career, they should have imposed upon them this additional burden, or that these Imperial wards should be handed over without adequate and permanent guarantees for the maintenance, not merely of the integrity of native lands, but of those other liberties and advantages which they have hitherto enjoyed under the Imperial Government. Apart from these qualifications we have nothing but commendation for a document which is probably destined to form the political foundation for another great British nation.

INSURANCE FOR UNEMPLOYMENT.

Of the complex problems which have been awaiting the report of the Poor Law Commission that of Unemployment is by general agreement by far the most pressing in importance. If the Government propose to initiate legislation in the ordinary way in the coming Session, as though no constitutional crisis existed, they are pledged to put this question into the forefront. How, then, are they to deal with it? That the problem is not one but many, is a point which we may now take as generally understood. It may be split in many ways—in fact, in an embarrassing variety of ways. There are the unemployed and the unemployable, and there are very many shades of character between them. There is the problem of the skilled workman and of the unskilled, of cyclical depression and of seasonal depression. There is the irregularity which is almost regular in its recurrence, and there is the irregularity which cannot be predicted. With all these variations in the cause, it is not to be supposed that any single remedy is to be found applicable to all cases. The best that we can do is to select certain phases of the evil and administer to them the best treatment that experience suggests.

For this purpose we may, first of all, make a distinction not based upon the character of the workman, important as that is under other aspects, but rather on his economic standing, his skill, and his ready pay. The tolerably well-skilled man, who as a rule belongs to a trade union, already makes a certain provision in very many cases for these as for other misfortunes incidental to industrial life. His trade union insures him against unemployment so far as the capacity of its funds allows. It also gives him unemployed benefit in the shape of a greater or less proportion of his wages, and for a larger or smaller number of weeks, as circumstances allow. The unskilled labourer, on the other hand, who is too poor to make much provision for rainy days, and is scarcely reached effectively by the trade union movement, has hitherto made little provision of this kind, and is not likely, unless his circumstances should materially improve, to be in a position to make such provision in the future. On the other hand, the unskilled laborer, if ill paid, has this advantage, that his unspecialised work can be more easily turned from one occupation to another. In point of fact, the problem of finding work, if soluble at all, is soluble only for the generalised powers of the unskilled man. There can be no such thing as the "right to work" in the sense of the proposals put forward last session at the instance of some Labor members. It is inconceivable that the State should be able to find printing work for the compositor and tailoring for the tailor and shoemaking for the cobbler as occasion requires, and all at the full rate of pay recognised in their respective trades. On the other hand, it is not so impossible that, by a judicious arrangement of work, and by the development of national works in connection with afforestation, road making, foreshore reclamation, and the like, employment should be so spread as to equalise good and bad times for the general unskilled laborer.

The conclusion suggests itself then that, if we make for the moment a distinction between the relatively skilled and well-paid and the relatively unskilled and ill-paid, two different lines of solution may be applied to each. The case of the skilled man can hardly be met either by the direct revision or the adjustment of work. But he might be saved from the calamities of the present system by a scheme of insurance to which he could afford to contribute. The unskilled man, as at present circumstanced, would with difficulty be brought into any effective insurance scheme, but might be catered for by a judicious distribution of nationally organised labor. The idea of insurance, frequently advocated in these columns, has of late made considerable headway and is not at all unlikely to materialise in the form of some practical proposals. But on the precise shape which these proposals should take there has at present been very little discussion. If the whole problem could be solved by means of insurance, and insurance alone, it would be natural to look in the end towards a universal scheme, which would have accordingly to be compulsory, and, being compulsory, would have to be administered somewhat on the model of German State Insurance through the medium of the employer. On this scheme it may be supposed that equal proportions would be contributed by the three parties to the insurance, the employer, the employed, and the State. Such a scheme would have the advantage that it might be made universal, and might bring in the unskilled laborer as well as the highly-paid artisan.

At the same time there are certain points of difficulty in its working which, if not insuperable, are at least puzzling. The rate of contribution which would be within the power of the unskilled would hardly be such as to justify a sufficient allowance for bad times, and it may seriously be doubted whether a very low rate of relief, which fails even to do half the work of keeping a family, is the most desirable way of tiding people over a bad season. But the more serious objection is the difficulty of defining unemployment. We are dealing here with an elusive class, with every variety of character, from the most willing to the most shifty. Even for the expert dealing with individual cases, the line is hard to draw between the two. By what means a State Department would separate the sheep from the goats we find it hard to imagine. The very definition of an unemployed workman is not easy to lay down. Is a man bonâ-fide unemployed if he can get any sort of work and refuses it, or is he justified in demanding the recognised rate of the trade, including in that expression not merely the admitted rate of wages, but all the standard conditions insisted on, say, by his trade union in a given locality? Is the trade union to determine the rate, and is the State official to take the verdict of a trade union secretary, or is there to be an official standard overruling that of the union? and where there is no trade union, what is the standard rate? Unless all these questions can be answered clearly and satisfactorily, a compulsory system would seem to us extraordinarily difficult to work.

Attention has been called of late to the municipal experiments made in countries where municipalities retain an independence which they have lost in this self-governing nation and which, so far as they have gone, have been justified by success. The particular experiment in question is known as the Ghent system, from the town in which it originated. The Ghent system is a very remarkable one, and, though less far-reaching than a system of compulsory insurance, makes a smaller demand upon the administrative capacity of officials. The people of Ghent found trade unions in existence which gave their members assistance in the shape of unemployed benefit. They helped the trade unions in turn by the simple process of subsidising the unemployed fund. The trade union pays so much a week to its unemployed members, and periodically submits its accounts to the municipal authority. On convincing this authority that the sums in question have been duly paid for purposes of unemployed benefit and no other, it receives a subsidy proportionate to the total amount. There is no interference with the administration or with the finances of the union. The whole administrative responsibility rests with the union. It remains its interest now, just as much as before, to keep down the numbers of the unemployed, that is to say, to see that no single member remains on its books a day longer than he should do so. The difference is merely that it is enabled to pay him a larger benefit than it would otherwise do.

This system has not only succeeded in Ghent, but, on account of its success, has been repeatedly copied elsewhere. It exonerates the State administration from the weightier part of its responsibility, and puts the business of sifting the wheat from the chaff, of defeating the malingerer and keeping the benefits for the honest and industrious man for whom they are intended, upon an organised body of men whose direct interest it is that these functions should be adequately performed. It involves no official judgment upon the difficult question of standard rates and fair conditions. On the other hand, it is less comprehensive than a compulsory scheme, and for the present it would only help those who are already members of a trade union or friendly society paying unemployed benefit. It might, however, be expected to give a stimulus to thrift in this form, and so to enlarge the area covered by this method of provision for a rainy day. To us it seems that, upon the whole, these are merits outweighing those which can be claimed for the rival principle. They render the Ghent system more suitable for a first attempt at dealing with the problem of unemployment as it presents itself among the better-paid sections of the working classes.

IS NONCONFORMITY TOO POLITICAL?

THERE have of late been signs that Nonconformity, like most modern institutions, is in some trouble about its soul. Dr. Forsyth has recently asked, and an anonymous writer on "Nonconformity and Politics" has repeated the question, whether some of "the current political activities of Nonconformity" are not really out of harmony with Nonconformity's "fundamental principle that religion is not a matter of State." Both are inclined to answer their inquiry in the affirmative. Dr. Forsyth thinks that Nonconformity, with its awakened consciousness as to social evils and oppressions, is in danger of lowering its conception of the Kingdom of Heaven from a spiritual ideal to some vague pattern of a realised social State. The author of "Nonconformity and Politics" fears that Nonconformists are becoming mere Liberal politicians; that their chapels and meetings take on the air of the party caucus and the Committee room; that their new centralised force, the Free Church Councils, and the "institutional" side of their church life, powerfully aid this materialising tendency; and that, as a result, Nonconformity has ceased to do its work on the individual—that it no longer forms religious character, or "makes saints." The writer admits that when the Nonconformist churches were fighting for existence, and their members for the barest rights of citizenship, they had to be politicians, and that the habit of attachment to Liberalism was confirmed when Mr. Gladstone and the Liberal party gave them the great delayed franchises of last century. But now that things are changed, and that neither political party denies at least the elements of political justice, he thinks that this once inevitable partisanship should be modified. Individual Nonconformists may well remain Liberals, or become Socialists, but their churches, as such, should have nothing to do with party warfare. All their influence on politics should be indirect. The State, and the parties which govern it, and whose atmosphere is that of "policy" and compromise, live their lower life; the Church has her "heavenly call." She cannot force her ideals—her "maximum"—on the State; that would be to create a resentful minority, and so defeat the moral end, the refinement of human wills, at which she aims. In the attempt thus to embody religious objects in political forms, a de-spiritualised Church is apt to acquire the habit of expediency—of regulating conduct by counting heads—to which the partisan is bound. If any party is to be formed by the churches, it should be a "definitely Christian party," not a Liberal, or a Conservative, or a Socialist party. But, indeed, Nonconformity falsifies its own idea that religion has nothing to do with the State when it centres half or more than half its activities in State action. Does not its very indifference to Disestablishment, coupled with its concentration on other political issues, show that this vital principle of its moral and intellectual life has declined, if it has not altogether disappeared?

The rather vehement retorts which this protest has excited seem to show that it is not quite without truth or applicability to the state of the Nonconformist Churches. But we confess we are not without sympathy with the answer. The Nonconformist of to-day may well ask how he can in nature avoid sympathy with the party which made him a free citizen, which opened to him the gates of knowledge and power in his own land, and is to-day his one effective bulwark against such direct assaults of the privileged Church as Mr. Balfour's Education Act. And if a traditional attachment impels him into Liberal or Radical politics, another force of an even more compelling type drives him into kindred "institutional" activities. The writer of "Nonconformity and Politics" raises the double plea that the religious man ought to think of his soul, and that the Nonconformist in particular should remember the Puritan ideal of the "establishment of the Kingdom of God upon earth." But to the sharply awakened social consciousness of our generation it may well seem impossible to separate this double end from action that in a broad sense—certainly in the Greek sense—may be called political. If, therefore, so many Nonconformist (and, for that matter, Conformist) churches turn themselves into "clubs, friendly societies, recreation rooms, employment bureaux," it is because the life of the modern man embraces so many secular activities that a religious society can hardly help him at all unless it follows him into some of them. Not only has the "sacred selfishness" of the old individualist evangelicalism become morally repugnant to his successor; it is not intellectually possible to him. The "saving-your-own-soul" theory of Christian effort becomes almost meaningless to the man who has seen the life of the poor in great cities, and who has also realised that a definite sphere of "betterment" does lie within the compass of the law and the State. Thus far, therefore, the demand for a withdrawal of religious forces into the pure contemplative zone must have its limitations. The spirit of Christianity, with its appeal to the believer to gain one kind of life by losing another, and the history of the early Christian Church and of the two divisions of Nonconformity in Puritan and post-Puritan days, seem alike to forbid it.

But we confess that when the writer of "Nonconformity and Politics" criticises the identification of Nonconformist Churches with Liberal party politics he is on stronger ground. The opposite example of party Toryism in the Establishment is a warning against such an association. The two cases do, indeed, differ. British Nonconformity, by virtue of its democratic history and ties, its close relation to the life of classes of manual workmen like the miners and the agricultural laborers, is under small temptation to become, as the Establishment in the rural districts tends to become, a watch-dog of property and of the social order of the village and county. It has not even gained complete social equality with the landowning classes or with the greater and lesser clergy of the Anglican Church; and therefore, by the conditions of its past and of its present organisation, it keeps touch with the common mind and heart. But this position has its dangers. Nonconformity is a great school of popular rhetoric, and rhetoric, as we know, is the stuff of party politics. It stirs the simple, but it discourages truth and depth, those two sources of strength in the religious sphere, and it keeps up a dangerously close connection between the chapel and the party platform. Now the enlightened Liberal does not want Nonconformity to be a mere section of party Liberalism. He requires a more critical, a more detached, service than this; the kind of service that fixity of outlook gives to the shifty world, where party chieftains make their daily accommodation between principle and convenience. This is a moral and a supervising force, and if one religious organisation aims at supplying it for the Tory party, another kind seems well fitted to furnish a fairly steady support for Liberalism, or for what Liberalism may grow to. But with the author of "Nonconformity and Politics," we should hate to think that this power had become a tool in the hands of the caucus, and if that time came we should fear that the true strain of Puritanism had worn itself out.

Life and Letters.

THE ACHIEVEMENT OF DARWIN.

It is just 100 years since Charles Darwin was born. A man of weak health throughout life, and, what is more, a genius of infinite patience, he brooded over his great work for nearly a quarter of a century, and it was not until he was fifty years old that "The Origin of Species" saw the light. In days when a new idea lives for a week, if it lives at all, and the up-to-date theorist will produce you a new hypothesis to explain most complex facts while you wait, there is something chastening in the reflection that the one theory of the last century which more than any other has moved the world was incubating for twenty full years in the patient mind of its originator before he could so far satisfy himself that it was well grounded as to put it into print. Even then Darwin would have held back longer but for the simultaneous trend of Dr. A. R. Wallace's mind in the same direction. The conception of evolution was, in fact, in the air in the middle of the nineteenth century, and the simultaneous development of the theory of natural selection in two minds, working independently, is in itself no more remarkable, though no less interesting, than the coincidences between the work of Newton and Leibnitz, or between that of Hamilton, Joule, Meyer, and Helmholz. It was not, in fact, the conception of organic evolution which was Darwin's great original contribution. The idea of the origin of the infinitely manifold forms of organic life from simpler types, and perhaps, in the end, from a single primitive ancestor, had been discussed more or less actively for at least two generations, and applications of the theory had even been made to the world of mind by Herbert Spencer four years before the publication of "The Origin of Species." Darwin, then, did not originate the theory of organic evolution, nor did he prove it, for to this day it cannot be said that final proof has been attained, and it may be that proof, in the rigid sense, of such a theory is unattainable. What Darwin did precisely was, by the aid of a simple but far-reaching hypothesis, to bring the theory for the first time into contact with an immense body of facts, to show that it could be utilised, as every sound scientific hypothesis ought to be utilised, to explain difficulties and contradictions, to throw light upon what was obscure, to give meaning and significance to what was otherwise valueless lumber.

Darwin had before him two great masses of fact. There were the vast classifications of the animal and vegetable kingdoms, classifications showing that individuals could be referred to species, that species could be grouped together in genera, and genera in turn could be brought into higher groups rising one above another till they reached the great Orders that were in their turn ranged into the Classes, of which the whole of the animal and vegetable kingdoms respectively could be shown to consist. What was the meaning of these gigantic systems in which every living thing could be referred to its place? Were all these Species, Genera, Orders, and Classes, nothing but a wonderful arrangement of desks and pigeon holes for convenience of reference in which the omniscient naturalist could place every object with which he had to deal? Was the name of genus and species nothing but a label, and was the work of the naturalist to remain at bottom no more significant than that of a skilled maker of catalogues? On the pre-Darwinian view it was difficult to see any escape from this conclusion. The classification was there, but if each species was an independent creation arising side by side with others, but having no vital connection with any of them, the whole thing appeared without plain meaning or purport. On the other side there was the geological record, the fact that incorporated in the stratified remains of earlier portions of the earth's surface were the imprints of a succession of forms, animal and vegetable, resembling and yet differing from those which people the world at the present day. There was the fact that in the strata nearest to our own period the resemblances were closer to the forms we now see, and that, as we get to older and older strata, so the resemblances become more remote and the differences more accentuated. There was the fact that differences of species were the first to disappear and that as we ascend to the more fundamental characteristics of an organic type, so, on the whole, we are able to trace them further and further back into the abyss of geological time. Had this succession any meaning or was this fossilised history of life to remain a mere mass of brute fact, ascertainable but unintelligible? To these questions the Darwinian theory supplied an answer. If one conceived the simpler, more elementary types of life reproducing their kind, multiplying, extending over the face of the earth, and engaged in a ceaseless struggle for food and warmth, for the means of subsistence and reproduction, one could imagine also changes coming into being in such a type in response to the repeated struggles of each individual to adjust itself to its environment.

It was on the nature of this adjustment that everything turned. Lamarck had held that the very effort of the individual would have an effect upon his descendants, that the mere exercise of limb would not only strengthen the limb itself in the individual, but would tend to survive in the next generation so that a progeny of stronger limbs would result. This crude and simple view could never explain the whole of the facts. Darwin did not, like the more advanced among his followers, reject in its entirety the Lamarckian theory. He never denied the possibility that the use and disuse of parts might have its effect in heredity, or, in the technical phrase, that acquired modifications might be passed on to descendants, but it was not on this possibility that he relied. He conceived a simpler, but more far-reaching theory of adjustment, for the purposes of which it was necessary to assume nothing beyond causes which could actually be seen at work in miniature. It was necessary to assume in the first place that individuals vary from the parent stock, as we know that they do; it was necessary to assume that some of these variations will be better adapted to the conditions of existence than others, which is scarcely to be denied; and it followed that the individuals who so varied would in the long run, and taking large numbers into account, survive in a larger ratio than others. It followed again that their descendants, starting from the point which they had achieved and varying in the same way in all directions, some for good and some for evil, would be subject to the same sort of elimination on the one hand or of selection on the other; and it followed accordingly that the forms of organic life would undergo in the course of time a greater or less degree of modification. How far this modification would go indeed there was no clear evidence to show, but there was at least the abstract possibility that in this way a simple generic type might by the accumulation of differences split up into species, and these might sub-divide in turn. In this way, as Darwin triumphantly showed in his chapter on Classification, an order resembling that which we actually find in the organic world might be evolved from a very few original forms, and even from a single type.

Since Darwin's time a host of investigators have worked upon the actual mechanism of heredity. The intimate structure of the cell and the mechanism of reproduction, almost unknown when "The Origin of Species" was published, have now yielded up a great part of their secret to the microscope. The aid of mathematics has been called in to elucidate the problems of inheritance, and the nature of variation and the degree in which it is inherited have become matters of exact statistical study. The work of Mendel, whose experiments on heredity were published within seven years of "The Origin of Species," and remained wholly unknown for an entire generation, has been rediscovered, and experiment has been called in to the aid of statistics in the study of variation and inheritance. Most important of all, perhaps, for the final acceptance of the Darwinian theory, it has been shown that the material upon which natural selection has to work is not wholly confined to the small individual variations to which Darwin virtually confined his attention. It is a verified empirical fact that larger, or, as they are called, discontinuous, variations also occur—that they are frequently stable, and probably become the source of new types. The work of De Vries, while tending to modify our conception of the way in which natural selection works, makes it far easier than before to attribute to it the vast effects with which it was credited by Darwin.

The work of Darwin, of course, has had its effect far outside the regions of biology. Everywhere men talk and think in terms of development; and the conception of progress by selection, the survival of the fittest, and the gradual adaptation to environment, are not so much distinct ideas, as categories of thought which shape the mind and determine the way in which every problem is handled. That as such they have often degenerated into a most uncritical usage is a fact to be admitted and deplored. In particular the domination of biology has had a disastrous effect in the field of social and political reform. It has given the seeming sanction of science at one time to a soulless commercialism, at another to the overweening pride of race and the lust of dominion. By one of the paradoxes to which the history of thought is prone, the theory of progress has been in the main a weapon in the hands of intellectual and moral reaction. But every new theory has to go through its infantile diseases. The worst of these arises from that distemper of the mind, peculiarly prevalent in the half-educated world of modern thought, which prompts men to pick up the ideas which specialists have elaborated for their own purposes in their own departments and apply them indiscriminately as catch words to settle questions arising in another sphere. But social life and organic life are not the same thing, and though human society, if Darwin is right, has developed out of the animal world, it is none the less a new product, it lives and moves and has its being in accordance with laws of its own. Just as no scientific ingenuity could explain the simple fact of consciousness in terms of the utmost elaboration of physical process, so no analysis of science can resolve a code of ethics or a conception of religion into a product of the organic struggle. On the contrary, ethics and religion and the whole work of civilisation have as one of their main functions the task of repressing the brute struggle for existence, along with much else that belongs to the mere animality of man.

OUR WANT OF PHILOSOPHERS.

This year of centenaries has naturally turned men's thoughts to a consideration of the limitations and influences which seem to govern national genius. The memories of the great dead have crowded upon us during these weeks, and reflective minds have raised the question why it is that our own race is so much richer in great poets and men of action than in systematic thinkers. Dr. A. C. Bradley stated the problem in a brilliant lecture which he delivered in Manchester on Monday. His judgment is, in brief, that through the whole range of its history English poetry from Chaucer downwards, stands out as the only achievement which can be compared with that of the Greeks. It is a record of genius which has rarely flagged or failed, and its sum total, alike in perfection of form and richness of thought, is a glory which eclipses that of any other race. But in music and in philosophy the palm falls as indisputably to the Germans. As he developed this thesis and sought for its explanation, Dr. Bradley somewhat qualified his generalisation. English philosophy had, after all, its golden time. Locke and Berkeley and Hume—more especially the two latter—are great names, though none of them has exerted an influence so sovereign as Kant's. Why was it that the boldness and originality of eighteenth century speculation seemed to lose its impetus precisely at a time when the revolution and the romantic movement had quickened the pace of the world's thought, and brought to philosophy elsewhere, as to music and poetry, a new depth and intensity, a fresh insight and a wider range?

There was nothing in Leibnitz, still less in his pedantic successors, to prepare the world for the development of German thinking which began with Kant. There was, on the other hand, a subtlety and charm in Berkeley and a trenchant daring in Hume which ought to have resulted in something more notable than the mediocrity and the pedestrian step of the English Utilitarians and the Scottish school of Common Sense. The real spiritual contemporaries of Kant, Fichte, and Hegel in England were rather Coleridge, Wordsworth, and De Quincey. It was the poets alone who seemed to grasp the new orientation of thought. To the professed philosophers it meant less than nothing.

Dr. Bradley propounds an attractive generalisation which seems at first sight to cover the facts. It is that under the influence of excitement, in a great time, when it is natural to believe in the grandeur of the mind of man, and to apply to the whole universe a spiritual interpretation, the English mind expresses itself as naturally in poetry as the German mind finds its utterance in philosophy. It was the same faith in the greatness of man's mind which Wordsworth and Hegel proclaimed, but the one used as his natural medium the concrete imagery of a sensuous form, the other, no less inspired, no less dominated by a glowing excitement and intensity, clothed his convictions in a formidable and elaborate dialectic. So it happens that in a period of "enlightenment" and reason, when the pulse of the age beats steadily and slowly, when "enthusiasm" is regarded as a dangerous and scarcely civilised vagary, English philosophy can show a notable achievement. But let the spiritual temperature rise, and with the new stirring in its blood, it is in poetry rather than in metaphysics that the English mind expresses itself. The explanation is more than plausible; it is illuminating. For undoubtedly there is in the best verse of the time to which Dr. Bradley refers something synoptic and speculative. It was an attempt to read life as a whole and to interpret the universe which Wordsworth was making, and he was hardly less conscious in the task than Hegel. It is quite conceivable that Coleridge, had he been born a century earlier, might have vied with Berkeley, and that Wordsworth in the same case would have written an essay on the Moral Sentiments instead of an Ode to Duty. If one asks, however, why it is that the English temperament turns to a concrete and imaginative expression in its moments of exaltation, while the German finds utterance in transcendental philosophy, the answer, on Dr. Bradley's theory, can only be that such is the mysterious individuality of race.

For our part, we confess ourselves more than a little sceptical. Is there, after all, in the permanent conditions of English and German life any influence of climate or institutions which could explain so great a divergence? The harsher landscapes of Germany do not differ very greatly in their emotional suggestions from those of our own East Coast, nor its gentler landscapes from those of our South and West. Society and religion are organised at all events in Scotland and the North of England on a broadly similar basis. The same Reformation, with Calvinism and Lutheranism in the one case, Presbyterianism and Anglicanism in the other, created the foundations on which each nation reared its thinking. A Celtic admixture in the one case, a Slavonic strain in the other, introduced into the original Teutonic stock a more passionate and wayward tendency. It is hard to see what steady causes could have turned one branch of the same race to poetry and the other to philosophy. Nor does it seem to us at all convincing to suggest that the phase of English thinking, represented by Locke, Berkeley, and Hume, used the categories of the understanding rather than the imagery of the sense, simply because its temperature was low and its mood even. Locke and Hobbes were the theorists of a time of civil war at least as stirring and as intransigeant as the nationalist struggle which found its orator and its thinker in Fichte. It was a time which produced in England both poetry and philosophy, and Milton interrupted his creative work to take part in its controversies. Dr. Bradley's theory, if it were to cover all the facts, would have to explain why the seventeenth century in England produced a Milton as well as a Locke, no less than the failure of the nineteenth century to produce a native philosopher parallel to Wordsworth.

The decay of original speculation after Hume is none the less exceedingly curious. We are inclined to think that the fact which explains it is less fundamental than any ingrained peculiarity of our racial temperament. From the Cartesians down to Hume, philosophy everywhere in Europe had cut itself adrift from the Universities. It was in revolt against the schools, and it preserved a freedom of form and a relative absence of elaboration which were natural in the work of isolated minds who gave their thoughts to the learned world in detached essays. Descartes, drafting a method between his campaigns, his travels, and his physical experiments, Leibnitz philosophising amid his diplomacy, Berkeley combining metaphysics with mathematics, preaching, and the praises of tar-water, were typical of their epoch. It ran its natural course, and explored problems which awaited for further conquests a more systematic, a less amateurish treatment. Scholasticism, meanwhile, had died of inanition in the Universities, and once more their opportunity had arrived. England was not yet ready, partly because her universities were still at a low ebb of intellectual life, and partly because they offered so few inducements, as compared with those of Germany, to men prepared to devote all their time and energy to speculation. They were still clerical strongholds, in which a fixed and traditional creed forbade free speculation. There was no place at Oxford or Cambridge for a man who would have given such courses as Kant gave at Königsberg, and it was precisely because the Scottish universities gave at that time more encouragement to the systematic teaching of philosophy that the work of the Scottish school, mediocre though it was, seems less fatally inadequate and less provincial than the contemporary English speculation. The significance of German philosophy may really lie in the fact that it was from Kant to Lotze and Wundt (with the single notable exception of Schopenhauer) a university philosophy. English thinking meanwhile, from Bentham to Spencer, pursued its course aloof from the universities, and it was ultimately only in the universities, with Green and Caird, that it really recovered if not its individuality, at least a real sense for the meaning of metaphysical problems. If there is anything in this evidently relevant set of facts, the conclusion would seem to be not at all that the English genius is inadequate to the severer work of philosophy, but rather that by an unlucky historical accident it lacked the academic discipline and the academic opportunity.

THE LONELY MEN.

They live amid the pulsating throb and din of countless lives, in the City of the Great Unrest; but they pass their days in crowded solitude, and in silence, surrounded by the sound of speech.

The reasons of their loneliness are various. From a pride too poor for intimacy with friends, and a poverty not poor enough to herd, they spend long days and evenings by themselves. From the bitterness of failure or mistake, or because of endeavor which must work alone, or by reason of isolating thought, they want for the friendly intercourse that cheers.

Thus, gradually they change from need of speech, and come to think about things curiously, and think too much, and lose the way to laugh; and by degrees they shun their friends for want of what to say, so that they miss the chance of knowing other men. For theirs is the loneliness that rusts and dulls and binds—the city solitude among the crowds.

During the day the lucky ones have work; for only while they really work can they forget. Because in the streets they see so many pairs, talking and nodding and laughing, as they go, and the calm companionship of conscious sympathy, or the bend and question of a lover's look, and the woman's little happy, hovering smile. Even they who have hours of idleness can gain a consolation from the light of day, and can invent the distraction of imaginary busyness, and long-distance errands, to fill their time and mind.

But the night and evening hours are the danger time. Because after dark the city seems to change into a mighty camp of cosy firesides, where families and friends and lovers sit in quiet, comfortable peacefulness, behind the tantalising squares of lighted blind. Or, in the blazing, scintillating glare of lighted places, it becomes a fair, with nothing but happiness beneath, where smiling, whispering couples, and contented pairs, and gay, laughing parties, free from care, amuse themselves in quiet merriment, or in brilliant scenes of revelry and fun. For, with the jaundiced eyes of loneliness, they only see the contrasts to their state—the gay companionships, the friendships, and the love.

But even so they seek the busy streets, and the places where the merry people throng, at night and in the hours of their ease, to watch and feel the jostle of the crowds, for company. For when they shut their room-door on the world, after the work or occupation of the day is done, they hear, though they read or try to sleep, the city's roar. And to the moaning murmur of its hum, their taunted, envious imagination works; they see bright scenes of brilliant merriment, or whispering companionships, or the shaded, lamplight peacefulness of home. Then the burden of their loneliness settles down, so that the empty heaviness of it hurts.

According to the habits of their state, they act. In the streets, they look up quickly at a laugh, and notice what talking people do not see; they loiter listlessly from shop to shop, gazing indifferently at everything; at times they hug their loneliness, and stoop and brood; and they speak quite loudly to themselves to use their voice. In the restaurants they look and look, with following, interested, regretful eyes; and they talk with strangers, where the custom of the place permits; and they linger with reluctance to depart into the greater isolation of the streets, paying for extra drink to keep their place amid the noise and merriment of those who dine in company. After their solitary, protracted meal, they tramp for miles. With aimless determination to avoid their home, they walk and walk through unfamiliar streets and quiet squares, seeing only always the glow of lighted blinds, and the parting pairs who kiss and hurry home. Or they moon about amid the glare of the streets where the places of amusement are, and watch the lighted laughter of the crowds, and the flashing couples which the cab lamps show. Until the crowds begin to thin they walk. For by their nightly meal and wanderings they cheat the evening hours and the night.

And they very often pay to be amused, careless or wilfully forgetful of what they spend; but they sit without a smile through funny plays, or stand and smoke, with an apathetic stare, leaning against the barrier of a lounge, while expert entertainers earn applause. It is not that they do not understand the wit or the labor of trained skill, but they come so frequently that they do not care. They only seek the company of crowds, and something to look at to forget themselves. But, in spite of their conscious plan or subterfuge, the silent loneliness is always there.

The dangers of their state are manifold. For by their lonely side Temptation walks, and whispers, and points an easy way to company or escape.

Many listen eagerly at once in the hope of a permanent release. Driven by the fear of lonely years, they seek their few forgotten friends, and claim their aid, and, after deliberate introductions, they choose a wife, as men engage a clerk—the first who seems to suit; or, forgetful of the gulfs of interests and thought, they take a mate, unlearned and lowly bred, because of a sudden easy opportunity; or, in a panic of faint-heartedness, they pawn their privilege to work and earn, for a sorry dependence that obeys the wishes of an unloved, moneyed wife. These, by their haste or calculation, err; so that they come to look and hear and wonder why, in after years.

And others, in rebellion at their lot, defiantly contrive a temporary companionship. In dreary dissipations of a night, or in fierce allegiances of crowded months, while passion grows and scorches and burns out to the ashes of a mutual disregard, or in quiet companionships that only break one law, they buy or get by favor what they want. Others may try to turn away at first from what to them seems sin, because of fears or training or beliefs; but the want of company is more than these. So, after arguments, they also seek relief where Love is passion or a thing for sale. And while they hope to lose their loneliness, they lock lead weights of habit to their feet, that hold them back from knowing better things; or they raise a barrier of offended codes between themselves and the women who make homes. A greater loneliness is theirs, and the bitterness of thinking, at the end.

Others imperceptibly succumb to a little whisper, urging them to be gay; and they make their seldom evening with a friend an occasion for unwonted revelry. But in the many intervals of silent days the little whisper grows and grows and grows with the memories of past light-heartedness. So, when their loneliness envelops them one night, they drink alone; and they chaff themselves for drinking by themselves. But, with the knowledge of a quick content, the need of it seems gradually to grow; so that they think more often of escape. And when they think, they argue with themselves, in the street or in the quiet of their rooms; and they pause and swear and finally succumb. With every argued drink, they argue less, over a period of resisting years, until they forget the reason of their need. These, at the last, repay their borrowed hours of escape with days of maudlin, impotent remorse, or lifetimes in the awful peopled wastes of drunken fear.

Thus many, in their efforts to escape, burden or waste or throw away their lives. And they only get the blame for what they do, though the maddening activity of the city drives them on. For they are judged from the cold stone throne of reason by those who do not know.

Some patient ones drag on without relief through a growing dreariness of silent years, numbed into something less than feeling men. By accepted necessity and slow degrees, they learn to forget their wish for company; and they steep themselves in thoughts about their work, or theories upon abstract things; or they get a meagre joy from looking on, pretending that they like to be alone, and making companions of the city's sights and beauty and the sparrows in the parks. And when they die, only a cousin or a lawyer or a landlord knows.

But many win their freedom in the end, through labor and luck to company and love. And, though the streets no longer draw them out, and the quiet evenings fill them with repose, they never quite forget the lonely years. When they hear of the reckless, pitiable folly of a wasted life, in the city's annals of tragedy and sin, they think and remember and condone. For by the lesson of their loneliness they learned.

THE MATINGS OF VALENTINE'S DAY.

It is usually accounted a myth—at any rate, by those who live in the towns—that the birds pair on St. Valentine's Day. But it may confidently be stated that whoever goes out into field and woodland to-morrow, if it be a day of average spring progress, and not one of erratic set-back, will see many sights and hear many sounds to warrant the belief that now the advance on spring begins in earnest. The plovers, beautifully groomed and crested, will be walking the fields in pairs and bowing to one another in their pretty way; the wood-pigeons will be cooing ecstatically; the woods will echo with the ringing cry of the ox-eye; you may see two robins at once instead of the moody Laras that have sentinelled the path through the winter; the jays will be lollopping about so as to show one another all the beauties of their plumage; chaffinches, greenfinches, hedge sparrows, and yellow-hammers will be singing love songs or battle songs, according to their nature, and making the latter very realistic action songs.

We know that this will be so, for the simple reason that it was so, to some extent, yesterday, and one or two yesterdays before that. Those sturdy ruffians, the ravens, have even built their nest, which, perhaps, contains an egg or two. These obviously life-mated birds do not recognise social duties, and have not, therefore, any kind of honeymooning to observe after the breaking up of a winter flock, as most of the other birds have. The flocking habit of nearly all our birds makes it almost impossible for us to say whether they mate for life or no. It may be that those spring battles in which the valiant chaffinches, for example, indulge are normally undertaken by birds of last year who have never mated, and merely observed by the older birds as a knightly ceremony to please their secure hens. We cannot urge so flattering a presumption in favor of the sparrows, a chattering string of whom passes the window as we write. Sparrows are never satisfied with the allocations of St. Valentine. Long after nests have been started, we see these bickerings, in which those who ought to be staid married people join, openly flying down from their nests when the nucleus of a sparrow tangle passes their way. And the ungallant sparrow is far less occupied in tilting with rivals for the smiles of a lady than in joining them in one universal attempted, though not very successful, bullying of the hen that is the centre of their group.

Such are the sparrows, but we see no reason why the flocks of splendidly-colored tits should not split now into the identical pairs of last summer, and leave only the young to make new alliances. It is a point fairly easy to test by means of the nesting box. We can, with practical certainty, get the birds into as many boxes as we like, and at the right time it is easy enough to catch them and mark them with tiny leglets to be looked for again next summer. As far as casual observation serves, the same birds, and both of them, do come again to the same nesting site. They scold us from the same bough, and, as it seems, in the same voice and vocabulary, and use the same perches when they feed their young. Our belief that they are the same pair is a tender one. Perhaps we fear to put it to the test. At any rate, there is something charming and not unnatural in the idea that in the season when there is no marrying or giving in marriage each pair sinks its individuality in the social amenities of the flock, and that the return of spring brings them together without regard to the other attractions that the party affords. However that may be, the tits that have attracted one another draw imperceptibly apart day by day as the sun returns to our hemisphere. There is little or no fighting about it. Gorgeousness of plumage wins the day—at any rate, in the case of a new alliance. The school cry of food found has a special significance for her who has looked favorably upon the splendid gentleman who utters it. By and by it ceases to be a pack cry; it becomes a mate call, and then there is built upon it the love song. The pack becomes not merely no necessity, but a bore, and the two wander off into the wood alone, house-hunting.

When the tit band breaks up, it releases one or two other interesting co-foragers. Our best band this winter, which consists mainly of blue and great tits, has included most regularly a lesser spotted wood-pecker. He is a rare bird, and has already departed in quest of his mate. Possibly they arranged some sort of tacit rendezvous last autumn. It may be that he knew what other band she was in, and that they have seen one another frequently during the winter. The delicate little pearl-spotted tree-creepers have both been with the tits all the winter, and so no doubt assails their record for constancy. Their call has grown longer, sweeter, and more cheerful and we are listening hard for the love warble, a zither-like tinkle so high and rare that scarcely one naturalist in a hundred has heard it. The nut-hatches have been sometimes together and sometimes widely separate. But now they are constantly together again. It seemed to us that one day this week he elaborately pretended to be a stranger, wooing, as a new love, his mate of last year. He sat far apart on an orchard bough, which, for this one occasion, he straddled with his claws, instead of sitting in a line with it, and he threw his head up in an entirely new pose, and see-sawed his doleful song to the heartless solitude. And she, coming near as the tits wandered along their diurnal round, caught the song, no doubt with a start of simulated astonishment, and came to see what clever troubador it could be that warbled so sweetly. And now perhaps the tit band will see her no more till next autumn.

The fable, if it should be one, that the birds mate on St. Valentine's Day, must not be shattered. Blessed be the man or woman who goes out on that very day to see whether or no it is so. Anyone who does so is certain to see many sights to support the theory. Some, but not all, will have been seen some days earlier by careful observers who do not wait upon dates. The lark is high in the sky, gurgling out rich globules of song; the thrush gives his melodious recitative of "I know it, I know it"; even the rook flirts his tail and spatchcocks his wings, and is like one attempting a tune on a motor horn. The performance is not absolutely without rehearsal, nor is it completely full-dress. But it is now, for the first time, of a strength that justifies the poetic ones in declaring that here is a critical day in the solar calendar.

Ever since the annual course of the sun has been appreciated the half-way day between the winter solstice and the vernal equinox has been specially observed. It was by a kind of inevitable fate that the observance of this day of St. Valentine was ever introduced, a solar feast, into the midst of a Christian year. If Romulus and Remus were ever suckled by a wolf, it could not have happened in mid-February, since wolf-cubs are born in May. So the Roman feast of the Lupercal was a poorly disguised foundation on the mid-winter solar festival of the Egyptians and older people. Its nature can be gathered from the opening scene of Shakespeare's "Julius Cæsar":—

> Enter Anthony for the course.
> CÆSAR. Calphurnia,—
> CALPHURNIA. Here, my lord.
> CÆSAR. Stand you directly in Antonius' way,
> When he doth run his course.—Antonius.
> ANTONY. Cæsar, my lord.
> CÆSAR. Forget not, in your speed, Antonius,
> To touch Calphurnia; for our elders say,
> The barren, touched in this holy chase,
> Shake off their sterile curse.

It was as a counterblast to the pagan Lupercal that the Christian Church, not wishing to strain the bottle with wine that was too new, instituted the Feast of St. Valentine. It was probably a purer feast, but it must have appeared to some as a little hypocritical. It has gone from the calendar of the Church, and is almost obliterated as a popular sunmark. But it can only really vanish as a fact when the light of the sun dies down or the inclination of his orbit undergoes radical change.

Present-Day Problems.

A MUNICIPAL CIVIL SERVICE.

IN America the term "Civil Service" is applied to local as well as to State and Federal appointments. In England, by some accident of language, we never use it when speaking of municipal affairs. When an elementary teacher, for instance, says that he wants to be made a "civil servant," he always means that he wants to become a servant of the central instead of the local State. It is, I believe, largely owing to this accident that no statesman has ever considered the question of reforming our system of municipal appointments. It does not occur to the President of the Local Government Board that the clerks in an urban district office, though they are called by a different name, belong to the same administrative species as the kindly and cultivated gentlemen who tolerate his existence and form his opinions.

The municipal officials, however, are already about as numerous as the State officials, spend a good deal more money, and do more good or harm to the ordinary citizen. Why, then, should not the same precautions be taken in municipal appointments as have been found necessary in State appointments? There is no answer except mere inertia.

The objects at which Mr. Gladstone aimed when in 1870 he adopted Sir Charles Trevelyan's plan of "open competition" for the Government Departments were—first, to prevent the kind of influence which is created when the servants of the State owe their positions to the favor of party politicians, and, next, to secure a high degree of ability in the persons appointed. Does the first of those evils exist in the present enormous municipal service, with its eighty thousand or so members? If the Government would appoint a small Royal or Departmental Commission they could soon find out. Let them question a few of the more vigorous town clerks and medical officers of health, and they would soon get evidence that political influence is a hindrance to efficiency. And if the Commission undertook an independent enquiry into the circumstances attending the appointment of town and county chief clerks themselves they would probably find an unduly large proportion of cases in which the successful candidate was, before his appointment, a prominent politician on the side of the party then in power. Or let them follow up the Mile End or West Ham enquiries by a rigorous investigation of the circumstances under which all appointments were made by the bodies implicated.

A few local bodies, among which is the London County Council, have systems of competition. But even among London bodies such an arrangement is an exception, and a member of the London County Council who was a member of the first Metropolitan Water Board told me how surprised and disgusted he was to find himself pestered by every post with applications for his good will in favor of the introduction of this or that candidate into the new service.

But municipal efficiency is endangered not only by the conditions under which local appointments are made, but also by the low standard of ability with which local bodies are often contented. The main body of municipal officials begin their work as boys, and the elected members are apt to act, as many of them do in their own businesses, on the idea that one boy is as good as another. When I was on the School Board for London we had a rule that all appointments of junior clerks should be advertised. But as each appointment in the School Management Department came up, the older officials used to point out to me, with perfect truth, that an advertisement would produce hundreds, or even thousands, of applicants, among whom it would be practically impossible to distinguish. It would further be explained that a "temporary youth" was already doing the work satisfactorily, and that it would therefore be much better to suspend the rule, and appoint a lad who knew the work, had given satisfaction, and was in any case as good as the one whom we might pick out of the crowd of applicants. If one asked how the "temporary youth" happened to be there, one was told that he had been recommended by some influential person.

A Commission would probably find some arrangement of the kind in many municipal offices. The private employer who takes boys into his business on such a plan, afterwards makes a rough sort of selection by dismissing them as easily as he accepts them. But a local body is not likely to dismiss anyone, especially a young clerk with friends, unless he grossly misbehaves himself. The Commission, therefore, would probably find that the main mass of officials who have spent their lives in the service of the local bodies are a little below the average commercial clerk in native ability, ambition, and intellectual interests.

If I were an American, with the touching American belief in the sufficiency of virtuous intentions and a few plain rules for all the problems of life, I should urge that Parliament should pass an Act of one clause applying what the Americans call "civil service principles" to all local appointments. Every local body would henceforth be required to make all its appointments on the result of a competitive examination.

But I ask for a Commission instead of a short Act, because I believe that no such simple remedy is sufficient. For one thing, the setting up of an examination is highly skilled work, and (as I found when some of us induced the London School Board to arrange for a competition) it is almost impossible to persuade a local body to allow hard enough questions to be asked to give the cleverer boys in the modern municipal secondary schools a chance to distinguish themselves. It is also a difficult matter to decide at what age the candidates should enter. Probably a good-sized town would be wise to take in two grades of clerks—one at fifteen and another from among the scholarship holders of eighteen or nineteen. Very few local authorities, however, have sufficient appointments to justify even a single examination of their own, and arrangements would therefore be necessary for the holding of joint examinations either by groups of municipal bodies or by the county councils or by the State.

Again, to many local posts more or less technical in character men or women of full age ought to be appointed, and we in England think that in such cases competitive examination is not a good method of selection. For a few of these adult appointments—medical officers of health, for instance—the State already requires as a condition of its grants that the person appointed should be possessed of certain professional qualifications. This principle could be largely extended, and might well be combined with regulations with regard to committee procedure for securing that appointments, even among qualified persons, should, as far as possible, be kept "out of politics." A large and increasing proportion of the officials appointed by local bodies are teachers. A few years ago it was easy to prevent undue influence in their appointment, because the supply of qualified men and women was much less than the demand. Now the supply is catching up the demand, local managers are urging that they should be given more powers, and if educational appointments are not to get into "politics" such precautions in the way of definite recommendation by responsible officials as have already been adopted by the London County Council will be required throughout the country.

The Commission would therefore probably draw up a scheme for dealing with separate sections of the problem in different ways—competitive examinations for young clerks and for admission to teachers' training colleges, a list of qualifications for accountants, town clerks, and others who at present are often technically unqualified, and, finally, rules as to procedure intended to increase the likelihood of impartiality in appointments from a list of adult applicants to advertised posts. Under such conditions municipal service would soon become a more self-respecting and vigorous profession.

It is well known that a very large part of the admitted efficiency of municipal administration in Germany is due to the existence of an independent body of officials, called the Magistrat, side by side with the elected councillors. The German system is, perhaps, incompatible with any real local self-government, but in England we think that we have in our central Civil Service learned to combine professional skill with representative control, and it ought not to be impossible to invent the necessary machinery for securing the same results in municipal organisation.

Such an invention could only be made by Commissioners who were prepared both to work and to think. But when once made and adopted, it would not only protect local public life against the invasion of many subtle forms of corruption, but would, without increased expense, raise enormously the intellectual standard and therefore the practical effect of local administration. In the municipal offices, as well as in the Whitehall departments that great saying of John Stuart Mill holds good— that "Mediocrity should not be concerned in the affairs of State."

GRAHAM WALLAS.

The Drama.

SAMSON AND SOME OTHERS.

Sardou being dead, M. Henry Bernstein has practically a monopoly of the export trade in French drama; which is as much as to say that he is a second-rate dramatist. And "Samson" is far from being his best work. It is second-rate of the second-rate: I am not sure—nor does it greatly matter—whether that works out at third-rate or fourth-rate. Its purely theatrical qualities are such that it promises to be a success at the Garrick Theatre; and there is no particular reason why it should not succeed. It is one of those clever toys which appeal to grown-up children all the world over. But Mr. Sutro's treatment of a variant of the same story, in "The Walls of Jericho," had much more genuine merit.

Of course, I speak of it as I find it in its English form. From Mr. Walkley's criticism I gather that the translator has done some injustice to M. Bernstein's "psychology." Assuredly there is not much of that left in the English version, which, for the rest, seems to be a quite competent piece of work.

A few weeks ago, in writing of "Grit" at the Kingsway Theatre, I enumerated the leading examples of the "Maître de Forges" theme from "The Lady of Lyons" onwards. Readers who follow the transactions of the "Maître de Forges" theme, from "The Lady of "Samson," which was doubtless already familiar to them. My excuse is the same as Dr. Johnson's—"Ignorance, madam; pure ignorance." In my youth it used to be the chief duty of the English critic to keep abreast of the French drama; but now that we have a drama of our own, I am perhaps culpably content to fall behind the march of events in Paris. At any rate it had not dawned on me that this "Samson," which I had seen quoted as one of the gilt-edged securities of the theatrical market, was nothing but a rehandling of the dismal old "Maître de Forges" story. It says much for M. Bernstein's adroitness that he has contrived to squeeze a certain novelty of effect out of a subject which appeared to be hopelessly wrung dry.

One can trace very clearly the process of thought whereby the play was engendered. The story of the virile, masterful plebeian married to the haughty patrician damsel, and ultimately dominating and subduing her, had proved itself again and again to possess extraordinary attractions for the multitude. It could not but occur, then, to a playwright in quest of world-wide success; for nothing is so safe as a hackneyed theme that can be tricked out with a false air of novelty. But was not this one altogether too hackneyed? At what point could any gloss of novelty be applied to it? M. Bernstein went, with true instinct, straight to the variable point, if I may call it so. He spared us all the preliminaries of the marriage—the proud but penniless family; the rich and adoring, but more or less uncouth, wooer; the maiden's icy, petrified consent. He spared us—and for this we may be truly grateful—the home-coming after the marriage. All this tediously familiar business he skipped, indicating it only in a few words of exposition. He saw that the variable point was the husband's treatment of the aristocratic lover, and he made straight for that. In essence, of course, it must be a duel; but there are many ways of duelling, and M. Bernstein thought of a new one. Yet even here he contrived to stick to pretty safe lines of convention. It has been proved over and over again that the public not only excuses but applauds a wronged husband who, declining to expose himself to the rapier or the pistol of a deadly swashbuckler, chooses his own weapons, and crushes the villain in his own way. This, in its essence, is the plan adopted by M. Bernstein's Jacques Brachard. The novelty lies in the fact that, in order to ruin the villain, Brachard, like Samson of old, brings the Bourse down about his own ears, and emerges from the crash a financially dishonored pauper. That is the novelty of M. Bernstein's invention—and a precious novelty it is! We have in English a phrase which exactly describes Brachard's conduct: he cuts off his nose to spite his face, This is not usually considered a heroic or even a sane course of action; rather it is a byword of folly. But the theatrical public will forgive anything for a "strong scene"; and the scene in which Brachard keeps the villain imprisoned and impotent, while his fortune crumbles away, is undoubtedly a strong one—if we leave common sense and common honesty out of the question.

Common sense must also be kept at arm's length if we are to accept the incidents which lead up to this strong scene, in the English play. I gather from Mr. Walkley that in the French play they are less incredible; but what do I, or the general public, know of the French play? It is essential to the popularity of the good old story that the haughty heroine should at last fall into the arms of the rough-diamond hero, saying—or words to that effect. Now, if the villain had actually seduced her, the circumstance would have cast a regrettable cloud over this supreme moment; wherefore her virtue must at all hazards remain intact. But, on the other hand, had she resolutely repulsed the villain's suit, Jacques Brachard's motive for playing the part of Samson might have struck even the theatrical public as a trifle thin. It might have seemed a little improbable that a millionaire should insist on ruining himself because another gentleman had made fruitless advances to his wife. How, then, does the playwright—or his adaptor—escape from this difficulty? In a very amazing fashion. Jessie—the villain is called Jessie; I really don't know why—has almost vanquished the resistance of the heroine. She has consented to seize the opportunity of her husband's absence from home, and to pay a midnight visit to the villain's flat. One would imagine that Jessie would be content with this arrangement; but, instead of taking her straight to his rooms, he must needs conduct her first of all to a revolting and indescribable orgie at a disreputable restaurant, from which she escapes, horror-stricken, and rushes home. What an incredible and imbecile Jessie! It is afterwards explained that his motive was to compromise her; but what a strange and roundabout method to adopt! The psychology of Brachard presents no difficulties to me; he is simply afflicted with a new and acute variety of the age-old foolishness of the hero of theatrical romance. But in the psychology of Jessie I cannot but suspect some hiatus, due either to the adaptor or the censor. The real, original, Parisian Jessie can scarcely have been such an astounding ass.

> "Vous êtes mon lion, superbe et généreux;

To sum up, then, the play is fundamentally a piece of threadbare romantic nonsense. But it has been adroitly furbished up, and made to appear new, by the aid of a hitherto unthought-of and theatrically effective extravagance—for Brachard's conduct is extravagant in every sense of the word. The acting is quite good. One has yet to see, indeed, the rough diamond hero who should impart any touch of real uncouthness to the character. Mr. Norman McKinnell, in the first act of "Grit," made some effort in that direction; but it did not come to much in the later acts. As for Mr. Bourchier, he plays the dock-porter-millionaire exactly as he would play a duke if such a character came in his way. His performance is vigorous, incisive, telling; but there is no more of the rough-diamond in it than is inseparable from the actor's somewhat bluff and burly personality. The play is a man's, not a woman's, play, and the character of Anne-Marie is distinctly "sacrificed"; but Miss Violet Vanbrugh embodies it charmingly.

It chanced that, after seeing "Samson" on a Saturday afternoon, I went in the evening to see the last performance of "Diana of Dobson's" at the Kingsway Theatre. What a refreshing difference of atmosphere! The English comedy (I had never seen it before) is original, fresh, life-like, humane; the French drama is conventional, laborious, far-fetched, brutal. It is difficult, of course, to find any common measure between two such utterly disparate works; and I daresay M. Bernstein has a good deal more specifically dramatic power than Miss Cicely Hamilton. But the contrast between my afternoon's and my evening's entertainment made me doubly appreciate Miss Lena Ashwell's faithful adherence to English drama. And how fine was the acting at the Kingsway! Not only was Miss Ashwell herself quite admirable in the title part, but Mr. Dennis Eadie gave a brilliantly original performance of a self-made magnate, and Mr. C. M. Hallard was excellent as an ineffectual ex-Guardsman. Mr. Hallard, too, showed unsuspected power as a character-actor in the front-piece, Judge Parry's clever little comedy, "Charlotte on Bigamy." Altogether, Miss Ashwell's Kingsway management is, to my mind, a singularly praiseworthy and promising artistic enterprise.

Mr. H. B. Irving's "Hamlet," at the Shaftesbury, is a strong, straightforward, intelligent, effective rendering of the part, which scarcely, however, reaches the highest rank. Its radical defect seems to me to lie in the intractable quality of the actor's voice, which prevents him from getting sufficient variety into his utterance of emotion. There is no penetrating tenderness, no note of pathos in his organ; it can rouse, but it cannot thrill. If I may use a color metaphor, it seems to me uniformly sombre—a voice in mourning. This lack of flexibility and range was felt most in the ghost scenes of the first act, from which the effect of awe and mystery was almost wholly absent. The later scenes were very much better. In all the more even passages, such as the scenes with the players and with Horatio, Mr. Irving was excellent; in the scenes with Ophelia and with his mother he had many admirable touches; and his play scene was remarkably strong. Throughout he showed the distinction inseparable from his race, and his reading of the lines was always intelligent without affectation. Miss Dorothea Baird's Ophelia was very graceful and pathetic, and the production was adequate without lavishness.

SCOTTISH PAINTING.*

IT has often been remarked, sometimes with bitterness, that the artists who contrive to make the most stir in modern English exhibitions are the Scottish artists. Certainly the invasion of England by the latter was never so marked as at the present time. Never a season passes but that they are strongly represented at all the principal London galleries, including the Academy itself; and, what is more, their propensity for taking up residence in London, as well as deluging its exhibitions with their works, is, if anything, on the increase. Yet the true-born Englishman, who feels humiliated at the thought that the foremost props of that very English institution, the Royal Academy, hailed from north of the Tweed; that Arthur Melville, perhaps the most brilliant water-colorist of latter days that the Old Society could boast, was a Scotsman; that the three most acclaimed living etchers in the kingdom—Strang, Cameron, and Muirhead Bone—are all of the same race, has at least one reflection to console himself with. It is that the present state of affairs has existed almost as long as Scottish art itself. Before Raeburn, it is true, the number of those who migrated to London and achieved any success was very small, and Raeburn himself remained faithful to Edinburgh. But Wilkie established himself here, and since his day the influx of talented Scotsmen who thought it worth while—a few have not—has steadily increased. At certain times in the last century the migratory wave was very large and formidable. When Scott Lauder's pupils—Orchardson, Murray, McWhirter, Pettie, and the rest—descended upon our metropolis, and, one by one, stormed the Academy's portals with success, it seemed for a while as if no other artists save Scots were possible in this country; and, had not several of them proved by their subsequent work that the Academy influence was stronger even than a Scotsman's talent, this mild reflection might have become a serious feeling of panic. The Glasgow School wave spent its superfluous force on the Continent, and it was only the backwash that eddied round the London studios; still, even this was not without effects of some importance. And when the New English Art Club was started, and the International Society prepared to hold its first exhibition in London, it was, again, the Scottish element that lent most support to these bodies.

If the unceasing immigration of Scotsmen is disconcerting to the English artist, it is almost equally so to the historian of Scottish art. We think, however, that Mr. James L. Caw, the author of the exhaustive volume on "Scottish Painting Past and Present," which lies before us, has fully realised the difficulties of the position, and has partially, if not wholly, overcome them. The expedient he has adopted is the division of Scottish painters into Scots and Anglo-Scots, the latter being those who have emigrated early or late in their careers; and, though the one class must occasionally overlap the other in any attempt to deal synthetically with Scottish painting, the boundary line between them is, on the whole, fairly well marked. Neither has he committed the mistake which many writers as patriotic as himself, but less conscientious, might have made—namely, that of endeavoring to "rope in" every artist of talent who can boast a Scottish name; he exacts from each the qualifications of residence in and personal association with the art world of the North. He does not insist on the matter of birthplace, otherwise Mr. Lavery, whose artistic relationship to the Glasgow School is beyond dispute, but who was born in Belfast, would have no place in this volume. On the other hand, he is careful not to include Whistler on the ground of that master's affinity to the same group, or because he once wrote to a provost, saying that he had Scottish blood in his veins.

The second portion of this volume, which deals with the modern school from Raeburn onwards, is by far the larger and the more important. Raeburn is universally admitted to have been the first of the modern Scotsmen, and before his time there was no artist of really wide distinction. The "old masters"—George Jamesone, Aikman, the Scougalls, and so forth—are interesting mainly as examples of the Continental thraldom to which the art of the country was for long subjected. Painting in Scotland, while it developed on very similar lines to that in England, was even later in assuming a national character, and its progress was less continuous. For one thing, the circumstances were less favorable. The country remained in a state of political and religious turmoil until towards the close of the eighteenth century. Then the traditional intercourse with the Continent, while it resulted in the importation of many foreign artists, did not attract the best of them. Edinburgh could offer no inducement to a Vandyke or even a Lely; the result was that she was fain to put up with a Medina. Thus Scottish painting was but little benefited by foreign teaching, and the incursion of foreigners had one rather serious effect, in that it led to the growth of a native taste that altogether discouraged the prospects of native painting. Hence, at an early date, began that exodus of native talent, to which we have referred, and by the time matters righted themselves, and Scottish patrons of art began to take a practical interest in the home painters, the migratory habit, which is characteristic of all Scotsmen, had grown so strong in Scottish artists that they could not be stayed. Yet this circumstance did not prevent the rapid rise of a national spirit in painting, when once the hour and the man had arrived. The man was Raeburn—he who, as R. A. M. Stevenson said, was the chief link in the development of direct painting between Velasquez and Hals and the modern schools—and the investigation of character, combined with expressive brush work, which belong to his art, began what has now come to be regarded as the essential in Scottish portraiture. Naturalism in other branches and romanticism followed later; upon the heels of that pride of home episodes, characters and customs, that manifested itself in the art of Wilkie, and on the awakening of that reverence for country which Scott so greatly fostered and encouraged. In landscape the naturalistic movement was later than in portraiture and genre. Thomson, of Duddingston, was contemporary with Constable, but it is difficult to find much affinity between his naturalism and that of the English master. The Scotsman's work is far more palpably directed by conventions, and, while much of it is fine in conception and reverential in treatment, it is largely literary in spirit. The true Scottish landscape belongs to a later decade.

During the nineteenth century the history of Scottish painting follows that of the art in England more or less closely. The lapse into triviality that befell English painting in the second quarter of that century was echoed in Scotland by the painters who followed Wilkie. The revolt against convention, which here took the form of the pre-Raphaelite movement, was there represented, with a totally different set of aspirations attached to it, by the Scott Lauder school. This was followed by a period of pictorial anecdotage in both countries, and this again, in the eighties, by a powerful swing of the pendulum towards the other extreme. Out of the reaction arose the Glasgow School, with its war-cry of "Values, values," borrowed from Paris, and its sturdy flouting of Academic authority; contemporaneously with the Newlyn School, though its exponents, again, differed from those of the latter as emphatically as did Lauder's pupils from Holman Hunt and Rossetti. The relationship of the arts of the two countries is, in fact, a study of great interest, if of some complexity; and in Mr. Caw's volume it proves very interesting indeed, for not only does he provide us with a completely up-to-date and finely-illustrated dictionary of Scottish painters, but also with an able summary of those qualities, of that latent instinct for color in a colorful land, of that virility in technique, and of that homely sentiment, which are characteristic of what is best in the painting of his country.

WHAT WORKMEN THINK OF CONSCRIPTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Compulsory military service has hardly yet been sprung upon the working classes as a question that must be settled at once if the country is not to go quickly to the dogs. We have not yet been forced, with the usual mixture of soft soap and browbeating, to vote for or against it whether we want to or not; as, for instance, we were forced to vote on education and licensing if we wished to vote for Tariff Reform or Free Trade. We have not yet had hammered into us as many whole truths of the matter, all different, as there are political parties. Our vote isn't wanted yet. The country is being educated up to the idea—those who have least to lose by it first. There have, however, even here, been lectures and debates where comfortable gentlemen, too old themselves for military service, aided by maps on which they had half forgotten their way about, foretold terrible things—invasion and Imperial ruin—unless we adopted some form of conscription, or, as they pleasantly called it, universal training. When we have had nothing better to do, we have been to those free entertainments, and afterwards have talked the matter over among ourselves. Possibly we understand as much about it now as we shall do when electioneers and the ha'penny press have been trying to hoodwink our one eye or the other. At any rate, we can see pretty plainly how any form whatever of compulsory military training must necessarily touch us.

The arguments in favor of it seem to run on two main lines: (1) necessity, (2) morals. We are told, without sure proof, that the country is defenceless against invasion. But we have also been told, and on just as good authority, that if the Navy fails an Army of able-bodied men in the country could not save us from starvation. And we hear nothing about compulsory naval service. If the Navy does not need compulsion to make it certainly the better service of the two, why does the Army need it? The Navy, moreover, has fewer men to recruit from, for fewer men are cut out for seafaring than for military work.

The moral argument is, as a rule, the harder pressed, no doubt because the talking legislating classes are always so much more anxious about working-class morals and duties than about their own. It is easy to point out to working men their duty when that is simply to knuckle under to their betters, or—as a French writer whom we have lately chanced upon puts it—when "the duty of the poor is to defend the good things belonging to the rich, and this is how the union betwixt citizens is maintained." In a really democratic country, the duty of every man is clearly to do his part in defending it. Ours is not a democratic country, and so-called democratic legislation will never make it so till men are democratic in feeling as well as in talk, in private as well as in public. We are industrial, and already in the underpaid and dangerous trades the working classes give more lives to their country's prosperity than ever the Army does. Besides, how can there be a democratic Army and Navy? With their ranks and ratings and their discipline, they are the most aristocratic institutions we have, and very properly so. The "Spectator," we see, says that the working classes would condemn as anti-democratic a system under which upper and middle class boys would escape compulsory service by serving in the Volunteer corps at their schools. Very true. So the "Spectator" favors the proposals of the National Service League, by which "the training would be given to the duke's son, the millionaire's son, the collier's son, or the agricultural laborer's son, on absolutely equal terms." It would be given equally, perhaps, but how received? Would taking the rich men's sons from their amusements be the same as taking poor men's sons from their work? Would they have all the same means of making their period of compulsory training pleasant? The rich men's sons might think it too democratic; the poor sons' fathers wouldn't.

The most suspicious—and the most enlightening—thing about the compulsory service movement is the support given to it by the clergy. Why should the men committed to peacefulness support the warlike spirits? The problem explains itself when we recollect that the clergy belong to the officer class; and they naturally favor what is, unconsciously, I daresay, only another move of that class to bring the working classes more under its thumb—to make them live, not as they find, but as the officer class thinks, good. The clergy, of course, talk about the nation's need of discipline. They do not, on their part, appear to relish overmuch the loose discipline of the Church. Maybe they would like to exchange it for the sterner discipline of manual labor year in and year out for a bare living wage without hope of betterment, without hope of holidays in Switzerland, without hope, even, of having the bishop to lunch. As Mrs. Perring says: "'Tis they schools, I reckon, what puts the children off work, an' makes it harder for 'em when they got to. Fine discipline 'twould be for the boys just when they've a-left school an' are getting into the collar, to have to leave work an' go into camp, an' p'raps to slop about afterwards for months looking for fresh work!"

What we should particularly like to know is: who are to be the officers in the proposed compulsory service, and what is to be their treatment of the men? Are they to be the same sort of officers with the same sort of ways as at present? We are proud enough of the Navy—the men, not the machinery—but those of us whose friends are on the lower deck or in the ranks are well aware that it is not the work, but the treatment, which rouses so much dissatisfaction. We have known a naval officer called out to fight by a fisherman for his behavior in the latter's boat. The officer apologised afterwards, explaining that it was a way he had got into in the Navy, and the fisherman replied: "Aye! but just you remember in future when you comes down to me that you an't got me in your Navy, an' won't have neither, for all you got five brothers o' mine; an' you remember your shore-going manners 'long wi' me." Men will not stand from the newer type of junior officer the same language that they would admire a bluff old seaman for, and, having been made keener on promotion than the old-fashioned, happy-go-lucky sailor, they resent their setbacks more. "The Portsmouth mutiny," says Dave Perring, who knows a good deal about it, and has himself done his time in the Reserve, "thic turn-out didn't rise up all at once. 'Twas brewing, an' 'tis brewing now. Some o' they officers be ripping chaps, but mostly they treats 'ee like a dog. On the knee to 'em, that's it. When they've got 'ee there, they've got 'ee, an' they knows it, an' acts according. They can't help it altogether. 'Tis the way o' it."

The Army officers we have met are nice enough so long as things go smoothly; they are always very willing to teach us how to do our own work; but they are not exactly the sort of men we should like to be compelled to put the children under. If at present the boys join the Army or Navy—as the elder ones have done, and the younger ones probably will—they do it deliberately, with their eyes open, for Dave does not forget to tell them: "You make up your mind to get on, an' 'twill be all fitty; but 'tis like walking a chalk mark, an' if you slips off, you'm done. They can have 'ee, all ways; mind that." There is plenty that is bad in the services now they have to catch their men in the open market. What they would be like if they got their men without trouble, we don't know; but we have heard of the French and German conscript scandals.

The compulsory military service movement appears to us in the light of a huge plot, headed by Lord Roberts, who, as "Bobs," the hero, fought himself into the affection of the nation, and as Earl Roberts, the peer, is talking himself out of it again. Are the military authorities so inefficient that they want all the youth of the country to practise inefficiency on? Perhaps, however, they have improved since they failed during the Boer War to handle properly the men they've got. Let them prove it. When we have reason to trust the service authorities we shall be prepared to think seriously of compulsory military training—not before; and then probably it will be plainly unnecessary.

If the country is not safe with its regular forces at their present size, why not make the services better worth a man's while to join? It would be expensive, doubtless, but less so than conscription; and good treatment at all events is not a money matter. The nation spends millions on battleships and guns, and treats them very delicately; flesh and blood it wants on the cheap. Seems so, anyhow, if the National Service League represents the nation. When we have to help pay for the Navy we are told that it is our national insurance. To all other forms of insurance men contribute according to the amount of their insurable property; they do now, in fact, so contribute to the national insurance by being taxed for it according to their means; and our soldiers and sailors are the men who, for certain payments, underwrite portions of the risk. That, it seems to us, is the fairest and least undemocratic system yet invented. Pretty nearly all the insurable property we possess is the flesh and blood they want for next to nothing.—Yours, &c.,

Letters to the Editor

"SURMISES ON THE IRON MASK."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I be permitted to offer a few remarks on your review of Monsignor Barnes's "Man of the Mask" (January 16th), which I have only seen to-day? The brilliant idea of Monsignor Barnes that James de la Cloche (last heard of in December, 1668) was the Man of the Mask (first heard of in July, and arrested in August, 1669) was entirely original on his part. But after this great thought had flashed through his brain he discovered (as he mentions in his book) that I had anticipated him, and had made the same suggestion, "in a spirit of mockery," like the Young Man with the Cream Tarts (see my book, "The Valet's Tragedy"). I could not believe in my own suggestion because I was, and remain, certain that James de la Cloche, "sincere, simple, single-hearted," as your reviewer styles him, died at Naples in August, 1669, and, therefore, was not, at that date, on his way to his prison at Pignerol.

The truth is that Lord Acton, who introduced James de la Cloche, in 1862, to British history, was not an historical Sherlock Holmes. With all his wide reading, too, he was unacquainted with the Letters of Vincenzo Armanni, published in 1674. The book is so rare in England that I was obliged to have transcripts of the passages on Prince James Stuart made at Rome. After reading them I was absolutely convinced that James de la Cloche, or Prince James Stuart, died at Naples and was buried there, in August, 1669. Therefore, James could not be "Eustache d'Auger," the valet, arrested by the Captain of Dunkirk in the same month, and traceable through all his vicissitudes till he is immured in the island off Cannes. Lord Acton did not publish the French originals of the testimonials given by Charles II. to his son James de la Cloche, and the King's letters to and concerning that sincere and simple young devotee. I think that no British historian read these letters (I myself only read them in Italian translations) till Monsignor Barnes published them in his interesting book. Historians have followed Lord Acton, and he, to tell the truth, did not bestow on this problem the necessary amount of care and attention. To people who are fond of puzzles, I would say, read the documents published by Monsignor Barnes in his originals. They may thus be able to find out that Lord Acton's judgment might, indeed, be "swordlike," but that swords are not the best instruments for the unravelling of Gordian knots.

As to the Abbé Pregnani, amateur astrologer, your reviewer says: "The French authorities themselves, in the very act of commending him to Colbert, have not the slightest idea who he is." Anyone who reads Lionne's letter to Colbert, in the documents of Monsignor Barnes, will see that Lionne knows, and tells Colbert who the Abbé is, and by what Royal lady he was brought to the knowledge of Louis XIV. This Royal introduction of the Abbé to Louis is not given in Monsignor Barnes's text, but it is given in Lionne's letter to Colbert. The Abbé, again, does not set out for Calais, "and then vanish from the scene." He was not arrested as soon as he touched French soil; he was in Paris, and with Lionne, about July 26th, as may be read in the last document in the book.—Yours, &c.,

CONSCRIPTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There are numbers of Liberals in Great Britain who, looking around, see the youth of this country engaged in pursuits in many cases to which the word "manly" could not be applied. Attracted by the apparently simple programme of the National Service League, and themselves probably having served as Volunteers, they think quite naturally that the word "conscription" cannot be applied to such a form of compulsion, while the advantage of discipline, of obedience to orders, regularity, and physical drill cannot but be good for the youth and early manhood of the nation; thus they cheerfully subscribe to the funds of the League and laugh at the fears of its critics.

The object of this letter is to warn such Liberals most seriously of the constitutional danger of permitting even the first step towards compulsion, and to point out what lies out of their sight; and why the statements made by Lord Roberts, the National Service League, and by any conscriptionist may not be accepted, but must be fought and their effects destroyed before Great Britain is pledged to a system which must overthrow the constitution, and will end in disaster.

A country which depends upon a Volunteer Army, as we do, cannot afford to disregard the conditions of service, nor permit any form of inhumanity, but must equalise the soldier's life with that of the laborer or artisan. It must go into the labor market and depend upon the attractions it offers to get men to join the colors. In time of threatened or actual war the problem is simpler, for there is then but little difficulty in recruiting. Even so far back as 1814, when the air was full of schemes of compulsion, it was acknowledged that Volunteers had always shown readiness to go upon permanent duty and to turn out with alacrity when real or false alarms demanded their service. A conscript under any conditions has no option. Go he must. But behind this lies very much.

The mild form of compulsion airily set out by the League appears to a casual observer to ask for no more, if so much, as Mr. Haldane demands for his Territorialists. It is to cost a paltry four millions of money more than we spend now, while the War Office calculates the cost of a very mild form of conscription at twenty millions (War Office statement to Parliament, 1904). The crucial question is: Who is to judge of the standard of numbers, of discipline, of armament, of conditions when once the principle is wrested from the people? Parliament will no longer control, only the experts; and the contrast between the efficiency of the Continental conscript and the British will be drawn each day in more and more lurid colors until not the youth only, but the grown man will be netted and England will become a vast camp of discontented soldiers, eating their heads off, awaiting diplomatic failures to find an occupation—and diplomatic failures will not fail them.

The military correspondent of the "Times" inculcates the doctrine that Great Britain must possess those forces which will render the State secure and its alliance worth having. This is the spring of conscription and of Lord Roberts's dismal forebodings. Liberals demand neither alliances nor means to pay the price to purchase them—but the Unionist Party cannot give up the old tradition, while in his heart every Tariff Reformer feels that the moment the country enters upon a course of retaliatory tariffs force will be needed to back up the consequences. Thus the National Service and the Tariff Reform Leagues are complementary to each other.

An Englishman is a poor subject to try compulsion upon. A mule would bear a favorable comparison with him. To govern a compelled Englishman, men of iron must be chosen, and whence are they to be obtained? But the League dismisses this serious problem as of no consequence. The War Office in 1904, in a Tory régime, thought differently. They considered that not only must the officers be professionals, but the non-commissioned officers as well—salaried officials in the proportion of thirty officers and seventy non-commissioned officers per each 900 rank and file—to be paid at Army rates, while the conscripts would require the 1s. per diem, the British equivalent rate of pay; also, that a change to conscription would necessitate doubling the pay of the Regular soldier, while reducing the strength of the Army by 30,000 men; and after all, this conscript army contemplated by the War Office was only to reach 380,000 men all told, while out of this no provision was being made for cavalry or for artillery.

The salient points of objection are:—

(a) That once Parliament has by its Act permitted a form of compulsory service to be introduced, it has lost control of the future, as Parliament will not be able to decide whether the force is efficient, and must support the expert.

(b) That even the severest form of discipline can be expected to obtain the minimum of obedience, as men no longer exert themselves under compulsion.

(c) That the provision of pay for an Army of professionals on the permanent staff, alone must add an unwieldy burden to a taxation rising year by year.

(d) That the interference with the recruiting of the Regular Army and the Navy in particular, which must of necessity be voluntary services, cannot be justified, while the added cost to attract men will not ease taxation.

(e) The certain loss to the people of their constitutional rights cannot be justified by any fancied gain from compulsory service. The principle of an Army is that of an oligarchy, and once hand over the manhood of the country to a professional oligarchy, the interval between freedom and feudalism will become uncomfortably narrow, probably only to be widened by a revolution. It is not at all too late to safeguard the people from this danger; but it will require an amendment to Mr. Haldane's "Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1907" (7 Edward VII., Cap. 9), by removing all possibility of engrafting any form of compulsory service upon it, and requiring every such change to be proposed to Parliament as part of a separate and complete measure, thus ensuring popular criticism, and avoiding dangers unseen. As it stands, the Act lies open, and the danger is very great.—Yours, &c.,

A. Grimshaw Haywood.

"A PARALLEL TO THE SUFFRAGETTES."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Under this heading a letter recently appeared in a distinguished contemporary, containing Noorthonck's version—written one hundred and thirty years after the event—describing an early attempt on the part of women to "rush" the House of Commons. In that letter the writer draws attention to certain resemblances between recent militant tactics and the violence then offered, and quotes Noorthonck's opinion justifying the action of the trained bands in meeting violence with violence. May I draw attention to further resemblances, suggested by some study of contemporary records, between this seventeenth century episode and modern practices, and quote a weighty contemporary opinion on the action of the trained bands, which is very different from Noorthonck's judgment?

From Clarendon we learn that in August, 1643, the peace party in the city would gladly have shown their dissent from the action of the Common Council in praying for the continuance of war. But certain executions and other steps "frighted all men from appearing in person to desire those things upon which their hearts were most set. In the end the women expressed greater courage than the men," and they presented a petition to Parliament urging peace. We learn elsewhere that the women "were backed by courtiers and men of quality." This use of women as tools in political work is not altogether unknown even in our day, and on more than one occasion during that period of stress do we find men urging women to petition the House when they themselves no longer dared to appear.

The touching faith of some modern women in the wisdom, ability, and willingness of legislators to remedy all existing grievances, and the consequent necessity of getting into personal contact with leaders within the precincts of Parliament, finds its counterpart in the faith and action of seventeenth-century forerunners. From the petition then presented the following extract may be taken:—

"That your poor petitioners (though of the weaker sex) do too sensibly perceive the ensuing Desolation of the Kingdom, unless by some timely means your Honours provide for the speedy recovery thereof. Your Honours are the Physitians that can . . . restore this Languishing Nation, and our Bleeding Sister, the Kingdom of Ireland . . . we need not dictate to your Eagle-eyed Judgments the Way; our only desire is, That God's glory in the True Reformed Protestant Religion may be preserved, the just Prerogatives of King and Parliament maintained; the true Liberties and Properties of the Subject according to the known Laws of the Land, Restored; and all the Honorable Ways and Means for speedy Peace endeavoured."

The character of the petition, the vagueness of the reply, and the exhortation to return home quietly, are not unlike similar action and similar vagueness to-day. These women, however mistaken their violence may have been, had, in common with their modern sisters, a keen interest in matters of national importance, and took the most direct means possible to secure a hearing. Failing to receive what they considered adequate attention, they resorted unwisely, perhaps not unnaturally, to violence. Then, as more recently, they imitated men in this respect, and were, according to sound contemporary opinion, more severely handled than men. All writers—and many describe the episode—emphasise the violence on both sides. It must suffice to quote one who cannot have been in sympathy with the rioters. The Puritan M.P. and antiquary, Sir Simonds D'Ewes, himself an eye-witness, has left in his diary a graphic account of the whole story. The following extracts bring out differences from Noorthonck's version, and display a spirit of greater fairness in describing action of which the writer cannot have approved.

"No man can excuse the indiscreet violence of these women, but the remedy used against them by the procurement of Pym and others . . . . was most cruel and barbarous, for not content to have them suppress by the ordinary footguards, which had been sufficient, there were diverse horsemen called doune, who hunted the said woemen up and downe the back Palace Yard, and wounded them with their swords and pistolls with no less inhumanities than if they had been bruit beasts. . . . And many had just cause to wonder that when the meane and factious people, being men, and not women, which came downe and offered so much violence to divers of the Lords, being Peeres of the Realme . . . had no course at all taken against them, and yet that such severe cruelty was used against these woemen, who were only mislead (sic) by their wicked and unlawfull example."

As I hope to show elsewhere this whole episode—startlingly modern as it is—forms but one of many indications that women, no less than men, were supremely interested in the vexed questions which led to civil war; that they were determined to get a hearing for their views; and that, like the men around them, they were more than once carried away to acts of violence in the hope of securing the attention of those who guided the destinies of the nation.—Yours, &c.,

THE STRENGTH OF THE GERMAN NAVY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your article, "The New Scare About the Navy," in your last issue, you say: "On the German side there would not be one non-obsolete warship of over 13,000 tons." Allow me to point out that there are ten battleships now in commission in the German Navy of 13,200 tons each—the Deutschland class, five ships, and the Braunschweig class containing the same number.

Not one of these ships is more than six years old, and two—the Schlesien and the Schleswig-Holstein—were only commissioned last year.—Yours, &c.,

C. G. WALKER.

Knowle House, Mirfield, Yorks, February 10th, 1909.

[The displacement of the ten German battleships to which our correspondent refers is given in the "Navy League Annual" as 12,997 tons, not 13,200. The "Naval Annual" gives the five ships of the Deutschland class as having 13,200 tons displacement, but gives 12,997 tons to the Braunschweig class.—ED., NATION.]

"SUFFRAGETTE HISTORY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I was too busy when the first letter of your correspondent, Mr. W. C. Jolly, appeared, to be able to answer it in detail, and I would not join the correspondence now, but that I felt I might discourage my readers by keeping silence.

I chose to use the spelling "Magna Charta," because it is that generally adopted in popular histories, and by the "Encyclopædia Britannica." But even if it had been an error, the spelling of a word does not affect the force of a fact. Mr. Jolly, this week, seems to think that he has disposed of my statement that the word "man" includes "woman" in privilege as well as in penalty (as it has to do through a deficiency in the English language). He triumphantly refers to the case of "Charlton v. Lings." As his reference is correct, it is possible that the misspelling was a printer's error. But it happens that it was because the decision in Charlton v. Lings was at variance with philology, common use, history, charters, and statutes, that I spent ten years of solid study to write my books, "British Freewomen" and "The Sphere of 'Man.'" If Mr. Jolly will go through the originals of the charters of the guilds, he will find them for "sistren" as well as for "brethren"; if he goes through the lists of freemen in their books, he will find the names of women as well as of men; if he follows the State papers, he will find ladies included among "gentlemen." If he has not time to do original research, he may content himself with many printed authorities, for instance, "Stow's Chronicles," and Riley's translation of the "White Book of the City of London." In the latter he will find the phrase, "And the freeman, when she is a woman, shall have no excuse from the duties of watch and ward." There is only one point in his letter in which I agree with him: that is, when he admits that Coke made errors. But he happened to be in the right when he stated that "Liber Homo" included woman. I can give him hundreds of examples. In regard to his assertion that women could not pay homage, I think Mr. Jolly requires a little further study. It is true that her husband paid homage for her lands while he lived, and while she lived. But that woman could both pay and receive homage, he can learn from the "Rotuli Bundredorium," the "Testa de Nevill," "Kirkley's Inquest," and many similar compilations. Or if he would prefer it, he may refer to "Littleton upon Tenures, Form of Homage, 87,88," "Coke upon Littleton, 67a," "Glanville" B., IX., c.iii., and heraldic books, such as Dugdale's "Baronage" (117), "Joanne Devereux, making proof of her age, and doing her homage, had livery of the lands of her inheritance." 2. Ric. II. "The summonses to Ladies, as well as to Lords, for aids to the King, was, "de fide et homagis." When Mr. Jolly has gone through all my authorities there will be time to discuss my inferences. Yours, &c.,

CHARLOTTE C. STOPES.

PRONUNCIATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Of course, I am at one with your reviewer about the appalling practice of pronouncing the i in "girl" like the i in "gird." Let us hope that Macaulay was holding it up to contempt when he wrote his admired stanza about the gentleman who went to the West Indies, hoping to make money, but only ruined the complexions of his daughters:—

"Mr. Walker was sent to Berbice,
By the greatest of statesmen and Earls;
He went to bring back yellow boys,
But he only brought back yellow girls."

THE LYKE-WAKE DIRGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent of last week and others may be interested to know that Tylor in his "Primitive Culture" (vol. 1, p. 495, 3rd edition) quotes the Lyke-Wake Dirge, from J. C. Atkinson's "Glossary of the Cleveland Dialect," and gives the third line of verse one as:—

"Fire and fleet and candlelight."

Yours, &c.,

J. H. SHAXBY.

February 13th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—This magnificent dirge is printed in Brand's "Popular Antiquities" (ed. 1813), II., 180, in the chapter, "Following the Corpse to the Grave," and describes the progress of the soul, by various stages, from the death-chamber to the Vision of Christ. The poem, as printed in Brand, begins thus:—

"This ean night, this ean night,
Every night and awle,
Fire and Fleet and Candle-light,
And Christ receive thy Sawle!"

This verse brings vividly before us the starting-point of the journey, namely, the death-chamber in which the dead person enjoys "this one night," the light and warmth and shelter of the old home—"fire and fleet and candlelight," fire and house-room and the corpse-candle. "Fire and fleet (or flet)" meaning "fire and house-room," is an expression of frequent occurrence in northern wills of the sixteenth century. In these documents it is a common thing for the testator to provide that his wife shall have, after his death, "fire and fleet." The "Oxford Dictionary" (s.v. Fleet) gives quotations to this effect from wills in Somerset House and the Durham Registry. See also Jamieson and the "English Dialect Dictionary." I would refer the student also to the "Oxford Icelandic Dictionary" (s.v. Flet), and to Ducange.

The Dirge was printed by Sir W. Scott in his "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border" (1802). The editor not understanding the expression "fire and fleet" printed "fire and sleet," and suggested that sleet may have been a "corruption from 'selt' or 'salt,' a quantity of which is frequently placed on the breast of a corpse." I suppose that Scott held that "selt" was the authoritative reading, and that "selt" was a northern pronunciaion of "salt." But the northern pronunciation of "salt" is "sawt." Nowhere within the British Isles is this useful commodity pronounced "selt." For proof see "E.D.D." I am sorry to find that the editor of "The Oxford Book of English Verse" (on p. 443), follows Sir W. Scott in printing "sleet" for "fleet," and in interpreting "sleet" to mean "salt." The reading "sleet" is most unfortunate, as it utterly obscures the picture brought before us, and is quite out of harmony with the words "fire" and "candlelight," between which it occurs. "The Brig o' Dread" in the poem is a widespread notion occurring in Chinese, Zoroastrian, Jewish, Mohammedan, and northern traditions, Teutonic and Celtic. The best known Bridge of Dread is Sirat ("the road"), the name for the bridge across the infernal fire, finer than hair, sharper than a sword, beset on each side with briars and hooked thorns (like those on "Whinny-muir"), over which the righteous will pass with the swiftness of lightning, while the wicked will soon miss their footing, and fall into the fire of Hell. We may read much that is interesting about these soul bridges in the chapter on "Souls" in Grimm's Teutonic Mythology (tr. Stallybrass, p. 834-6, 1,150). —Yours, &c.,

A. L. Mayhew.

Wadham College, Oxford, February 8th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION

Sir,—In reference to the discussion of the third line of the "Lyke-Wake Dirge," the following quotation from the "New English Dictionary" should set your correspondents' doubts at rest:—

"Bp. Kennett (a 1728) quotes in MS Lansd. 1,033, fol. 132, an 'old northern song over a dead corps,' containing the lines 'Fire and fleet and candle light, and Xt receive thy sawle." In Sir W. Scott's 'Minstrelsy of Scot. Border' (1802), 232, the words appear as 'Fire and sleet,' and the editor suggests that sleet 'seems to be corrupted from selt, or salt, a quantity of which is frequently placed on the breast of a corpse'!"

We thus see that fleet is the original reading. Its meaning may be defined as "house-room," fire and flet being a very frequent expression in old wills. Thus in a will of 1539, we read, "My wife to have . . . fyre and fleete in my haule and kechin." The singer of the dirge asks that fire and house-room and candle-light may be given to the dead for his "waking." The word itself is from O.E. flett, the hall floor, used later with rather wider meaning.—Yours, &c.,

Allen Mawer.

THE LOGIC OF CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In your issue of the 30th of January, under the heading of "Of Good and Evil," reference is made to the logic of Christian Science as being "contemptible enough." Will you allow me to point out briefly in what the logic of Christian Science consists? It is the logic enforced by the greatest metaphysician the world has ever known: logic so clear that the humblest fisher-folk, perhaps the most uneducated men of their day, were able to accept it without any difficulty. That same "mode of arguing," to use one of the definitions of "logic," is the mode employed by Mrs. Eddy, the discoverer and founder of Christian Science, and by all students of Christian Science. On what did the great Master base his teachings? In reply to the scribe who asked, "Which is the first commandment of all?" Jesus replied, "The Lord our God is one Lord: and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength —this in the first commandment." Now the teachings of Christian Science are based on the first commandment, and in this connection Mrs. Eddy has said, on page 340 of "Science and Health," "The First Commandment is my favorite text. It demonstrates Christian Science." Starting, therefore, from the premise of "one God, or good," Whom, as Jesus declared, to know aright is life eternal, the logic of Christian Science can hardly be termed "contemptible," if it leads to the conclusion that there is in reality no power but that which is of God or good. To the extent that this is understood or demonstrated, to that extent is evil proved to be unreal, be it in the form of sin or of sickness, for there is no evil in good. There is never the slightest doubt in the mind of any student of Christian Science as to the soundness of its logic, because, just so soon as he has grasped it even in a small degree, he begins to see his way out of the thraldom of sin, sickness, and discord. It is indeed true that to the "wisdom of the wise" these things are just as much "foolishness" to-day as in the days when the Apostle, writing to the Church at Corinth, told them that "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty." True it is that "the attitude of thought and feeling which it (the logic of Christian Science) represents is worthy of much consideration," for it is just because the logic of Christian Science is faultless that the message of freedom and joy can be given with such authority to the sick and suffering, that they are enabled to declare in those well-known words of the poet Whittier:—

"The healing of the seamless dress
Is by our beds of pain;
We touch Him in life's throng and press,
And we are whole again."

THE POETRY RECITALS SOCIETY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—As many of your readers will be interested in the Poetry Recitals Society, about to be incorporated, we venture to ask them to co-operate with us. The basis of the society is the neglected truism that poetry, like music, is written for sound, not sight, and to be properly understood and appreciated, should be read aloud. But the society has a wider field than this. It has been said cynically that it is taking the whole province of poetry under its wing. It seeks to bring into fellowship all persons interested in poetry as a means of culture and expression, and to replace the general apathy towards poetry with a healthy, intelligent appreciation of it by means of local centres, public recitals, lectureships, etc., in addition to the details given in the poetical annual for 1909, a publication produced by a number of devotees for specific objects not financial. We shall be glad to send a copy of the constitution and an invitation to attend a general meeting to be held in London towards the end of this month, under the presidency of Lady Margaret Sackville, to any of your readers who are in sympathy with the society, and inclined to help it.—Yours, &c.,

"THE CLANGING ROOKERY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In reference to your article with the above title, to my mind the changing of rook habits for the worse is to be accounted for by their excessive numbers.

I have grave doubts whether any whole race of animals, birds, or insects should be annihilated—not even rats—but I am convinced that rooks and sparrows should be diminished one half.

With regard to "corvine courts martial"—many years ago a disturbance was noticed amongst the birds in a rookery close to a house near Kidderminster then occupied by the late Mr. Samuel Fowler, of Stourbridge, ending in the general onslaught on and killing of one rook and his being gibbeted by the others—a twig being twisted round his neck, and I, as a boy, saw him thus hanging right amongst the nests. It can hardly have been accidental, as the presence of his decaying body can scarcely have been pleasant to the rising generation.—Yours, &c.,

THE WRATH OF SIR ROBERT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The very printers of the "Nineteenth Century" must have trembled, when they set in type Sir Robert Anderson's tempestuous article on "The Prevention of Crime Act." The loss of his pet scheme for the life-imprisonment of the burglar appears to have had a most infuriating effect on his mind. "Professional humanitarians," "hysterical humanitarians," "sham humanitarians," "humanity-mongers"—these are a few of the flowers of speech with which he assails those who successfully pressed for the amendment of a most dangerous measure. He asserts that the Home Secretary swallowed his principles, "in obedience to an agitation promoted by the professional humanitarians, by means of money given to help the unfortunate." There is here a double calumny; for humanitarians are not professional, but honorary workers, and their funds are subscribed for the very purposes which Sir Robert Anderson condemns. There is no excuse for Sir Robert's extreme rudeness. Beyond doubt he is very angry—to the verge of incoherence. He thinks that "the clock has been put back" by the changes in the Crime Bill. Well, certainly, his own clock has lost its mainspring; or shall we say that his is a case of that horological disturbance described in Poe's story as "the devil in the belfry"? He is striking "thirteen o'clock."—Yours, &c.,

THE INTERVIEW.

ἐγγὺς ἐλθὼν πολιᾶς ἁλὸς οἷος ἐν ὄρφνᾳ ἄπνευ βαρύκτυπον
Εὐτρίαιναν· ὁ δ'αὐτῷ πὰρ ποδὶ σχέδον φάνη.—Pindar, Od. i. 71-4

I.

Down in the darkness to the coast
I ran on passionate feet
To greet the friend I loved the most
And hungered most to meet,
To hail the friend my heart had lost
And hear its surges beat.

Moon there was none; the sky was blank;
All I could see was black;
Save where the breakers, rank on rank,
Rose up for the attack;
Save where the lion heaved his flank,
And roared, and shuddered back.

Yet there it lay, the same, the old,
The indomitable Sea,
There in the darkness and the cold
Crying continually,
Crying the storm its caverns hold,
As my heart cried to me.

The souls of all heroic men
Who in the Sea have found
A comrade and a God, and then
Beneath its waves been drowned,
Lusty and loud and proud again
Made chorus to the sound.

They had no shapes that I could see
Riding the murky air,
And yet I know that actually
Each soul of them was there,
And I was with them, and could be Bodiless, as they were.

II.

Even as the particles of brine
Beating this actual coast,
Millions on millions, line on line,
Are an unnumbered host,
Yet in their multitude enshrine
As many fates almost.

This drop beneath a torrid sun
Caressed the isles of spice;
In polar night that other one
Welded the arctic ice;
And this was whirled to spray upon
An alpine precipice.

That drop a Viking dragon sank;
That, a Malay canoe;
And this a drowning Spaniard drank
Gold-laden from Peru;
And that upon the Syrtes bank
Had bleached a Roman crew.

The souls of lovers cannot be Far from the love they willed;
The murderer can never flee
Spirits whose life he spilled;
And these were men that loved the Sea,
And whom the Sea had killed.

Therefore the spirits of them all
Were gathered like a cloud,
Millions on millions, and their call
Was jubilant and loud,
The song of men that met their fall
Whole-hearted and unbowed.

III.

They sang the Sea, the living Sea,
Its praises and its pride,
Its beauty and its purity,
Its life's immortal tide,
And how they loved it quenchlessly,
Although by it they died.

They sang; and in their glorious choir
The deity of man
Blazed and was manifest like fire,
That soared aloft and ran
Catching me with it, higher, higher,
Strong and Olympian.

They sang; and in an undertone
Mysterious and intense
The Sea made answer: first a moan
Almost too low for sense;
Then gathering loud, and louder grown,
Thundered omnipotence.

In giant eddies roared the sound;
The singing swirled between;
The voices of the men were drowned,
Even as the men had been;
Yet did not lose themselves, but found
A stronger self therein.

Their tumult towered to the sky,
So that the awful void
Tingled for ecstacy; and I
Upon their pinions buoyed
Groped out, and compassed the Most High
One moment, overjoyed.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

By the tragic death of M. Catulle Mendès, on Sunday last, France loses an accomplished and versatile man of letters, who did not quite reach greatness in any department of literature, though he essayed most. He was born at Bordeaux in 1841, and at the age of eighteen went to Paris, where he founded the "Revue Fantaisiste," which became the organ of the Parnassian movement, and numbered among its contributors Théophile Gautier, Leconte de Lisle, Baudelaire, Banville, Verlaine, Coppée, Sully-Prudhomme, and Heredia. But though Mendès never abandoned the Parnassian devotion to excellence of form and respect for the traditional "rules" of French poetry, he soon gave up—if, indeed, he ever accepted—all other distinctive doctrines of the school. In the sixty volumes he has left behind he is romantic, realist, Neo-Hellenist, or whatever else his fancy leads him to be. His choice of themes, and his grossness in treating them have been justly blamed, and the publication of one of his poems led to imprisonment—and a fine. Sainte-Beuve said of his first volume that it contained "honey and poison."

As a dramatic poet Mendès never won the recognition he deserved. His plays are full of exuberant imagery and lyrical emotion. M. Antoine produced "La Reine Fiammetta" for the "Théâtre Libre," but "Scarron," a play for which Coquelin had a great admiration, is probably Mendès' best piece of writing for the stage. Mendès did a great deal to make German thought and literature current among French men of letters. He wrote interestingly of Heine and other German authors, and it was in no small degree through his reiterated teaching and preaching that Wagner's music was at last accepted in Paris. His critical work is good, though strongly marked by his own prepossessions. The "Rapport sur la Poésie Française," a work prepared by the direction of the Minister of Public Instruction, contains a fine introduction, covering the whole range of French poetry, and a dictionary of the French poets of the nineteenth century, accompanied by critical notices of their works. To all students of modern French literature the book is indispensable, and it is not the least valuable of the many volumes Catulle Mendès has given us.

THREE novels of special interest to be published within the next few weeks are Mr. John Galsworthy's "Fraternity," Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer's "The Half-Moon," and E. Nesbit's "Salome and the Head." "Fraternity" may be roughly described as an attempt to throw some light on class feeling and on certain types of those who possess the "social conscience." The scene is laid in London. Mr. Galsworthy is also soon to appear again as a dramatist. His play, we understand, deals with a strike in a great factory, and its point of human interest lies in the treatment of two opposed personalities—the employer and the strike leader. Mr. Hueffer's "The Half-Moon" takes its name from the ship in which Henry Hudson made his great voyage of discovery. The story centres round Edward Coleman, the only Englishman who accompanied Hudson. As the title of E. Nesbit's novel shows, it is the story of a famous dancer, the heroine of a number of sentimental and other adventures.

IBSEN'S posthumous works are now in the printers' hands, and are announced to appear within the next few months. It has, however, been pointed out that the word posthumous is a little out of place in this connection, inasmuch as what will now be given to the world could more aptly be called the "motives" or studies which have formed the foundation for Ibsen's literary production. The coming volumes will undoubtedly throw a new and clearer light upon many Ibsen problems. They will, we understand, prove the futility of much speculation and criticism, at which Ibsen himself often smiled as being too subtle and far-fetched. The contents include first drafts of many of Ibsen's works, and thus show the original keynote from which he started.

THE fifth and final volume of Professor Guglielmo Ferrero's masterly history of "The Greatness and Decline of Rome" will be published by Mr. Heinemann in the course of the next few weeks. The work has already taken its place as one of the freshest and most original contributions made to historical study by the present generation. It has been translated into most European languages, though it was only after some difficulty, and through the co-operation of an American publisher with Mr. Heinemann, that it was found possible to make the work accessible to English readers. Signor Ferrero has just returned from a lengthy stay in America, where he has delivered a series of lectures. His views of the future of the South American States were expressed in an article contributed to our columns on May 25th, 1907.

SIGNOR FERRERO is not the only European scholar of distinction who has, during the past few years, been welcomed as a lecturer on classical subjects in the United States. Professor Bury's Harvard lectures on "The Ancient Greek Historians" have just been published in book form by Messrs. Macmillan, while Professor J. P. Mahaffy, who was for many years Professor Bury's colleague at Trinity College, Dublin, is at present giving a series of Lowell lectures, his subject being "What the Greeks have done for Modern Civilisation." They will probably be published during the autumn season.

"THE ROMANCE OF RICHELIEU" is the title of a book by Mr. Joseph McCabe which Mr. Eveleigh Nash has in the press. Mr. McCabe's chief aim has been to show how far the accredited facts of Richelieu's life justify the romantic portraits drawn of him by such writers as Dumas. He has searched the memoir-writers of the time for details as to Richelieu's army of spies, his dealing with the incessant intrigues that were woven about him, and especially his relations with Marie de Medici, Anne of Austria, Madame de Chevreuse, and other women who played a leading part in the politics of the age. Richelieu's work as a statesman and the power he wielded in European affairs have not been neglected, so that altogether the book promises to give a vivid picture of "the iron Cardinal's" life and times. At present there is no adequate biography of Richelieu in English, so that Mr. McCabe's work has better justification than a great number of the historical biographies that now abound.

MESSRS. LONGMANS have in the press a selection from the lectures given by Dr. J. W. Mackail as Professor of Poetry at Oxford during the autumn terms of the years 1906 to 1908. The title of the book is "The Springs of Helicon: A Study in the Progress of English Poetry from Chaucer to Milton."

M. ANATOLE FRANCE'S JEANNE D'ARC.

We have received the following communication from M. Anatole France, which cannot fail to be interesting to our readers and to the British public. It will be observed that M. France is good enough to forward us the preface to the revised edition of his famous book on Joan of Arc, containing a brief and very characteristic reply to Mr. Andrew Lang's criticisms:—

Au Directeur de la "Nation."

Cher Monsieur,—Voici la préface que vous avez bien voulu me demander. Toutes les assertions qu'on trouve dans mon livre sont fondées sur des textes et ce ne sont pas quelques fautes d'impression dans les notes peuvent faire suspecter ma bonne foi, qui est parfaite. Mon seul tort fut d'expliquer ce qu'on veut laisser inexpliquable et d'avoir percé le mystere. Ce tort je l'assume volontiers.—Veuillez, &c.,

Anatole France.

Preface de la Nouvelle Edition.

Les savants qui ont bien voulu s'occuper de cet ouvrage l'ont traité, le plus souvent, avec une extrême bienveillance, sans doute parce qu'ils ont vu que l'auteur ne s'était écarté d'aucune des règles en usage pour la recherche de la vérité historique. J'en ai été touché; je dois exprimer notamment ma gratitude à M.M. Gabriel Monod, Salomon Reinach, Germain Lefèvre-Pontalis, dont la critique a relevé en ce livre un certain nombre de fautes qu'on ne trouvera plus dans la présente édition.

Je dois faire une place à part dans ma reconnaissance à la critique anglaise qui voue à la mémoire de Jeanne d'Arc un zèle religieux et comme un culte expiatoire. Les louables scrupules de M. Andrew Lang à l'endroit de mes références m'ont amené à en corriger quelques unes et à en ajouter plusieurs.

Pour adversaires déclarés je n'ai que les hagiographes. Ce qu'ils me reprochent ce n'est pas la manière dont j'ai expliqué les faits, c'est de les avoir expliqués; et plus mes explications sont claires, naturelles, tirées des meilleures sources, fondées en raison, plus elles leur déplaisent. Ils voulaient que l'histoire de Jeanne d'Arc restât mystérieuse et que rien n'y parût humainement possible. J'ai replacé la Pucelle dans la vie et dans l'humanité. Voilà mon crime. Et ces zéles inquisiteurs, si ardents à condamner mon livre, n'ont pu y découvrir aucune erreur grave, aucune inexactitude flagrante. Il a fallu que leur sévérité se contentât de quelques inadvertences et de quelques fautes d'impression. Quels flatteurs eussent mieux qu'eux caressé "de mon cœur l'orgueilleuse faiblesse"?

RECRUITING IN THE GREAT WAR.*

Mr. Fortescue's new volume, perhaps the most interesting of all his studies in the history of the British army, gives us a full and careful survey of an important chapter in our military and social life. Read in conjunction with the two volumes published in 1906, it may be said to complete the record of our military administration during the French War. Mr. Fortescue's task required for its accomplishment an infinite industry and zeal, for he has had to pick his way through a great and almost impenetrable mass of confused material. Of the result, we can only say that, though it is Mr. Fortescue's ambition to win the approbation of soldiers, he has earned the gratitude of a much larger world by the light he has thrown on the conduct of Governments and the habits of a profoundly significant age. The problem of recruiting is never purely a military or technical problem, as an army is never merely an engine or machine, but at no time has that problem been so intimately connected with social conditions as it was when Pitt faced France and the English oligarchy entered on its desperate struggle with the Revolution.

Unless we keep this truth well in mind, we might be taken aback by the amazing revelations that Mr. Fortescue has to make. It would have seemed on the face of it almost impossible that any set of men could have been quite so incapable as Pitt, Dundas, and Addington showed themselves in the first ten years of the French war. If Mr. Fortescue's history could have been read by the men whom Pitt and Dundas sent to Botany Bay for declaring that the Parliamentary system was capable of improvement in 1793 and 1794, the miseries of their exile would have found in it a certain bitter music. If it could have been read by Fox or Sheridan, it would have shown them that even their mistrust of the Government erred on the side of charity, and that there were mistakes that escaped the searchlight of an acute party imagination. If it could have been read by Cobbett, it would almost have convinced him, paradox though it would have seemed, that the sober narrative of a historian was more deadly to the reputation of the oligarchy that threw him into prison than the eloquent and piercing Philippic that his soldier's memories inspired. We laugh very naturally at the droll simplicity that made the French Revolutionaries destroy their navy from the pathetic fancy that it was undemocratic to have a trained marine artillery, and that Roman tactics were more becoming to a race that had discovered equality. But if the French Revolutionaries had taken as many months as we took years to learn how to make an army, France herself would have disappeared into that vacant space where Burke pictured her. Fortunately for the Revolution and all that it promised to the world, the ideas and conditions which embarrassed the administration of the navy, simplified in their sum the organisation of an effective army and made possible the heroic efforts that repulsed Europe. The French army was the creation of those conditions. Babeau has contrasted the extreme repugnance to the old militia service, which was general throughout France under the ancient régime, with her endurance from 1793 onwards of an infinitely more exacting personal burden. It is true that the conscription law of 1798 was at first enforced with difficulty; but from the day in 1793 when Carnot joined the Committee of Public Safety, two characteristics belong to the French Army. It is manned, as a consequence of the levy en masse, by the normal Frenchman and not by the victims of the crimps, and it is homogeneous. These two features stand out in strong contrast to the British armies, and they are just as much social symptoms as military qualities. If Pitt and his successors never created a national or homogeneous army, the reason is not merely that they were inefficient, but that they were entangled in all the difficulties and the apprehensions of an oligarchy resisting ideas as well as enemies.

Mr. Fortescue's new volume begins with the rupture of the Peace of Amiens, but to understand it we must go back to the capital mistakes of Pitt and Dundas. These measures were admirably summed up by Windham when he said that not only had they not created an army, but they had made it impossible to create an army. This was their effect, because they set up a number of different forces to compete with each other for recruits in such a way as to aggravate as much as possible the difficulties of the Regular Army. In 1793, when Pitt had to increase the Regular Army, he chose the most demoralising of all methods; raising men for rank, i.e., offering men rank in the Army in proportion to the number of recruits they could bring. There followed a hideous traffic in men. Buying recruits from crimps was an excellent speculation; and all kinds of bad characters turned themselves into Lieutenant-Colonels by the most nefarious transactions. As for the quality of the recruit, that was nobody's concern. The crimp got his price, and the gentleman got his commission. The next step was to increase the Militia, and 19,000 additional men were called out. But as substitutes were allowed, the effect was, of course, to send up the price of recruits for the Regular Army. It was much pleasanter to sell one's services to a man who had been drawn for the Militia, and to remain at home, than to take the bounty and enlist in the Regular Army. This was bad enough for a beginning; but the worst mistake of all was the creation of the Volunteers in 1794, under an Act which exempted from service in the Militia any Volunteer who had attended exercise punctually during six weeks previously to the hearing of the appeals against the Militia List. This was a departure from all previous practice.

As a consequence of these arrangements, the recruiting of the Army and the Militia alike became a desperate problem. There was a constant hemorrhage from desertion, and the cost of substitutes and recruits rose in 1798 to something like eighty guineas a head. Addington was not the man to put an end to this chaos, and the first part of Mr. Fortescue's new volume describes the state of hopeless confusion in which he kept the country. Not that he was idle. During 1803 it rained Militia Acts (there were nearly a score of them), and the luckless Lord Lieutenants were generally administering the Act before the last. This only added to the confusion. Addington repeated all Pitt's mistakes, and issued a circular inviting Volunteers. No real improvement began until Windham took the War Office in 1806 in the Whig Government. He was not long enough in power to carry out his ideas, and some of them were imperfectly developed; but he introduced limited service in the Regular Army, and he set about dissolving the mass of the Volunteers. Castlereagh, whose administration of the War Office is the most creditable part of his career (Mr. Fortescue thinks him the ablest man who has ever been at the War Office), appropriated many of Windham's ideas, and established a local or sedentary Militia, with universal compulsory training, and by drawing men from the Militia he just contrived to keep the Regular Army in supplies till the end of the War. But the strain was very great, and at the end the Militia was recruiting boys.

Now it is obvious enough to anybody reading Mr. Fortescue's history that the creation of a great body of volunteers, who were outside the regular military arrangements and organisation of the country and rapidly put themselves outside all discipline, was a fatal and capital folly. This was clear at the time to statesmen like Fox, or to soldiers like Craufurd. The effect was not only to disturb and paralyse all coherent policy; it tended also to increase the existing prejudice against the Militia. How, then, did Pitt come to commit this mistake? The answer is, we think, that he was not thinking mainly of the military problem. He was thinking of the maintenance of the old régime in England. The necessities of the army like the conduct of the campaign, were subordinated to political considerations at home. In creating the Volunteers, Pitt was arming property against social discontent; he was mobilising all existing interests against the first political movement of the artisans, whom he described in one of his speeches as an "ignorant and profligate population." To understand his measures, and to understand his critics, we must remember that the governing class thought, as one of its most distinguished members said, that the conquest of England by Louis XVI. would not have been as great a calamity as the propagation of French principles. The view of the Volunteers as a force designed to quell the domestic demand for reform appears in the descriptions and pamphlets of the time. It is not necessary to suppose that Pitt foresaw all the bad military consequences of his action, but it is certain that no man of his ability could have so acted unless he had felt that it was not less important to defend a great system of vested interests at home than it was to defend England from the enemy.

One of the most remarkable things in Mr. Fortescue's book is the account of the vast system of insurance that grew out of evasion of Militia service, a system by which soldiers, parish officers, and others made fortunes. The repugnance to military service was a great obstacle to the Government, and Mr. Fortescue judges it very severely. In considering that side of his book, we should have to go more deeply than he could go into the conditions of the "ignorant and profligate." The confession that different classes could not be expected to serve side by side in one army was ultimately another way of saving that their interests were not quite identical. The very reason that made the Volunteers so important an element in Pitt's plans helps to explain the apathy of the unrepresented classes. We must remember too, what kind of military discipline was then practised. The demoralising methods that Pitt encouraged for raising recruits, had their natural effect on the popular mind, and the sight of a London crowd destroying houses in which crimps had hidden their victims did not increase the prestige of the Army. It was at this time that, thanks to Nelson, the Navy began to treat its sailors better, but General Fox, brother of Charles, and hero of the exploit at Pont-à-Chien, declared, in reporting to the Government, in 1806 that military punishments, which had been becoming more humane for twenty years, had become more brutal again since 1798. Few Englishmen even now could read quite impassively Cobbett's account of the flogging of the Militiamen of Ely with the German soldiers standing by to see that order was kept.

Mr. Haldane has put the Territorial Army under the leadership of the Lords-Lieutenant; an arrangement which has been freely criticised in these columns. In one respect, at any rate, these officers are better off than their predecessors a century ago. For, whereas the latter groped about among a score of unintelligible Acts, Mr. Baker has provided for the guidance of the modern Lord-Lieutenant and others a quite admirable account and analysis of the Territorial Army Scheme.

IAN MACLAREN.*

Dr. Robertson Nicoll is fortunate in his subject. He knew Dr. Watson intimately, and both had many theological and literary views in common. As a consequence, Dr. Nicoll has been able to give a life-like picture of his friend—a picture in which the salient points are well brought out with sympathetic tenderness and yet without exaggeration. To the average man John Watson was simply a successful Scottish clergyman, who added to his popularity a considerable reputation as a novelist. Those who knew him recognised beneath all this a remarkable personality, and it is in giving the reader the key to this personality that the value of Dr. Nicoll's biography mainly consists. To the formation of Dr. Watson's temperament heredity largely contributed. On the material side he was brought into touch with that curious phenomenon, Highland Roman Catholicism, comprising a small section of the population which remained unaffected by the Reformation. Upon the ordinary Scot this hereditary fact would have had little or no effect, but Watson had more than his share of Celtic sentiment, and in his case the Roman Catholic element in his temperament had curious practical results. Outsiders would have classed Watson among the Moderates. He took kindly to the epicurean side of life; he seemed to be at ease in Zion, and yet hereditary influences drew him to the side of asceticism. We are told that "in the early years of his ministry he adopted much of the Roman Catholic discipline. He observed the fasts; he wore a hair shirt; he aimed strenuously at self-conquest and self-knowledge, as well as at knowledge of books and men." Another curious feature was the manner in which were blended in Watson's personality Moderatism and Evangelicalism. In Scotland these phases of religion were viewed as totally antagonistic. The Evangelical laid stress upon the spiritual fact of regeneration; the Moderate was specially concerned with the intellectual fact of culture. So deep was the gulf between the two parties in the church that, had no question of patronage arisen, the theological disharmony was itself sufficient to have caused the disruption. It fell to Watson's lot to be trained in a home where both phases of religion were represented. His father belonged to the Evangelical school, while his mother's sympathies lay with the Moderates. Watson felt no special call to the ministry, but to please his parents he resolved to enter the Free Church, in which his father was an elder. As the result, no doubt, of his mother's influence, Watson found himself more at home with the Moderates than with the Evangelicals, with whom, indeed, he never was in hearty sympathy.

The curious cross influences to which Watson was subjected had one good result—they enabled him to do what few Scottish clergy are able to do, to do justice to the good sides of both Evangelicals and Moderates. Long after the Disruption the Moderates were viewed as a species of Pagans, who had no message to the people beyond what Burns calls "cauld morality." The deeper side of the religious life was ignored by the Moderates, who, as a consequence, had little or no influence with the mass of the people. The Moderates placed special emphasis upon culture in the shape of philosophy and literature, and in so far as they gave an impetus to the things of the mind and counteracted the narrowness of the Evangelicals, they did a work that redounds to their honor. It is to Watson's credit that, while showing decided leanings to Moderatism, he noted its defects in many points when compared with Evangelicalism. With all their faults Watson recognised that the Evangelicals were more true to the facts and needs of the human soul than the Moderates. Looking at life as a pilgrimage from the City of Destruction to the Celestial City, the Evangelicals viewed the world as a kind of Vanity Fair, among the allurements of which they classed many of the intellectual pursuits and pleasures of the Moderates. In such an arid soil literature could not flourish, and one wonders what the intellectual life of Scotland would have been like to-day but for the counteractive influence of the Moderates. Man does not live by intellect alone. The Evangelical appeal to the spiritual element, with its persistent attempt to bring the mind into contact with the unseen and the eternal, lifted religion in Scotland into a region of solemn grandeur far beyond the horizon of Moderatism.

Knowing and sympathising with both currents of Scottish theological life, Watson felt himself now drawn to the one and now to the other, with the consequence that he never attained to a definite, harmonious creed. His creed was a kind of patchwork, made up of scraps of Roman Catholic sentiment, mixed with belief in the Higher Criticism and flavored with Evangelical fervor. In him were curiously combined the asceticism of the Catholic, the epicureanism of the Moderate, the culture of the man of letters, and the fervor of the Evangelical. In the true sense of the term Dr. Watson was not a thinker. His outlook upon life was fragmentary. He was more controlled by sentiment than by logic, and perhaps for that reason he wielded a greater influence than if he had been a systematic theologian. The value of his responsiveness to different phases of thought, and his sympathy with views which he could not fit into his own intellectual framework, were particularly seen in his preaching. As Dr. Nicoll says, he could preach sermons which pleased the Evangelicals and the Unitarians—sermons which roused the conscience by the intense fervor of their appeal, and sermons which appealed to the man of culture. He seemed to be equally at home in theology and Humanism, though intellectually he was unable to define the boundaries of each. In pastoral work, too, his width of sympathy stood him in good stead, and the chapter in which this is handled demands the careful study of all those who have the care of souls.

Dr. Nicoll's chapter dealing with Watson, better known as Ian MacLaren, as a novelist, is a model of discriminating criticism. As a novelist Ian MacLaren was bound to belong to the sentimental school. The Celtic streak in his nature was a guarantee of that. The sentimentalist has no taste for depicting life as it is. The bare contemplation of a fact has no charm for him. Unlike the Realist he must idealise fact; he must, so to speak, give it a romantic setting. What Ian MacLaren did was to give a halo of idealism to some characteristics of Scottish rural life, and he did this with a touch of genius which at once captivated thousands of readers. It is not denied that there is another and a darker side to Scottish rural life than that depicted by Ian MacLaren, ugly facts which do not suit the sentimentalist. Not that he was ignorant of this darker side. As a minister he doubtless knew the tragic, the sombre, and the squalid phases of Scottish life in all their hideous reality, but with his peculiar temperament Ian MacLaren was compelled to ignore these, and present human nature in its lightest moods. His methods as a novelist provoked a reaction which took shape in that terribly realistic book, "The House With the Green Shutters"—a novel which, had it not been so one-sided in treatment, and deficient in the humanities, would have formed an important link with the fiction of Galt. Since Galt's day there has been no more powerful delineation of the darker side of Scottish life than that of "The House With the Green Shutters." But in his desire to make his book a protest against the Kailyard School, the author put the picture out of focus. Ian MacLaren's work in Scottish fiction needs to be supplemented on the side of realism, but in the absence of a novelist who can combine the idealistic and the realistic his novels hold the field.

From whatever point he is viewed the subject of this biography was an interesting and attractive personality. In his career are seen in conflict some of the confused intellectual and religious forces of the age. In another time Watson would have been a devout Catholic, thoroughly loyal to the church in doctrine and in life. But the play of the intellectual forces of his day made abject submission to authority impossible. In the eighteenth century he would have found himself in congenial company with the Scottish Moderates, but since those days the mystery of existence presses too deeply upon the minds of men for thinkers to be content with the complacent optimism of the Scottish school. While sympathising with thoughts and sentiments of bygone days, Watson was fully alive to the needs and moods of the present. He never really settled the dispute between his sentiments and his reason; and in this regard Watson was a genuine representative of the modern mind. From this, apart from other points of view, the biography so vividly written by Dr. Nicoll is of great value.

THE TOWN OF VANITY.*

"I've got to a time of life," says the hero of Mr. Wells's latest story, "when the only theories that interest me are generalisations about realities." Mr. Wells, as a novelist and critic of human affairs, seems to be reaching the same age. "Generalisations about realities"—or the effort towards generalisation, in a society baffling in its complexity—is characteristic of "Tono-Bungay." He associates it with "Kipps" and "Mr. Lewisham" as a serious effort at describing real existence: distinguished from his scientific fantasies, where real life only comes in incidentally, in such a fashion as the reader will tolerate who is searching primarily for sensational romance. "Tono-Bungay" is an attempt at the human comedy: one of what we must all hope will be a series of volumes depicting, for to-day and the future, the astonishing life of the twentieth century. No living writer is better equipped for this work than Mr. Wells. He has seen modern society in all its phases—from the depths as from the surface. He never grimaces to show that he is clever. He is always sincere. He refuses to be bound by the "formulas," and reveals a mind always bringing institutions, faiths, and customs to the test of a present-day judgment. Withal he here exhibits a wide sympathy, a remarkable power of presenting character in a sentence or a phrase, and an insight which finds no kind of concealment in convention and sham. "Tono-Bungay" is ostensibly a story of the adventure of Advertisement, of the flotation and huge success of a patent medicine, stimulating, to the few, and especially through faith, beneficial; to some positively deletereous. It is promoted by a little country chemist, who takes the commercial world by storm with unlimited audacity, vigor, and a touch of genius. In such a story of achieved greatness and decay there enter and pass a variety of characters, appearing and vanishing like the characters of real life, some for a few paragraphs, some for a chapter, some occupying the field to the end. "Tono-Bungay" is a less consistent and completed whole than "Kipps," whose range was limited to one particular field. There is, perhaps, less kindliness in it, a deeper sense of the follies of humanity, and of a revolt against such follies. But the adventure is more ambitious, the analysis more searching, the field of inquiry more expanded. Mr. Wells, in this book, comes to the heart of modern life; and goes far to interpret through the medium of fiction, the meaning of all its multitudinous energies and arms.

"I have called it 'Tono-Bungay,'" says the hero at the end, "but I had far better have called it waste! It is all one spectacle of forces running to waste, of people who use and do not replace, the story of a country hectic with a wasting, aimless fever of trade and money making and pleasure seeking. And now I build destroyers!" It is a confusion, because modern life is a confusion. It passes as a series of episodes, random and disconnected, because all experience which is not numbed by custom or hedged into irrevocable routine must necessarily be random and disconnected in such a tumultuous, fragmentary world. Mr. Wells can show that world in its rockings and upheavals, until beneath the seeming calm and conventionality of the surface view, is heard the very sound of the fractures and fallings; an age in the headlong rush of change. His hero at one time is floating immense financial companies, a king of speculation, courted by the great, one of England's "Conquerors." At another he is quarrelling and forgiving and quarrelling again with a little commonplace uncomprehending wife down in a commonplace villa at Ealing. He is learning to fly, absorbed in the work of scientific invention—the one real thing of solid resistance in a universe of slush and mud and make-believe. He is engaged in random, fantastic sociabilities at Beckenham or Chislehurst, discussing, under the conflagrations of sun and star, the respective merits, as domestic pets, of cat or dog. He is plunging, in disconnected adventure, into a piratical raid into West Africa after "quap," a poisonous radio-active product of enormous value, and, again, emerging from that terrific battle with unclean and tenacious forces, he is balancing toast on a tea-cup in a London drawing-room. He tumbles into love, driven forward by blind tyrannous forces which overthrow reason and conventional restraint, against which he has never been warned, in whose service he can find no meaning. And in problems of sex which appear simple to the upholders of the existing moral standards and simple, again, to the orthodox revolters from the existing moral standards, he can find nothing but perplexity and confusion—no certain guidance of all.

At the beginning of his life the child is reared under the shadow of Bladesover, under the dominance of the great house, in the feudal tradition seen from the underside. And here was a civilisation which could be approved or condemned, but which at least stood as a coherent thing—a rule of life, a code of conduct, an organic society. But as he grows to manhood, Bladesover is sinking into decay, perishing, not knowing that it is perishing, thinking that it will endure for ever. The man who is living amid that long-drawn decline is wandering between two worlds, one dead, the other powerless to be born. It is an age in passing. What is coming to replace it? No one knows. The religion, the moral affirmations and denials of Bladesover are vanishing with it. Like the great house, the outward seeming still maintains an appearance of life. Still church steeple and feudal tower together dominate the countryside. But the inner heart of them has gone. Man, as he achieves maturity, as he achieves sincerity from the rubbish heap of dead and dying assertions and denials in which he is being upreared, finds himself naked and alone in the midst of all the clamor and violence of encompassing hordes of his fellows, as naked and alone as in the dawn of time. No pillar of cloud by day, no pillar of fire by night, directs his onward journey. And the irony of the affair is provided by the fact that the moment of the apprehension of this loneliness is the moment also of the apprehension of magnificence in mental achievement—when civilisation, intoxicated with the attainment of comfort, is crowning itself with flowers and calling itself immortal. The effect is similar to that of the splendor of a palace which is found to be designed by a madman.

It is a "new hotel population" here revealed as the ascendant race: the "multitude of economically ascendant people who are learning how to spend money." They are "running the world, practically, running it faster and faster." Mr. Wells sees them as "the most unpremeditated, subtle, successful, and aimless plutocracy that ever encumbered the destinies of mankind." Businesses rise up in the midst of them like huge bubbles, expand, burst, leaving their trail of dying and dead. Now it is schemes for irrigating the Sahara, now the exploitation of stolen territories by Chartered Companies, now uncertain gold mines in Australia or Peru, now patent medicines designed to give back to the sedentary populations the health they have lost in their impossible methods of living. Each bubble, as it rises, bears up the promoters and schemers with their parasites and retainers. For a moment they figure amongst the successful, on the summit, in the sunlight. They buy up the Bladesovers. They renovate the countryside with a quickened feudal effervescence. They erect their frantic, unmeaning palaces, moving hills which obstruct the view, making a billiard-room under a lake, surrounding their estates with eleven miles of ten-foot wall. They provide "work for the unemployed," and are hailed as captains of industry. Then, after a little while, they go, perhaps after their patent pill or exploring company has collapsed, perhaps before, whether successful or shamed entirely unimportant, in that last scene which is always tragedy. Of the fate of such an Age the hero here makes no prophecy. The sadness of his frustrated life, of the denial of the only thing in life that he passionately desires, fills the whole scene with the sense of baffled purposes of a striving that ends in nothing. "It may be," he confesses at the end, "I see decay all about me because I am, in a sense, decay. To others it may be a scene of achievement and construction radiant with hope. I, too, have a sort of hope, but it is a remote hope, a hope that finds no promise in this Empire or in any of the great things of our time. How they will look in history I do not know."

But, if not for the age and society, the end is sure for the individual. The vendor of bogus cures, the little country chemist, Ponderevo, who has become the millionaire company promoter and, again, the fraudulent financier, "wanted" on a specific charge, is at length brought up against reality. In a squalid inn near the Pyrenees, irritated by the irrelevant babble of Anglican curate and Sister of Mercy, he finds the whole vast fabric of illusion leaving him as unprotected as the child of the gutter in an hour when, as Montaigne said: "Il faut parler François"—It is necessary to speak plain. "There I sat," writes his nephew at the last hour, "holding his hand tight, and trying to think what seeds of immortality could be found in all his being, what sort of ghost there was in him to wander out into the bleak immensities." Afterwards he goes out into the night. "I felt as I sometimes feel after the end of a play. I saw the whole business of my uncle's life as something familiar and completed. It was done, like a play one leaves, like a book one closes. I thought of the push and the promotions, the noise of London, the crowded, various company of people through which our lives had gone, the public meetings, the excitements, the dinners and disputations, and suddenly it appeared to me that none of these things existed. It came to me like a discovery that none of these things existed." But to the wife of the great financier—knowing him, loving him, as just a vain, silly child—the accusation is against the reality, against the intrusion of hard, irrevocable things, into a dream world. "But it wasn't fair, George. It wasn't fair. Life and Death—great, serious things—why couldn't they leave him alone, and his lies and ways?"

The absence of dogmatism, the complete candour, the detachment and simplicity with which the tale is told, removes altogether from the narrative any impression of Cad or Prig, the besetting dangers of autobiography. George Ponderevo breaks during his life every one of the commandments. He is guilty of murder, adultery, and thieving upon a grandiose scale. Yet he never "cants" to himself. If he cannot see life whole, he sees it at least steadily: apart from the shams and illusions of those who have settled down in comfort in that city wherein it was decreed "should be sold all sorts of vanity, and that it should last all the year long." One of the great impressions of the book, beyond the heat and hurry and dust of it, is its irretrievableness—the indignity of its never ceasing, of no possibility of retracement being offered to those who have lost their way. Time and again he would ask to be allowed to wait a moment, to rest and examine and inquire. But at each attempt he is jerked and hurried forward in the grasp of giant forces, which he can neither comprehend nor control. Time and again he is protesting. "No: that was a mistake: I am sorry, let me do this again, and I'll do it right." But in each case there is no conceivable possibility of return. The marriage with Marion and the passionate episode with Effie, and the ruin that Lady Beatrice has made of her life, and a hundred false starts and enterprises down blind alleys and along darkened ways could all—it appears—have been rectified and avoided if only the inexorable hours had allowed but a momentary return. There is no such momentary return. And so this adventure—as the whole human adventure—takes upon itself, at best, an aspect of failure: of so many things done with ill purpose, of so many with no purpose at all. It would be a mistake to call this a sombre book. It certainly is a serious one. There are passages of laughter in it, interludes of sunshine. There is little condemnation and no preaching in it, a large serene air of toleration for all these baffled children who are making such a mess of their lives: judgment, but as "the judgment of the light that falls around a helpless thing." Beneath all is the vision of life as a quest, as a quest unsatisfied. In ambition, through wealth, and power, by passionate love, in scientific invention, down all the windy ways of men, the man who tells of it is always seeking something. At times "I feel like a man floundering in a universe of soapsuds, up and down, east and west" is the confession. "I can't stand it. I must get my foot on something solid." At times all that this vague unrest seems to reveal is that "I am a hard and morally limited cad with a mind beyond my merits." A "creature of chance and impulse and unmeaning tradition," he finds himself, in certain moments, on the verge of the discovery: in a sunset, a mood or so, the high air, in the form and color of a woman, something found and lost in Mantegna's pictures, in the lines of the boats he builds. But below the noise and clamor and mad purposes of this amazing world, he can cherish an appeal which is never quite intelligible, a hunger which is never quite satisfied. "All my life has been at bottom seeking, disbelieving always, dissatisfied always with the thing seen and the thing believed, seeking something in toil, in forces, in danger, something whose name and nature I do not clearly understand, something beautiful, worshipful, enduring, wise profoundly and fundamentally, and the utter redemption of myself: I don't know—All I can tell is that it is something I have ever failed to find."

"Tono-Bungay" is a great novel, a sincere, courageous, and stimulating study of modern life, an attempt to find the significance of it all. It is written with detachment, with humor, with restraint. It is sometimes almost uncanny in its insight. It says things about ourselves which have never been said before.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

One is somewhat puzzled to know why Dr. Bode's "Rembrandt und seine Zeitgenossen" should have its title changed to "Great Masters of Dutch and Flemish Painting," because it is translated into English. The only great Flemish masters dealt with in the volume issued under the latter title (Duckworth, 7s. 6d. net) are Rubens and Vandyck, and the German title, literally rendered into English, would appear better suited to the character of the work. That, however, is a small point compared with the general satisfaction that will be felt at the translation into our language of a book of Continental art criticism as thorough and authoritative as the one before us. The volume has been capably translated by Miss Margaret L. Clarke from the second and revised edition of Dr. Bode's original. Greater care might, it is true, have been exercised in the proof-reading. We note one or two instances of erratic punctuation: on page 187 "Meindert Hobbema" is made to appear as the names of two artists, instead of one, by the interposition of a comma; and on page 116 the Frankfort painter Adam Elsheimer is referred to as "Dutch." But these are small blemishes in a work that is a veritable encyclopaedia of the Dutch artists, great and little, of the seventeenth century. Some of the names included are still unfamiliar to many a tolerably well-informed connoisseur in this country, and the sympathetic appreciations attached to them should do much to create, or re-create, interest in their art. We are especially grateful for the chapter on Hercules Seghers, the landscapist, who, above all others, influenced the art of Rembrandt in that branch. It may be observed that Elsheimer's influence on Rembrandt, which has been made so much of by modern critics, is not even mentioned by Dr. Bode. The pugnacity that was rather a prominent feature of the recently translated "Florentine Sculptors of the Renaissance" is only echoed here in a mild contentiousness directed against Fromentin and Burger with regard to their verdict on Ruisdael, of whom Dr. Bode is a wholehearted admirer. We have read few art books published during the last two or three years that were as catholic and useful to the student as this is.

The Rev. C. W. Gordon ("Ralph Connor"), of Winnipeg, Canada, is known as the author of a number of books of a religious character, some of which have attained a wide popularity. He has now entered the field of biography with a "Life of James Robertson, D.D." (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s. net.) As one would expect from a writer of Mr. Gordon's literary insight, and from the fact that he was personally associated with the subject of this memoir, the work is a worthy memorial of one of the great figures in the Presbyterian Church of Canada. Dr. Robertson was born in Scotland in 1839, and was of humble parentage. Financial misfortune obliged his family to emigrate to Ontario in 1855, and here, young as he was, he quickly gained a position as a teacher and preacher. After a course at Toronto University, he joined the Alexander Mission at New York, and in 1869 received a call to Norwich, in Ontario, whence after four years he was transferred to the pastorate of Knox Church, Winnipeg. His important period of missionary activity began in 1881 when he was appointed superintendent of missions in the north-west, a position which he held till his death in 1902. A strong man, he would appear to have been tireless in his strength, and his record of work, culminating in the organisation of a mission to the Yukon at the time of the rush for gold, shows by statistics a wonderful multiplication of mission fields during his term of office. He was jealous, too, for the honor of his church; and, on the severely practical side, he was unequalled as a canvasser for its funds, having a positive genius for collecting subscribers. It was characteristic of his self-reliant enthusiasm that he did not always wait for the orders of his presbytery before taking action, and this independence gained him some vituperative enemies. But he never lost the confidence of the authorities, and most of those who disliked his methods, or suffered from his sarcasm, came at last to recognise his worth as a worker and a friend.

"Early Victorian and Other Papers," by Mr. E. S. P. Haynes (Elkin Mathews, 1s. 6d. net), contains a number of pleasant essays written in a vein of dry and tolerant humor. Mr. Haynes is at his best when writing of early Victorian standards and ideals. His judgment of the period is that it was an age of "generous impulses, coupled with a perilous tendency to cant, a robust sense of humor, tempered by a somewhat barbaric prudery, and a profound conviction that no one 'deserved' to be alive who did not find life worth living." The early Victorian ideal of woman was a being "guileless, fragile, inconsequent, loyal, and virtuous to the verge of imbecility." As compared with the present generation, Mr. Haynes notices that the early Victorian had a keener sense of honor and a firmer adherence to principle. There is something of a reaction against the shallow judgment which thought that anything—art, literature, furniture, or political ideals—was fit only for contempt if it could be shown to be early Victorian. An essay on "Lord Hamilton and 'Horatia'" contains some unpublished letters of interest.

The South African Native Races Committee has just published an extremely useful supplement to their earlier report, entitled "The South African Natives" (Murray, 6s. net). It is by far the fullest and most careful statement of facts relating to the Kaffirs that has yet appeared, and should command considerable attention, in view of the political reconstruction of South Africa which is now seen. Much remarkable evidence attests the economic, educational, and moral progress which has taken place where, as in the Transkei and in Basutoland, just and liberal modes of administration have been tried. The various forms of land-tenure and of tribal law, the growing occupation of natives in mining and other industries, and a number of other subjects, are set in their order, bear-

We have received the first annual volume of "Our Land" (Cassell), a monthly journal devoted to an examination of the land problem in all its complexities. The editor, Mr. George Radford, is to be congratulated on having produced a periodical of real value. There are articles on the practical sides of farm work, while the broader sides of the question are treated with force and knowledge.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning, Feb. 5.	Price Friday morning, Feb. 12.
Consols 2½ per cent.	83½	84 1/16
India 3 per cent.	84⅛	86¾
German 3 per cent.	85⅛	86½
Japanese 5 per cent.	102⅛	103
London and North Western	133¼	137
Peruvian Pref.	37½	38¾

The last account on the Stock Exchange was a cheerful one, and there has been a strong tone during the week in most departments. Consols lead the way in the early part of the week, advancing on Thursday above 85, while Irish Land Stock and other Government loans rose in sympathy. My anticipations regarding the Canadian loan have been fully realised, and it has risen to 1¼ premium, while the new Indian loan is quoted at a premium of 1⅛. One reason for this improvement in gilt-edged securities is said to be Government purchases for sinking fund account, but the main explanation is undoubtedly the return of cheap money. Gold has been flowing rapidly into the Bank of England from abroad. Short loans have been a little above or a little below 1½ per cent., and discount rates have fallen away. The same tendency is observable in all the great financial centres, and the downward movement has been assisted by improved condition of foreign politics. The Franco-German agreement in regard to Morocco, and the King's visit to Berlin have made a good impression.

Foreign Bonds.

In the Foreign market, also, there has been strong investment buying. All the leading Government bonds have risen, and some of the more speculative favorites, like Peruvians, have gone ahead rather fast. The Sao Paulo Coffee bonds were actually at 5½ premium on Wednesday. Coffee has been rising in price, which gives an additional security to this particular loan that is not possessed by other Brazilian issues. Japanese bonds have shown an all-round improvement, and even Russians have rallied a little, in spite of disquieting information as to political and economic conditions. Canadian and American Railways have been irregular. Severe blizzards have done a good deal of damage, and the trade recovery, about which so much has been written, refuses, as the journalists say, to materialise. Home Railways also seem to offer better opportunities to the investor. The falling off in traffics on some of the big lines has been largely offset by economies. The London Tubes have really done quite well during the last six months, and Sir George Gibb is to be warmly congratulated upon the success he has achieved in what seemed an almost hopelessly uphill task. Sir Edgar Speyer also deserves a large share of the credit. The amount carried to net revenue during the last six months by the Piccadilly, Hampstead, and Bakerloo Tubes was £70,766, against £48,518—a very big improvement.

The Home Railway Dividends.

How far the trade depression has actually lowered our railway dividends, and how far directors have been able, by retrenchments and improved organisation, to overcome their difficulties, will be seen from the following table, which gives the leading lines:—

ENGLISH.	Second Half 1908. Div.	Second Half 1908. Carried Forward.	Second Half 1907. Div.	Second Half 1907. Carried Forward.

The London and North-Western dividend is at the rate of 6¾ per cent. per annum as against 7¼ per cent. There was a published traffic decrease of £371,000, but the decline in the dividend only represents £107,000, while the carry-forward is reduced by £24,000, and no allocation is made to reserve against £50,000 a year ago. In this way, observes the "Morning Post," about £181,000 is accounted for, so that working expenses appeared to have been reduced by £226,000, but the shrinkage in revenue was probably a good deal smaller than the weekly returns showed. On Wednesday London and North-Western stock rose from 134 to 137.

The Problem of Railway Economy.

The whole interest of the market this half-year has centred in the question of working costs, and now that the results are known dealers, on the whole, are very well satisfied. Writing before the publication of the North-Western and the Midland reports, I cannot give a statement of the total reduction in costs; but the four "heavies" have probably saved between them something like £350,000, in spite of an increase of £98,000 in the expenses of the Great Western. For the shareholders' immediate interests that is good enough, and prices have been rising sharply for the last fortnight; but the real problem is not so much whether expenses can be reduced in a given half-year, as whether they can be brought down permanently to a lower level—a much more difficult business. Are the managers keeping a better control of their lines, and avoiding unnecessary mileage and wasteful expenditure? As a partial answer to that question, I take the figures of the Great Central, whose report shows so far the greatest economy of all. In this case, working expenses have fallen by nearly £104,000, and a loss of £95,000 in gross is turned into a gain of £8,500 in net. That is a remarkable result, and the secret lies, I think, in the mileage figures. The number of miles run has fallen by no less than 790,000, or 7 per cent., while the goods handled and the passengers carried have fallen by only 4 per cent. In other words, the company's trains have covered 7 per cent. less ground to earn 4 per cent. less for the shareholders. These figures, sketchy as they are, certainly suggest a more successful management, and if the companies generally can save as much as the Great Central, without impairing the efficiency of their service, the future of English railways is not so gloomy after all. But we must wait another year or two before we dogmatise. It would, by the way, be a great help in the analysis of statistics if the railways stated the volume of the traffic handled as well as the amount received in freight. At present we are left far too much in the dark.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."

Messrs. METHUEN'S NEW BOOKS

Messrs. Methuen's New Illustrated Announcement List, containing notes of many new and interesting Books, is now ready and will be sent to any applicant.

GENERAL LITERATURE

TRAGEDY QUEENS OF THE GEORGIAN ERA. By JOHN FYVIE. With 16 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

This book is not a theatrical history, but a series of biographical sketches of all the most prominent English tragedy actresses of the eighteenth century, from the days of the famous Madam Barry and the fascinating Oldfield down to those of the majestic Siddons and the beautiful O'Neil. In every case the strictly professional career of the performer is made subordinate to the private life and character of the woman.

THE REMAKING OF MODERN EUROPE: from the Outbreak of the French Revolution to the Treaty of Berlin, 1789-1878. By J. A. R. MARRIOTT, M.A., With many Maps, crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. [Six Ages of European History.

The author of this work has had great experience as a College tutor at Oxford and as an examiner both in University and School Examinations. The book is intended to serve as a text-book for the highest forms in schools, particularly for those preparing for Local and other similar examinations, and also as an introduction for those taking this period in examinations at the University.

THE THRESHOLD OF RELIGION. By R. R. MARETT, M.A. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

In these five essays a wider conception of Primitive Religion than is to be met with in the writings of Dr. E. B. Tylor or Dr. J. G. Fraser is shown to be tenable both on grounds of anthropological fact and in the light of the psychology more especially applicable to the question—namely, a social psychology.

"Mr. Marett's treatment is vigorous, lucid, and worthy of the best traditions of Oxford. This collection of terse, tense, compressed essays exhibits in a remarkable degree unity of design and method."
—Morning Post.

READINGS ON THE PARADISO OF DANTE. Chiefly based on the Commentary of BENVENUTO DA IMOLA. By the Hon. WILLIAM WARREN VERNON, M.A. With an Introduction by the BISHOP OF RIPON. A New and Improved Edition, in 2 vols., crown 8vo, 15s. net.

"A monument of industry and a work which no student of Dante would care to be without."—Westminster Gazette.

THE INDIAN BORDERLAND: being a Personal Record of Twenty Years. By Sir T. H. HOLDICH, K.C.I.E. With 22 Illustrations and a Map. New and Revised Edition. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This work contains a personal record of the author's connection with those military and political expeditions which, during the last twenty years, have led to the consolidation of our present position in the north-west frontier of India.

THE THOUGHTS OF LUCIA HALLIDAY. Edited by R. M. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

This book is meant to be taken up in leisure hours, and to be companionable when you lounge under a tree in Summer, or enjoy a lonely hour by a winter fire. The writer has lived in very varied society, from statesmen and diplomatists to commercial travellers, and the many years she has spent abroad have widened her sympathies and outlook on life. This is not the writer's first book, but she veils under a pseudonym her more intimate thoughts.

HOME LIFE IN ITALY. By LINA DUFF GORDON (Mrs. Aubrey Waterfield). With many Illustrations, of which 13 are by Aubrey Waterfield, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Second Edition.

"One of the most delightful books of gossip about Italian life that we have ever read."—Athenæum.

SIXTH EDITION.

MAN AND THE UNIVERSE. By Sir OLIVER LODGE. F.R.S Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

This is a study of the influence of the advance in scientific knowledge upon our understanding of Christianity.

"It is impossible to withhold sympathy from the genuine fervour with which Sir Oliver devotes himself to breaking down the notion that the scientific conception of the world is incompatible with the religious or spiritual view."—Times.

A SPANISH HOLIDAY. By CHARLES MARRIOTT. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"A delightful and interesting record of experiences, presented in a vigorous and attractive literary style."—Scotsman.

"As a virile, interesting, and amusing book the work is admirable."—Manchester Courier.

LORENZO THE MAGNIFICENT; and Florence in her Golden Age. By E. L. S. HORSBURGH. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 15s. net.

"All the infinite complexities of interests and intrigues are here set forth clearly so that the student's way should be made plain."
—Daily Telegraph.

"A work of literary value and philosophic value which will bring profit and delight at every reading."—Outlook.

HER INFINITE VARIETY: a Feminine Portrait Gallery. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, gilt top, 5s. [Third Edition.

This is uniform with "The Open Road," "The Friendly Town," &c.

"Surely a like array of beautiful and entertaining women was never marshalled.—Spectator.

THE WIND IN THE WILLOWS. By KENNETH GRAHAME. Author of "The Golden Age." Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s. [Third Edition.

"The adventures are told with many a pretty turn of fancy and many a little gem of description, such as only a master of English could give us."—Daily Mail.

"A fascinating book for children; a charming book for grown-ups."—Outlook.

Major Hume's New Series—ROMANTIC HISTORY.

TWO ENGLISH QUEENS AND PHILIP. By MARTIN HUME, M.A., Pembroke College, Cambridge. With a Frontispiece in Photogravure and 12 other illustrations, demy 8vo, 15s. net.

"A fine and masterly volume. The book is better reading than any historical novel, and it has the crowning virtue of being true."
—Daily Telegraph.

THE FIRST GOVERNESS OF THE NETHERLANDS. MARGARET OF AUSTRIA. By ELEANOR E. TREMAYNE With an Introduction by MARTIN HUME. With 20 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"A singularly careful and conscientious piece of work."
—Morning Post.

FICTION

HOLY ORDERS. By MARIE CORELLI. 110th Thousand. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.

BROTHERS ALL: More Stories of Dutch Peasant Life. By MAARTEN MAARTENS, Author of "An Old Maid's Love." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.

The Dutch peasant of to-day may be said to be as unknown to readers as the Dutch peasant of Ostade and Jan Steen are known to art critics. In his new book Mr. Maarten Maartens, the Dutch writer, who has, like Mr. Conrad, chosen English as his literary medium, has taken the Dutch peasant for his theme, and it will be impossible any more for wise readers to plead ignorance of that interesting personality.

THE STORY OF VIRGINIA PERFECT. By PEGGY WEBLING, Author of "Blue Jay." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.

"The Story of Virginia Perfect" is a novel of modern London life very freshly told. It is full of types, Bohemian and natural, and full also of emotional and other incident, and not a little humour.

"Here is a book that the New Year will find hard to beat, welcome as the aconite and snowdrop, full of tears and laughter and true human things."—Morning Post.

THE FLOWER OF THE HEART. By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.

"The book is of absorbing interest and a masterly piece of work."

"Alice Eversley is one of the sweetest, most delicately charming women of modern fiction."—Daily Mail.

"A fine and powerful novel. No one can question its sincerity and power."—Daily Telegraph.

A SON OF THE EMPEROR. By NEWTON V. STEWART. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.

"Mr. Stewart works out with great skill the pattern of the story, and has written a book of unusual interest."—Daily Mail.

IN THE POTTER'S HOUSE. By G. D. ELDRIDGE. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.

"The author is comparable to Mr. Caine because of his splendid inventiveness of incidents and his ceaseless fluency."—Daily News.

"The attitudes of the characters are powerfully handled, and the whole book has strength and freshness."—Morning Leader.

OVER BEMERTON'S: an Easy-Going Chronicle. By E. V. LUCAS. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Fifth Edition.

"Mr. Lucas has in these pages added to the debt of gratitude owed him by the reading public."—Spectator.

"Mr. Lucas has both wit and humour."—Daily News.

"Many delightful character sketches, much wisdom of life, and not a little book lore."—Tatler.

"Full of sparkle and grace, in fact quite worthy of Mr. Lucas's reputation."—Black and White.

"An extremely palatable and entertaining book."
—Liverpool Courier.

THE GIFTED FAMILY. By BARRY PAIN, Author of "Lindlay Kays." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.

Mr. Barry Pain's new and divertive story opens in a sitting-room over a bookseller's shop in the Finchley Road. The bookseller, an enthusiastic Meredithian, has a family of three daughters and a son. The book is full of humorous observations.

TO BE PUBLISHED LATER.

BARBARY SHEEP. By ROBERT HICHENS, Author of "The Garden of Allah." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"Barbary Sheep" is a study of the influence and charm that an Eastern man may exercise over a Western woman, a woman typically modern, capricious, and accustomed to the gratification of every whim. The scene of the story is laid in Algeria, at the gate of the Sahara Desert.

KATHERINE THE ARROGANT. By B. M. CROKER, Author of "Peggy of the Bartons." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.

Mrs. Croker, whose novels are beginning to fill more than one shelf of the library, has given to her forthcoming work the attractive title, "Katherine the Arrogant." It is, like all her works, vivacious and arresting; the story of a young orphan girl of good birth and education whom circumstances force to earn her own living,—always an attractive theme to the modern novelist of manners. Chance gives her as employer an unscrupulous old woman, and the story follows her adventures not only in London, but in Switzerland, with much entertaining thoroughness.

THE LOVE-STORY OF ST. BEL. By BERNARD CAPES, Author of "A Jay of Italy." Crown 8vo, 6s.

In the "Love-Story of St. Bel" Mr. Capes has returned to the fields which won him exceptional success in "A Jay of Italy." Only he has ventured back yet a century earlier into mediaeval history, and has thereby plunged into times still more adaptable to a free romantic handling. The story treats of Siena in the days of St. Catherine.

MY LADY OF SHADOWS. By JOHN OXENHAM, Author of "The Gate of the Desert." Crown 8vo, 6s.

SET IN SILVER. By C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON, Authors of "The Lightning Conductor." With a Frontispiece in Colour by ARTHUR H. BUCKLAND. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Diary of the Week.

Parliament was opened on Tuesday by the King and Queen with the usual gorgeous ceremony in the streets and in the House of Lords. The King's Speech, following, as it does, the Ministerial decision to postpone all conflict with the House of Lords, offers a compromise between two courses. It suggests a Welsh Disestablishment Bill, which in the nature of things can only receive a second reading and will not even go into Committee of the whole House, and a series of useful but mostly subordinate and non-contentious measures. The Irish Land Bill and the Housing Bill are to be re-introduced, the former, we are afraid, with little or no hope of success. Two excellent Bills, which partly fulfil the Government's scheme for dealing with Unemployment, are also to be proposed, one for setting up Labor Exchanges, the other for constituting Trade Boards in sweated industries. The only other Bill of any importance is the London Registration Bill. If this is contentious it will, of course, be destroyed by the Lords. Curiously enough, the most important administrative Bill—that embodying Lord Morley's great Indian reforms—will come first, not before the House of Commons but before the House of Lords.

The surprise of the Speech, however, is a declaration as to the Estimates. The House of Commons is informed that, "owing to various causes, including the new provision which was made last year for old age and an increase which has become necessary in the cost of my Navy, the expenditure of the year will be considerably in excess of that of the past twelve months." This unaccustomed reference to an increase in the Navy Estimates, and the omission of the usual formula that they and the budgets of the other Departments have been framed "with a due regard to economy," have been variously interpreted. We imagine the truth to be that the Cabinet have agreed that some increase in the shipbuilding vote is essential, but have not agreed as to the amount. The majority, therefore, will have full opportunity of making its wishes known.

The language of the Speech has revived the general Liberal agitation—we had almost said consternation—caused by the Prime Minister's declarations to Mr. Lee on the two-power standard. A large meeting of thoroughly solid and representative members of the party was held at the briefest notice on Wednesday, an amendment to the Address was drawn up, and submitted by Mr. Murray Macdonald, and the Government have been asked to give a day for it. They have practically declined, a very grave decision, which makes straight talking and voting on the later debate essential. We believe that the tone of the meeting was of the firmest character, and was absolutely unanimous. The party are willing to accept a moderate increase, but we greatly doubt whether at this moment a programme which involves a long first step towards a £40,000,000 Naval Budget can pass, even with the aid of the Tories. Is it possible that Mr. Asquith contemplates the certain disruption of his Government and party on such an issue as this? An almost equally strong feeling exists in favor of Mr. Ponsonby's amendment, which proposes to carry on the Campbell-Bannerman resolution through a measure limiting the veto of the House of Lords.

Meanwhile Mr. Balfour's hand has again been rudely forced by the Protectionists, who seem to be angling directly for the Irish Home Rule vote. The Opposition chiefs had undoubtedly arranged to give the first place to a general attack on Mr. Birrell's Irish administration, embodying a plea for a revival of coercion. On Wednesday, however, this order was roughly reversed, and a pure Protectionist amendment was tabled by Mr. Austen Chamberlain, and given the place of honor. The amendment is a self-destroying mixture of Protection for the home market, of Retaliation, and of a policy of Colonial Preferences. Thus it asks for proposals (1) "enlarging the market for British and Irish produce"; (2) increasing the demand for labor by a reform of the fiscal system which will (a) promote the growth of the home trade, and (b) provide means for "mitigating" foreign tariffs; (3) developing "mutual preferences" between different parts of the Empire. Thus, by a neat paraphrase of his Tuesday's speech, Mr. Balfour is made to appear as a well-branded "whole hogger."

The tactical triumph of the Protectionists was checked by a notable incident in Thursday's debate. After Mr. Austen Chamberlain had pledged himself to tax corn, and Mr. Redmond, at Mr. Masterman's instance, had asked whether the Protectionists, if they bid for the Irish vote by a semi-promise of Protection for Irish industries, would drop coercion, Lord Robert Cecil delivered one of the few speeches which deeply impress the House of Commons. Lord Robert's speech was a re-affirmation of his Free Trade faith and a refusal to take the Protectionist pledge. But its value was its powerful and sincere protest against the action of the Confederates. He treated this as a forecast of the Protectionist method when it came to the rigging of tariffs and the driving of votes into the lobby. It promised to develop a new force of corruption and organised pressure in English politics. The House listened, as it always listens to all truthful and upright speech, with the deepest attention. So long as Free Trade has such advocates it is safe. The Labor group, through Mr. Snowden, again repudiated Protection, and the pretence of curing unemployment by taxes on bread, meat, and timber was riddled by Mr. Lloyd George.

The Labor Party attacked the Government on Wednesday through an amendment of Mr. Barnes condemning their remedies for unemployment as inadequate. Mr. Keir Hardie went further, and declared that the Prime Minister had broken faith—a charge for which we see no ground whatever. The Government's full programme for the relief of unemployment necessarily waits on an examination of the exhaustive documents provided by the Majority and Minority Reports of the Poor Law Commission. But it already includes two Bills of importance, and it is well known that a third, on afforestation, will be produced if the service demands can be cut down, and that the Treasury and the Board of Trade are making thorough inquiries into insurance for invalidity and unemployment. The Labor speeches were hardly practical, pure Socialist ideas and formulæ being more visible in them than at earlier stages of their policy. Sir Charles Dilke criticised afforestation as a remedy for unemployment, and thought that the insurance scheme should not apply to trade unionists only. Mr. Churchill spoke with much brilliancy and a real grasp of the problem.

We discuss elsewhere what we conceive to be the bearings of the massive reports of the Majority and the Minority of the Poor Law Commission, embodied as they are in nearly 1,200 pages of print. The common ground of these two views of the Poor Law system is great; the divergence considerable. Both parties—Lord George Hamilton's and Mrs. Sidney Webb's—agree to do away with the Boards of Guardians and substitute various authorities emanating from the county and borough councils. Both agree to abolish the workhouse and differentiate its method of dealing with the aged, the sick, the young, and the mentally infirm. Both accept widely graded treatment for the unemployed, terminating, for the "won't works" with the semi-penal colony. The Minority Report, however, goes on to develop, with brilliant and fertile powers of generalisation and illustration, an extraordinarily close and well-thought scheme for assigning to various committees, assisted by a registrar, with legal functions, the work of handling the very different problems which the relief of distress or helplessness in various cases involves. This is the pith of the Minority Report, and we must refer our readers to our analysis of the way in which its method is conceived and worked out. The danger of the Majority Report seems to us to be that it destroys the Board of Guardians, and sets them up again as branches of the Charity Organisation Society.

It is announced that Lord Charles Beresford is to quit his command of the Channel Fleet next month, after two years' tenure of it, and to retire on half-pay. He might have had a further period of two years' service, but this, we suppose, is forbidden by his prolonged and fierce quarrel with Sir John Fisher. This powerful and dangerous man, who now assumes the dictation of Liberal policy, and who, after initiating the "Dreadnought" type, takes the line that it alone is of serious account, and, therefore, that our overwhelming predominance in all other types is of little or no value, is now left omnipotent at the Admiralty. We doubt the wisdom of such reliance on a single man, accustomed to use the Press freely to promote his views. The Channel Fleet is now to be absorbed into the Main Fleet, of which it will form a division. This body represents incomparably the most powerful naval force afloat. Probably it could meet and beat all the navies of Europe put together.

After a somewhat surprising delay Mr. Shaw, the Lord Advocate, has been appointed to the Lordship of Appeal which became vacant with Lord Robertson's death. No other selection was possible, either on the ground of political service or of legal distinction. We can never understand the reasons which make Liberal statesmen shrink from giving the spirit of Liberalism precisely as much power in the judicature and magistracy as individual merit deserves. It would be foolish for Liberals to behave as if good lawyers were exclusively confined to the party which in their view makes bad politicians. The feeling that the Lord Chancellor has acted on some such theory in his choice of magistrates is responsible for a tremendous outburst against him by Mr. Agar Robartes. Mr. Shaw's appointment to the Lordship of Appeal will, we hope, soothe these feelings. Incidentally it weakens the Radical side of the Government in the House of Commons. Both Mr. Sinclair and Mr. Shaw belonged to the advanced section. Mr. Ure, the new Lord Advocate, admirable as a lawyer and a politician, is a representative of the moderates. On the other hand, Radicalism will be reinforced by the choice of Mr. Arthur Dewar as Solicitor-General. Mr. Dewar is one of the sincerest Radicals in the House of Commons, and he is one of the ablest and most popular of Scottish Members.

On Saturday last Kiamil Pasha's Ministry fell. On the Wednesday preceding he had dismissed, without consulting his colleagues, the Ministers of War and Marine. These two Ministers were adherents of the Committee of Union and Progress, and the Committee saw in Kiamil's step a declaration of war upon themselves. They were further disturbed by Kiamil's determination to send the "Salonika" battalions—the troops most loyal to the Committee—from Constantinople to Albania. A month before, the Committee, against their will, had been induced by British pressure to give Kiamil a vote of confidence. On this occasion, with the support of the army and the navy, they took up a challenge which they thought, and with good reason, an attack on the Constitution. Their adherents in the Ministry, including Hilmi Pasha, Minister of the Interior, resigned, and the Chamber on Saturday called upon Kiamil to explain his conduct.

Kiamil refused to come, but asked for a postponement of explanations until Wednesday. Thereupon the Chamber passed a vote of no confidence in Kiamil by 198 votes to 8; even the Liberal Union deserted him.

The Shah called upon Hilmi Pasha to form a Ministry, and the Committee and the Chamber thus asserted in its fulness the doctrine of Ministerial responsibility to Parliament, of which Kiamil's dismissal of Ministers supported by Parliament had been the negation. Hilmi Pasha, the new Grand Vizier, was Inspector-General in Macedonia, and is one of the ablest of Turkish administrators. One of the first acts of the new Cabinet was to give England assurances of its friendliness, and to declare that Kiamil's foreign policy would be continued and the agreements with Austria and Bulgaria hastened.

Mr. Asquith, on Tuesday, spoke hopefully of the Balkan situation, but perhaps he was slightly too optimistic in suggesting that Turkey had been brought by Kiamil Pasha to the eve of a settlement with Austria and Turkey. The Austro-Turkish protocol is still unratified and passing from capital to capital, while the Russian proposal with regard to Bulgaria has been met in Constantinople with a counter-proposal which Russia professes to find an acceptance in principle. The only dispute between Turkey and Bulgaria is one not of principle but of money, and the difference between the Russian and the Turkish proposals is likewise one of money—of a good deal of money. Briefly, Turkey wants Russia to cancel not sixteen or eighteen years of tribute, as Russia offers, but the whole series of annuities due from Turkey to Russia. Before a compromise between these two schemes is reached, Turkey may decide that it would be political and financial wisdom to make a direct agreement with Bulgaria, especially as the new Turkish Ministry professes to be anxious to settle the dispute quickly, and the Committee seems to dislike Russia's intervention profoundly. The outer fringe of the Balkan trouble has not yet been touched. The Austrian and Servian newspapers are still exchanging wild words—on the one side talking of a re-occupation of Novi Bazar and an European mandate to teach Servia a lesson; on the other side uttering threats of war in the spring.

The King's Speech contained a cryptic but ominous reference to Persia. While disclaiming any "desire" to intervene in the internal affairs of Persia, and expressing a wish for "the introduction of representative institutions in a practical form," it went on to say that, in presence of the danger to their "commercial and economic interests," Great Britain and Russia are "exchanging views." Mr. Asquith's speech included an emphatic condemnation of the Shah, and a declaration that no money shall be lent him "so long as he continues his present disastrous policy." But Lord Crewe implied that intervention may be unavoidable, and both Ministers rather oddly talked of the duty of the Shah "to set up a Constitution." To our mind, his duty rather is to restore the Constitution, to which he repeatedly swore allegiance.

To contemplate any intervention is a flat repudiation of the pledges given when the Anglo-Russian Convention was signed. The intention of the Foreign Office appears to be to use the Shah's impecuniosity as a means of forcing him to adopt some sort of Constitution in return for a loan. But what sort of Constitution? The Speech emphasises the word "practical," which the "Times" interprets to mean a "less democratic" Constitution than that which the Shah destroyed. The Russian Press and the "Times" also insist on foreign control, apparently on Egyptian lines. It is surely the worst sort of intervention to use financial pressure in order to impose on the Shah some new Constitution in whose drafting the Persian people will have no say. To grant a loan to him, until he has first restored the Mejliss, is to intervene. To alter the franchise in the process is both to intervene and to meddle. We are asked to believe that Russia has been advising the Shah to set up a Constitution. But we have seen documents emanating from the Persian Court (and these documents have also reached the Foreign Office) which make it perfectly clear that the Shah believes that St. Petersburg approves his conduct. Even if a sort of undemocratic Parliament were created, with what freedom could it deliberate, while Colonel Liakhoff continues to command the guns which destroyed its predecessor?

The Report of the Committee of the Lower House of Convocation of Canterbury, appointed to consider "the Ornaments Rubric and Modifications of the existing Law relating to the Conduct of Divine Service," was formally presented on Wednesday. The majority of the Committee report in favor of permitting the use of the Eucharistic Vestments at Holy Communion, on the double ground that they "cannot be rightly regarded as symbolic of any distinctively Roman doctrine," and that "the historical conclusions underlying the ruling judgments in regard to the Vestments appear to be liable to reasonable doubt." A minority report, signed by the Dean of Canterbury and Canon Henson, objects to any such change, as "it would gravely disturb the balance which the Prayer-Book at present maintains between the various schools of thought and practice in the Church."

We think that the proposed change is certain to meet with a most strenuous opposition from Broad Churchmen and Evangelicals. Indeed, the risk of a schism on this question is far greater than the clergy and ecclesiastically minded laymen imagine or admit. The other recommendations are less debateable, though not less valuable. The majority of the Committee advise that the use of the Athanasian formula should be made permissive instead of compulsory, though there are two minority reports, one in favor of retaining the present use, and another, signed by the Principal of Cuddesdon, advising that "the minatory clauses" be omitted. We hope the time is close at hand when reverent minds will no longer be shocked by the spectacle of bands of cheerful choir-boys chanting a string of metaphysical propositions, and consigning to everlasting damnation all who refuse to accept them. As regards the suggested revision of the Lectionary, the retranslation of certain passages in the Psalms, the adoption of an alternative form of Burial Service, and other minor matters, there is more general agreement.

We are glad that Mr. Gibson Bowles has been selected as the Liberal candidate for Central Glasgow. Mr. Bowles is one of the half-dozen men who, on a system of proportional representation, would always be elected to the House of Commons. He is, in the first place, the most exact and learned student of its law and procedure, excepting only Sir Courtenay Ilbert. Secondly, he is at his best the most brilliant and finished of our Parliamentary speakers. He has, thirdly, a thorough mastery of finance, and was one of the best economists in the last Parliament. Fourthly, he has the true critical mind, an indispensable element in a great popular assembly. Finally, he is a very honest, as well as a singularly able man, and, on the ground of his intellectual gifts alone, a Scottish constituency of the character of Central Glasgow should be proud to have him as its member.

Politics and Affairs.

THE TWO PATHS FOR LIBERALISM.

> "My name stands in Europe as a symbol of the policy of peace, moderation, and non-aggression. What would be said of my active participation in a policy that will be taken as plunging England into the whirlpool of militarism?"—Gladstone on the Naval Estimates of 1894.

The meaning of the Ministerial programme outlined in the King's Speech is, we are afraid, only too evident. For the first time in its history the great Liberal Party, secure in the confidence of the House of Commons, is compelled to admit the mastery of the House of Lords, and to frame its measures, not in freedom, not with regard to the desires of its friends and its own views of popular needs, but with a vigilant eye on what the hereditary House will accept or reject. This calculation is visible not only in what the Speech says, but in what it omits to say. The Licensing Bill is dropped. The Scottish Land Bill and the Valuation Bill are dropped. There is not a word of education or of reform. With two possible exceptions, the Bills which the Speech announces, useful and wise as many of them are, fall into the category of that "neutral and colorless programme" which the Prime Minister, in his speech at the National Liberal Club, declared to be a mark of Liberal "humiliation and impotence." Neither in the mouth of the Prime Minister nor in the words of the King's Speech does any reference appear to the effectual cause of this restriction. The Campbell-Bannerman resolution remains on the journals of the House, but the only active reminder of its existence is his late secretary's amendment in support and pursuance of it.

We have said that an exception existed to that general avoidance of controversial topics which the Prime Minister disclaimed a couple of months ago. That, setting aside the Irish Land Bill, a remanet from last Session, is the announcement of a Bill for the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Welsh Church. But here, we are afraid, we merely light on another form of the great impediment to Liberal legislation. Two kinds of action were barred by Mr. Asquith after the rejection of the Licensing Bill—the selection of non-contentious Bills and the pressing forward of a number of contentious proposals destined for destruction in the Upper Chamber. This would seem to exclude every course but that of a direct attack on the Lords. Unfortunately the King's Speech combines both the methods anathematised by the Premier, without leading to the conclusion of his own argument. Every member of Parliament knows that there is no chance of the Welsh Bill becoming law. So clearly is this admitted that we have the announcement made in advance that the Bill will only be carried to a second reading, and that the House of Commons will not be asked to spend weeks and months in Committee building up a castle of cards which a breath from Berkeley Square will tumble down again. How far, then, shall we have advanced by the middle of next August to the settling of our quarrel with the Lords? We shall, indeed, have furnished a fresh instance of what Gladstone called the "tremendous contrariety and incessant conflict" between the two Houses. But Wales will have had nothing. Even if there were time to pass the Bill, the Government and the House, with the example of the Licensing Bill fresh in their minds, would be repelled by the unreality of the task set before them. Men will not work in an atmosphere revolting to the dignity and character of the House of Commons. Let the Government announce that they stand or fall by the Bill, or, better still, let them table their anti-veto Bill, and we shall see a change. But until they take that resolution, they must go on officially ignoring the fact which their own acts proclaim—namely, that they can no longer pass a distinctively Liberal Bill.

One reserved domain does, indeed, remain to them, and Mr. Asquith's pledge to concentrate on finance comes, by the necessity of the case, into the first line of Liberal policy. But under what conditions? The reference in the King's Speech to the Budget is most significant. Two reasons are linked together as excusing the rise in expenditure, the cost of old age pensions and the increase in the Navy Estimates. That strikes us as a singular union. For this Government was pledged to carry out social reform, and to resist an increase of war-like expenditure. These enlarged estimates, therefore, arise from the fulfilment of one of its promises and the violation of another. The contradiction is perceived and solved by the "Westminster Gazette," which proposes to put the matter right by exhorting the Government to fling to the winds both promises at once—that is to say, to abandon social reform in the interests of what it is pleased to call "national security." This security, again, we are invited to believe, rests solely on the building of as many "Dreadnoughts" as are thought necessary by the "expert" who a few months ago informed the nation that it could sleep quiet in its bed, for its naval defence was secure. Thus, therefore, is the Liberal party bidden to stand and deliver its entire possessions. Its power to legislate is to go to the House of Lords. The proceeds of its finance pass to the Admirals. The means of social reform are hypothecated for the use of future "Dreadnoughts," and Liberalism is to lay down its arms before some yet unborn menace to a naval power which to-day stands, in the official figures, stronger than any rival force by three or four to one.

Now, this intimation is a plain one, and we will make a plain answer to it. Not for such uses was the Grand Army of 1906 created and formed into line of battle. If the Prime Minister really asks for such a sacrifice as this uncritical yielding to the demands of the services implies, neither the Liberal Government nor the Liberal Party, as they are constituted to-day, can, in honor or conscience, make it. The war services have, in plain terms, called for the cancelling of the object in whose pursuit the Radical members of the Cabinet have pleaded for a deferring of the battle with the Lords, so that, if humanly possible, they may build up a plan of constructive reform, based on the re-handling of the whole machinery of the Poor Law and the contriving of a plan of insurance against invalidity and unemployment. They are now met with a revival of the manufactured agitation which every Liberal Government in turn encounters, made at a moment when elements in Europe hostile to this country have either disappeared or have been reduced to the most modest and measurable shape, and when our own naval power stands at its utmost height of actual and relative predominance. We know how Mr. Asquith's predecessor would have dealt with such a movement. A few weeks ago we should have felt equally confident that Mr. Asquith would have repulsed it with equal firmness. But the situation is now changed. We have to ask whether the Prime Minister's declarations to Mr. Lee must be held by him to bind the Liberal Party to a standard of naval power which it will never accept. We refuse to think so. Liberals will not consent to build and maintain a fleet equal to that of Germany and America plus ten per cent. This standard is implied in the Admiralty's demand for six "Dreadnoughts," whatever be the banner behind which it is nominally advanced. Such a task is repugnant to our brotherly feeling for the States, to the actual relations between the two Powers, and to the character and traditions of the Liberal Party as fixed and interpreted by all its great leaders and teachers. It is equally unwelcome to the new forces in politics. The overwhelming majority of the Liberal Press repudiates such a policy, and now that the matter has been plainly laid before the House of Commons, which alone can grant or withhold supplies, we believe that the Ministerialists will resolutely refuse to vote other than moderate, reasonable, above all peaceful Estimates. We strongly hope that with the concession of a fair increase in the demands for the Navy the Prime Minister will be content. But other counsels may prevail, and before them every true friend of the Liberal Party will call for bold speech and unshrinking action. No Liberal leader has a right to call on his followers to turn their backs at once on peace, on retrenchment, and on reform. To do so is to ask the party to live on the ideas of its enemies, and to doom it to perish, as German Liberalism has perished, of that unnatural food.

THE ENDING OR THE MENDING OF THE POOR LAW.

The two reports of the Poor Law Commission are so far in agreement as to show the existence of very great evils and the necessity for far-reaching reform. It is not, indeed, altogether owing to faulty Poor Law administration that pauperism has ceased to diminish, and has for twelve years past kept pace with the growth of the general population. To trace the causes of this growth we should have to go far into the structure of modern industrialism. It is sufficient for the moment that the State machinery for dealing with the effects of poverty is not succeeding in diminishing, has of late not even prevented the serious growth of its aggregate mass. On the causes of this failure, and the remedies therefor, the two reports before us are to a certain point in harmony. They agree that the administration by the Guardians has been a failure, not because the Boards have attracted an inadequate personnel, but because the task set them was not within their powers. According to the Minority, the problem as posed to the Guardians is inherently incapable of solution, because it lumps together so many different things, such complex aspects and effects of poverty, that no single system and no single set of administrators can deal with them together. The tangle must be unravelled before the separate threads can be mended. The Majority so far acquiesce in this criticism as to agree that both workhouse administration and out-relief fail as remedial measures principally for lack, on the one hand, of clear and uniform general principles, on the other of well-thought-out differentiation of treatment according to difference of needs. The laxity, the want of all guidance and uniformity in the administration of out-relief, the stupidity of doling out small sums which keep a family permanently on the edge of starvation, the occasional extravagance arising from deficient inquiry into the other means of the pauper, the absence of any effective inquiry into the use to which the dole is put, and hence the too frequent discovery that it is being made the support of a thoroughly unsatisfactory, insanitary home, or, perhaps, of a depraved life, form a sufficient condemnation of the outdoor system as at present known. This intermixture of all ages and all characters, of the sound, the imbecile, and the sick, of the sufferer from temporary misfortune with the regular pauper, is the condemnation of the general workhouse. Such an institution cannot long survive the publication of this Report.

But the trouble has its roots deeper down, and it is here that the diagnosis of the Minority is by far the more profound of the two, and the remedy that they offer more thorough. Broadly speaking, the difference between the two sections of the Commission is that the Majority want to conserve the Poor Law in a greatly altered form; the Minority want to abolish it. Everywhere the Minority trace the evil ultimately to the principle that Destitution is the sole basis of relief. From this principle it follows (a) that relief is not to be given till the stage of destitution is reached. Hence a vast amount of avoidable misery, hence sickness and disease left untended in their beginnings, hence an absence of preventive treatment, and the constant manufacture of paupers. Could we abolish the whole existing mass of paupers at a stroke, says the Minority Report, we should, in a very few years, have another mass as large upon our hands. From the same principle it follows (b) that the authority dealing with relief is a Destitution authority. The kind of relief it ought to give is of every variety. Here it is a hungry child that ought to be fed, here it is an imbecile, here it is a loafer, here it is a respectable old man, perhaps with a little pension, but without relatives or a home. No one authority can cater for all these. Still less can it treat them with the discrimination required when the one point on which it has to keep its eye fixed is the question whether those whom it assists are destitute or not. This is not the true question. The true question is what do they need? What, in the interests of society and of the sufferer, is the kind of help that ought to be given to them? From this point of view, the most important person is not he who has already sounded the depths of human misery, who has gone hungry, and endured cold and wet, but he who, if not helped to-day, will become destitute to-morrow, and will threaten to become a permanent burden on the public. Cure is much more than mere relief, but prevention is better still.

Having this end in view, the Minority Report seeks to distinguish the principal causes or cases of destitution, and to remit the care of each to its appropriate department. First of all, it entirely separates the case of the able-bodied, whose suffering proceeds from want of employment, from that of the unable. Then it takes the different forms of inability and considers them one by one. It assigns the care of the mother and the infant and of the sick to the Public Health Authority, of the child of school age to the Education Committee, of the aged to the Pension Committee, of the mentally defective to the Asylums Committee. It is to be the business of these Committees to take care that the sufferer in each case has adequate provision made for him, whether in one of the institutions that they maintain, or in his own house. Whatever the treatment be, and particularly if it involves "home aliment," it must be adequate to maintain or restore health and vitality of character. But clearly some co-ordination of the work of the Committees is necessary—for one of the same distressed family may have a father removed to a defective house, while one child is being fed at school, and another is under medical treatment. This co-ordination is to be supplied by a regular paid official appointed by the County Council, in the shape of a Registrar of Public Assistance. This Registrar, who is the keystone of the whole arch, will have the very important function of deciding whether the case is one for treatment in the home or not, and, if not, the Committee that has moved in the matter can only remit the case to one of its institutions. The same official will decide, on principles to be clearly defined by law, whether the service given is one that should be paid for by the recipient, and, if so, it will be his business to recover the charge. What precisely will be the position and authority of the Registrar, and whether in his person the Destitution Authority which it is sought to abolish might not be revived, are questions which will have to be further discussed before a decision can be taken. It is enough for the moment to indicate the ideal which the Minority have set before themselves, and it is an ideal which must carry with it the earnest sympathy of reformers.

Its success, we imagine, will largely turn on the manner in which the remaining portion of the problem is handled. It is admitted by both parties that unemployment, particularly in the form of casual, intermittent, or under-employed labor, is the most serious source of permanent pauperism. Here again both parties agree on the first stage towards a remedy in the shape of a national system of Labor Exchanges. But in the view of the Minority the exchange does not stand by itself, but is an integral part of a considered system, each element in which is to solve one distinct part of the general complex problem. In the first place, by compelling resort to the Exchanges for the hiring of casual labor, at any rate in certain scheduled trades, the Minority members hope to dovetail in trade with trade, to smooth over seasonal fluctuations by taking advantage of the fact that the depressed times of one industry often coincide with the busy times of another, and so secure for the laborer not continuous work in one situation, but a smoother passage from job to job. Next, for the cyclical depression they propose the scheme, familiar to our readers, of insurance on what is known as the Ghent system. Again, to smooth over the irregularities they suggest the laying out of certain kinds of public work on a ten years' plan, so adjusted that public work will be slackened in the fat and intensified in the lean years of the trade cycle. For those who can still get no employment, and are not covered by insurance, they suggest industrial training, with maintenance for the worker and his family. The condition would, of course, be that the worker should be registered at the Exchange, that he should not improperly decline any work that might be offered him at standard rates, and that he should devote himself to the work of training in a manner satisfactory to the authorities. No compulsion would be used to make him resort to the training establishment or the Exchange. But if through neglecting these opportunities he should fail to support wife and family, or if he should idle and break discipline, he would be liable to judicial commitment to a Detention Colony for a specified period.

Such, in bald outline, is the plan, obviously not one to be accepted or rejected wholesale, but presenting several great merits, the merit of adequately organising public assistance while not interfering unduly with personal liberty, the merit of considering each corner of the field in turn, and fairly facing its separate problem by a distinctive remedy, the supreme merit of dissociating, in accordance with principles often advocated here, the problem of poverty from that of pauperism, and recognising that the State has a duty which does not begin when men have fallen into the pit, but when they are hovering near its verge. We cannot recognise these merits without a tribute to the industry, ability, and humanity of the authors of the Report, a tribute which is, indeed, due to the Commissioners as a whole, irrespective of their views, but which those who feel with us may be allowed to pay in far fuller measure to the four signatories of the Minority Report, and in particular to Mrs. Webb, whose great abilities have never been put to nobler public service.

LIBERAL TURKEY AND THE "TIMES."

Turkey has passed during the last week through a Ministerial crisis that has tested the stability of her new institutions and confirmed the authority of the organisation which destroyed the Hamidian despotism. The novelty of the experience made it hazardous, and the gravity of the external situation added to the risk. When one remembers that it is only seven months since Abdul Hamid began, in King Edward's phrase, to earn "the veneration of posterity," and that some of the deputies upon whom the vital decision rested grew to manhood without grasping the bare meaning of the word "Parliament," the anxiety which the crisis occasioned in this country may be pardoned. But for the alarm, the despair, and the indignation which the "Times," that most emotional of European newspapers, has thought fit to express, we confess we can find neither justification nor apparent explanation. To our thinking, it was essential that the Parliament, the Ministry, and the dominant party should come to some clear understanding as to which of them it is which really rules. The result has shown that it is the Young Turkish party which dominates Parliament, and Parliament which controls the Ministry.

The essential facts will perhaps bear repetition. The July revolution inevitably made the Committee of Union and Progress the real ruler of Turkey. It led the army, it inspired the people, it had coerced the Sultan, and it brought out of exile, disgrace, or obscurity a number of experienced officials, from Kiamil Pasha downwards, out of whom, at its dictation, a Cabinet was composed. There was as yet no Parliament, and the Committee for some time guided the Cabinet as a matter of course. No other arrangement was possible. The Ministers were most of them ex-servants and officials of the old régime. They had no following in the country, nor did they aspire to create a party. Most of them were Liberals in a vague way by sentiment and temperament, but most of them had passed their lives in the service of Abdul Hamid at his worst, and even Kiamil Pasha, who had fitfully struggled against the reaction, had compromised with Yildiz Palace, and held office at the dictation of the Izzets and the Melhamés. These men did not make the revolution, and the revolution, when it succeeded, inevitably regarded them rather as valuable tools than as its moral leaders. Parliament met and confirmed them in office. Meanwhile dissension had begun in the Cabinet. Kiamil Pasha, a venerable and dignified old man, resented the dictation of the young leaders of the Committee, and distrusted those of his colleagues whose convictions or personal interests inclined them to docility. Parliament had not yet formed itself into definite parties, nor had the old Constitution of 1876 yet been revised in such a way as to make of party government a recognised system.

Kiamil Pasha accordingly looked about for allies. He found them in the little "Liberal League," led by Prince Saba-ed-Din. His adhesion was publicly advertised by his presence at a party dinner given by this group. It numbers several able men, and since it advocates a programme of Home Rule All Round, it may have hoped with some reason for the support of the non-Turkish deputies, particularly the Arabs and the Albanians. For such a programme weighty theoretical reasons can be urged, though we should ourselves have thought it dangerous at this stage to raise an issue which must sharply divide the Turkish Unionists from the Non-Turkish Federalists, and so compromise the prospects of the work of consolidation which must precede any attempt to solve the problem of the nationalities. By transferring his sympathies from the Committee, which had nominated him, to this rival League, Kiamil Pasha performed an evolution which might be compared to the action of a German Chancellor who publicly transferred his favors from the National Liberals, let us say, to the Radicals. He could not carry his Cabinet with him in the change, and he, therefore, began to reconstruct it. He dismissed the Ministers of War and Marine, and did this without consulting the rest of the Cabinet—a proceeding which not unnaturally led to the resignation of two other colleagues. Here was a new situation which clearly required the assent of Parliament. Yet Kiamil Pasha took no steps to advise Parliament of his action, and when summoned to attend it, refused to appear, and sought to postpone all explanations till next week. It cannot be said that his methods were tactful, and they lost him all chance of appealing to neutral opinion. The vote of "no confidence" showed that the Committee still counted 198 adherents in the House, while the League could muster only eight. The inevitable sequel has been the constitution of a new Cabinet under Hilmi Pasha (who had resigned), with Riza Pasha (who had been dismissed) as Minister of War. In no other way could the elementary rules of majority government have been vindicated.

The roots of the misunderstanding which some English newspapers have betrayed are two-fold. It is assumed that the Committee, because it made a revolution, must be composed of extremists. Nothing could be further from the truth. The revolution was comparable rather to that of 1688 than to the French upheaval, and the men who made it are essentially moderates. They are, in fact, Unionists, and it is the "Liberal League," whose policy might rather be called adventurous, though, to our own thinking, its eventual adoption may be necessary. In the second place, it is not sufficiently realised that the old Constitution of 1876, devised by Midhat Pasha and restored last July, established a conception of Ministerial responsibility comparable rather to that of Germany than to the British model. The Cabinet is assumed to consist rather of officials than of party leaders. In such conditions it is inevitable that it should be controlled from outside by the dominant party, acting on Parliament as its fulcrum. The system is admittedly unsatisfactory, and the Young Turks are now busy revising the Constitution. But, in the meantime, they are only using the system which they found ready-made. There are times even in this country when we could wish that parties made more attempt to control Cabinets, and that Cabinets were less omnipotent in controlling parties. It is objected that the Committee is a secret and irresponsible body. Its secrecy is something of a myth. We seem to remember that the "Times," which harped on this charge, has itself described and named its leading members. Several of them are known to us, and we cannot doubt that they are familiar in the lobbies of the Chamber. Two of them are actually the President and Vice-President of the Chamber itself. A Committee which daily states its views through two official organs in the Turkish Press, and acts through Ministers and deputies who are confessedly its adherents, cannot fairly be described as either secret or irresponsible.

The partisan tone of some English comments on this crisis must compromise the chances which this country has of helping the Turkish renaissance. The uncritical acceptance by such papers as the "Westminster Gazette" of the canard which accused the Committee of plotting to establish a military dictatorship betrayed ignorance of Turkish affairs—an ignorance which exposed itself, when that paper published a eulogy of Nazim Bey, a civilian and a leader of the Committee, under the impression that it was praising Nazim Pasha, a soldier, on whose appointment to the Ministry of War it asked us to believe that the safety of Turkey depended. Kiamil Pasha deserves the respect and sympathy of Englishmen. But if we supposed, as the "Times" and its echoes apparently supposed, that this aged statesman of eighty-four was the only possible Prime Minister, we should despair of Young Turkey more deeply than its critics do. More sinister than this obvious vein of exaggeration is the undercurrent of interested Imperialism which the "Times" is hardly at pains to conceal. It hailed the Turkish as at first it hailed the Russian revolution. But how much of this capricious sympathy was due to its obvious calculation that the Turkish renaissance was a blow to German influence? It showed its hand when it half cajoled and half threatened the Turks into accepting the Russian solution of the Balkan crisis out of "gratitude," as it phrased it, to Great Britain. Turkey was clearly assigned her place, an ancillary place, in the Anglo-Franco-Russian League. The city, in its turn, had its interests to consider, for Sir Ernest Cassell had nearly concluded with Kiamil Pasha the flotation of a large new Turkish loan, which is said to involve an element of control more serious than the mere lending of experts to the Turkish Government. If the pursuit of these designs, diplomatic and financial, were to involve us in a definite attitude of hostility towards the Committee which, by its intelligence and self-sacrifice, alone made the Turkish revolution, the present enthusiasm of the Turkish people for this country would suffer something of a chill. The "Times" does not reflect the opinion of Liberal England, though it is sometimes able to mislead it. It is our national misfortune that abroad the volubility of Printing House Square is too often accepted as the authorised interpretation of the reticence of Downing Street.

WHAT "EQUALITY OF SACRIFICE" MEANS.

No reader of the King's Speech, with its unprecedented reference to expenditure, can doubt that for the moment the really dominant issue for this Government is finance. The particular paragraph which announces this unpalatable truth does not seem to us very happily worded, placing, as it does, the claim of Old Age Pensions upon a level with increased naval expenditure. But without any increase of naval expenditure, the need of more revenue would have been such as to call into play all reasonably safe resources of a courageous Chancellor of the Exchequer. For while the power of the nation to bear increasing taxation is far from being exhausted, this reserve power can only be made available by gradual and careful experiment, which any sudden strain is likely to impair. This danger the Government appears to recognise, so far as their policy of social reform is concerned, for their new proposals for constructive legislation are chosen so as to exclude any considerable new expenditure. The expected removal of poor law restrictions upon old age pensions is, apparently, postponed, while the unemployed proposals for this session are evidently framed so as to involve a minimum cost. Paupers and unemployed must, for the present, yield to the superior demands of naval scaremongers.

But even granting that no considerable increase of expenditure on social reform will figure in this year's Budget, the financial problem admits no easy solution. Leaving this year's deficit, whatever it may be, to be wiped out by reducing the current year's contribution to the Sinking Fund, and allowing a generous contribution from the new Sinking Fund, of, say, four or five millions, to meet next year's enhanced expenditure, the amount which must be got by new taxation remains very large. For, in addition to the £8,000,000 increase for Pensions, there will be a deficit which, after allowing for a substantial recovery of trade, cannot be put at less than £2,000,000. The automatic increases of the Civil Services, together with the cost of establishing Labor Exchanges and other minor expedients for meeting unemployment, can hardly be estimated at less than another £2,000,000. If we are to add to this between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000 which it is supposed that the Government may concede to the Navy, there is a pretty total of fifteen millions, ten at least to come out of new taxation, unless, as is hardly conceivable, Mr. Asquith should consent to repudiate his own most express warnings, and revert to the enfeebling policy of a naval loan. It is not surprising that even supporters of a forward constructive finance should find it difficult to suggest sound methods of dealing with so grave a situation. For obstructive officials have for years past tacitly conspired with timid financiers to block effective experiments along the new lines of profitable revenue. The principal example of this injurious conduct is supplied by the persistent denials of inland revenue experts of the fruitfulness or even the practicality of a super-tax on incomes. It is true that a House of Commons Committee, under the chairmanship of Sir Charles Dilke, declared in favor of the utility of such an expedient. But confidence in its true efficacy as the chief instrument of a Liberal constructive finance has not yet been established. Hence we are confronted with the spectacle of a leading Liberal newspaper making the serious proposal that the Government should supplement its super-tax, licence duties, and revised death duties by a reimposition of the sugar tax reduced last year. The three and a half millions thus "sacrificed" might be recovered, and the pressure of new taxation upon property proportionately relieved! Though we cannot suppose the Government will advertise its financial impotence by reimposing a war tax on the food of the people, so feeble is the grasp of financial principles among the rank and file of the Liberal party that even so grave a proposition will doubtless receive sympathy from those whose one idea of "sound" taxation is a misplaced notion of equality which requires that all classes should assist to bear the burden.

As the debate upon the Budget opens out in Parliament and in the country we shall doubtless hear much from the advocates of this unreal doctrine of "equality of sacrifice," who will demand that the masses as well as the classes should be called upon to contribute their "fair share" to the maintenance of the national defence and house-keeping. It is well, therefore, for those who understand the falsity of this contention to nail their colors to the mast. Those who urge that the increased demands for public revenue must be met by new taxation of the resources and expenditure of the well-to-do classes are often accused of a predatory policy of class discrimination. This charge is baseless. It is, of course, true that there is discrimination for taxing purposes between those who can and those who cannot pay; it is even rightly recognised as class discrimination. But it is not predatory either in intention or effect. What equity, what economic efficacy, is there in the demand that we shall tax the poverty of the masses because we tax the property of the classes? It is, indeed, technically feasible to restore the sugar duty or to put some other impost which will reduce the poor to deeper poverty, imposing on them a sacrifice not equal to, but immeasurably greater than, that borne by property, in that it is levelled against the very lives of the workers and their families. But the economic condition of a large section of our workers is such that any encroachment, however small, upon their wages will inevitably be reflected in reduced efficiency of life and of labor-power. In other words, any tax upon the wages of the workers is a blow struck at the wealth-producing power of the nation in the future. It is in the neglect of such vital considerations that the folly lies, not merely of the proposal to tax those destitute of real ability to pay, but of the entire policy of national defence which counts only the number of warships or of regiments that can be put at once upon the sea or in the field, without considering the fatal injury which this policy inflicts upon the general wealth-producing power of the nation, wherein consist the real sinews of national defence.

The testimony of disinterested experts, based upon investigation of the distribution of income and property in this country, clearly establishes the ability of the well-to-do classes to bear with ease a moderate increase of taxation such as would suffice to meet the more pressing requirements of social reform. If the extravagant demands of panic-mongers press severely upon owners of large incomes and properties, the latter have the remedy in their own hands. For it is these classes who raise these reckless alarms and can allay them. We must, indeed, hold it a fortunate coincidence that the pursuance of a sound taxing policy should impose upon those who call the war-tune the obligation to pay the piper. For by this means a sound Liberal finance, fearlessly pursued, affords the best security against ruinous expenditure on armaments.

Life and Letters.

THE NEW DETERMINISM.

"Any two masses in the universe attract each other with a force which varies according to the inverse square of the distance." Newton made this law—the law of gravitation. Other scientific men have made other scientific laws. The fact is plain enough; but the superstition that scientific laws, instead of being made by men, are enactments of a personified "Nature," dies hard in the mind of the "average man," who jumps, by help of the ambiguous word "law," from a symbolical summary of our experience of things to a law-enforcing Obstacle. He is, however, not the victim of a verbal ambiguity alone; he makes the jump, and thinks he must make it, because he finds obstacles in his own experience. Apples always fall and never fly; he himself falls. If he learns to fly he does it only by reckoning with the "law" by which he falls. He requires so many horse-power for his engines, so many cubic metres of gas in his balloon, not because he successfully defies gravitation, but because he must submit to it. It is his obstacle, or at least it forces conditions upon him. The laws of Nature, he says, cannot be broken. It is he who will be broken if he attempts to override them—broken like Phaeton when he dared to drive the chariot of the sun; broken like Icarus when he braved its heat with wax.

Behind the law of gravitation, which certainly is the work of scientific man, there is hard experience by men. From all the falling and standing and flying things of the world, a quintessential symbol has been expressed. Wherever we turn we can apply it; we see nowhere any exception to it that is more than apparent. Therefore we call it a law, and treat it as an enactment. Only wise men, unusually wise men, keep in mind what it really is—a useful hypothesis.

There is a certain restfulness to be found in contemplating this ethereal, sublimated creation. The sweep of its unitary exclusion, its cold indifference, its remoteness, have their fascination; they impose themselves, they bid us withdraw from the distracting multiplicity of real life. The laws of science, in their power to make life as it is seem trivial, illusive, unworthy, resemble the Absolute of some oriental mystic. Like that Absolute, they are reached by a steady process of abstraction from our concrete, piecemeal experience, and, like it, they leave us with an attractive contrast to the troublesome facts of every day. It is possible for a man to escape from realising what the physical catastrophes and oppositions of the world mean for his fellows, and even for himself, if he fixes his attention on those fine-spun laws; just as a devout seeker after the Absolute may blind himself to the horrors of Maya—to its confusion and its endless betrayal of the hopes of men.

It is possible; but for the most part these things of the real world are too strong for us; and there is something about laws of science which keeps them in closer relation with the experience and the beliefs of common men than the Absolute of that exclusive mysticism. They are tenacious, they bind us, because they seem to reflect with accuracy the determinism of things among which we must live and move. The mystical Absolute has no such point d'appui. We cannot bring it back into the world from which it sprang—the world where, in accordance with the law of gravitation, a hundred thousand people are killed by some shiver of the earth, which sets walls tumbling about them like apples in a gale of wind. The law is undoubtedly of our making, but the earth and all the stars have set its pattern. The wind and the waves, food and poison, fire and frost—all these things—make a world of determinism for us who are not things.

That is the least we can say, and we must say it. No criticism of the metaphysical pre-suppositions of our physico-mathematical science, nor of the methods by which it reaches its generalising laws, its regulative principles, its pragmatic—for it is pragmatic—truth, can enable us to escape the need for that confession. And if our choice lies between living, or rather believing that we live, in "an incalculable miscellany of miracles," and accepting scientific determinism, it is fixed for us beforehand by the modern spirit incarnate in civilised men.

A little while ago we were told that there was no other course open to us. The determinism of science was presented to us in a form as absolute as the crudest dogmatism of common sense or of theology. Now we have not only the untouched mystery of a creative, determining life (which is ignored in scientific laws) calling to us for caution and for patience; we have also a new tone and even a new meaning in the voice of science itself. We are reminded that absolute formulae are never applicable in their strictness to any one instance of the behavior of things. There is always some margin, some rough edge of reality, that will not fit into their polished framework. No real lever behaves like the lever of mechanical science; no lump of matter resembles the "mass" of the law of gravitation—both are spoilt, scientifically, by their qualities, and fit badly into statements dealing with quantity alone. The law of the conservation of energy, that splendid generalisation of our own times, is not a law, but a regulative principle, regulating only in a narrow sphere, and never exactly covering the facts. And there is nothing that can be safely said by any scientific man about the universe as a whole, not even that its energy is conserved or its mass invariable.

Atoms, too, have no longer, it seems, that appearance of being "manufactured articles" which pleased Clerk Maxwell and many lesser men than he. The appearance was illusive, due to the deceiving tricks of a mere statistical average. We can no longer believe atoms of any one kind to be exactly alike, turned out by quadrillions from some creative workshop; nor can we believe them permanent. They are diverse and they change. They change slowly, no doubt, but still they change, and have been changing. Or so we think, conveniently, pragmatically, after the fashion of a science which has no business, and never had any business, with absolutism in any form.

This science, nowadays, having begun to learn its lesson, presents us with a new schematic picture in which we see movement of the thing-world, a flux throughout its apparent fixity. Its determinism, therefore, has lost its absolute character. Uniformity—that fundamental assumption of science—would never have been assumed by any creatures whose "specious present" was, let us say, a million million years, instead of some ten seconds, the clock-time covered by our now. Even as to quantity things would have moved too quickly for statistical averages and physico-mathematical formulae, which would have been out of date, perhaps, before they were composed, if such exalted beings were ever playful enough to set about composing them.

By means of this new scientific picture we are called to reconsider not only the determinism of science, but the determinism of the thing-world of our experience. The former is soon put in its right place as part of a system at once ideal, abstract, hypothetical, only delusively absolute, and practically of a value that we cannot estimate too highly as long as we know what we are doing; but the latter is a more serious affair, because it is in full and direct contact with our real life, and we must ask ourselves what it means for real life. Those among us who have any kind of religion must further, and perhaps first, ask what it means for religion—that orientation of life towards what is good, what is true, what is beautiful as we conceive it. There can be no doubt that religion is only an empty pretension unless there is in life and experience some element of freedom; and that if we were, as a couple of generations ago we were ready to believe, absolutely determined by a world of determinism, then would our religion be vain and our life a "phantasmagoria upon the background of nescience." But if there is only relative determinism even in the seemingly determinist world, if even that stable, inflexible world is throughout only less fluent and determinable than we ourselves find, the fact is pregnant with meaning that we need to discover; because it is significant for our free selves, and because hitherto most of us have neither known it, nor reckoned with it except blindly and without show of good reason.

We are told now that we are not shut up between a "miscellany of miracles" and an absolute determinism in our thing-world. Our third alternative is a world in which determinism and freedom are never absolute, but always relative and side by side; a world of real changes at different rates, where we men are the easily fluent, mobile, consciously and visibly creative elements, while the physical things we deal with flow as ice seems to flow, change like eternal snows, create or are created in an aeonian majesty which is to us as the passage of the midday sun in the hour's dance of some ephemeron.

Relative to us, an aeonian change is practically equivalent to fixity; therefore we can count upon gravitation and upon the constancy of all things. Science needs no other assumption in place of an absolute uniformity in order to deal with a world that is changing and changeable, yet is so stable within the little span of man's experience. But when man—"le roseau pensant," shaken by every wind, yet considering the wind and thinking it into a means for his own triumph—begins to consider that scientific assumption in the light of new knowledge, he finds himself justified in the conviction which in practice he never could forsake, the conviction that his own freedom is rooted in the nature of things, and that all things are rooted in the freedom that is greater than his.

There is no element in our experience that is absolutely determinist; there is no element that is absolutely free. There is gradation and there is relativity. We are able to live as men because we can deal with the world as if it were absolutely determined; but we need not think of it as absolutely determined any more than we need think of it as a "miscellany of miracles"; and therefore we may find in it a closer kinship with ourselves, a nearer compatibility, and a deeper meaning. Then we shall not wonder that we are bodies, rather than have bodies, and that the very rocks are capable of making part of us and being raised into our manner of life.

We ourselves are not miraculous, although we are impenetrably mysterious. Like God, we move "in a mysterious way." We are conditioned by things, limited by the world we bend to our purpose while it makes us as we are; and we justly think of God as limited and conditioned in the product of His own activity, by which and to which in all its grades He gives himself and life. The notion of miracle seems to belong rather to a world of coercive enacted laws than to a cosmos of communicating life. It fits the plain man's conception of rules arbitrarily laid down for him by a ruler who can break them when he chooses. It is, in fact, uncritically anthropomorphic—that is, it is anthropomorphic in a way that belongs to a bygone conception of man. We rise in our necessarily anthropomorphic way by steps of self-discovery from a more to a less inadequate view of God and the ways of God. At the present moment we may rise more quickly than usual, if we will. We are now able, if we will, to see God, like ourselves, as relatively limited under finite yet mobile conditions without seeing Him (or ourselves) as absolutely determined by them. It may well be that in aeonian change He finds the world of things fluent under His will, as we find our bodies in this brief life-span of ours on earth, but with the perfection and fulness that never can be ours, even, perhaps, when we ourselves have undergone aeonian change in the spirit that makes us free. The mystery of our own relation to material things, which have only the lowest grade of divine freedom, puts into our hands a clue to the mystery of God's relation to them. Or at least we may say that in following this clue it seems that we pass upwards in our estimate and conception of Him. And if we who are religious learn to see in the relatively determinist thing-world that lies between us and each other, and between each one of us and the transcendent operation of God, a means by which mobile life is centred, consolidated, knotted upon itself, and brought into mutual relations of relative independence and permanence, we shall learn to value that thing-world more intelligently, perhaps, than we can if we regard it as a mere obstacle, or as the base contrary of Spirit; or see in it the field of miracle rather than a fitting instrument of the divine and mysterious life we share.

THE MOUNTAIN GLORY.

Mr. Clarkson was tremulously happy. It is true he was in an electric train, heated like a tepid Limbo, and he would much rather have been on foot or in a sledge. But he could not with decency take more than a fortnight's holiday from the Education Office at this time of year without reducing the solid weeks of the summer vacation, when he intended to visit all the cathedrals in France. So for the sake of speed he used the train, and he tried to imagine it did not exist. Once in his boyhood he had been up this Alpine valley, long before the railway was made, and since then he had always desired to penetrate the Alps in winter. Surely something of that old mystery, that sweet remembered passion of delight must linger about them still! Though in an electric train, he was now penetrating the Alps, and it was winter. He was tremulously happy.

At Geneva a driving snow had hidden the distant mountains, but he was among them now, and the clouds were fading away in transparent film, allowing the morning sun to gleam upon sudden visions of snowy crest and brown precipice, unimaginably high. At their foot the long slopes of pines covered the buttresses of the central chain, and in front, among the snowy fields, were huddled little villages of wooden houses—mere human dwelling-places with roofs for covers, but full of contrivances against the cold, and fitted with lofts and storerooms for the food of men and cattle. Here was the scene that Mr. Clarkson had loved from boyhood; here were the mountains, woods, and streams which had haunted him like a passion. "The walls of lost Eden," he quoted to himself, from Ruskin's first sight of the Alps—"The walls of lost Eden could not have been more beautiful to us; not more awful, round heaven, the walls of sacred Death."

And through the wild glory of mountain and cloud he heard more plainly than in boyhood the still, sad music of humanity. Here were the barriers of Europe, enshadowed still by the memories of heroes and peoples and moving hosts. Here were the places of which poets had sung, and in these solitudes they, too, had found for their hearts a savage consolation. Here the shy peasantry had lived for freedom, in gloom but also in glory; and in these habitations, almost as unchanging as the mountain heights, they still lived on. He tried to recall the noble lines beginning—

> "Two Voices are there; one is of the sea,
> One of the mountains; each a mighty Voice."

But before he could get the third verse right another voice by his side suddenly exclaimed: "It's simply outrageous!"

The speaker looked up defiantly from his paper, as though daring the eternal heavens to contradict him. "Only a week ago," he cried, "I had a letter in the 'Times' protesting against the abominable misconduct of the railways to Switzerland. My own sister-in-law had registered her luggage through from here to Victoria, and though she had time to drive across Paris and have breakfast at the other station, that luggage missed her train, and she had to wait two-and-a-half whole hours for it in London, though she lives at Harrow! And here's a man writes to-day to say she was lucky not to have to stay a whole night in Paris, as his aunt did! Now, can you imagine anything more scandalous than that?"

"Perhaps it was not so terrible as it sounds," said Mr. Clarkson, soothingly.

"Sounds?" said the man, with rising fury. "Why, it's perfectly atrocious; it's almost inconceivable! Do you know there have been whole columns of complaints about these things in the 'Times' for weeks past? We English people—we who come here for our holidays and bring money into the country—are we to be treated like dogs, losing our luggage for hours together, missing our trains, having our female relations stopped for whole nights in Paris! No matter; I shall write to the 'Times' again the very moment I've had something to eat."

Mr. Clarkson expressed his approval of the intention, and had just recovered the two lines:—

> "In both from age to age thou didst rejoice,
> They were thy chosen music, Liberty!"

when the train drew up at his station to a blare of bugles. It was the village band, reinforced by the military, who had come to welcome the heroic winners in a bobsleigh competition against a neighboring canton. Passing under a triumphal arch of ice, frozen upon a foundation of wire netting, the heroes were conducted to the Mairie, where Mr. Clarkson, as he turned into one of the large hotels, heard the Mayor discoursing to them upon glory, and caught the words of enthusiastic promise: "Un concours monstre, colossal, de skis, de luges, de bobs sera créé!" He discovered afterwards that the Mayor was also President of the "Comité de Tourisme Hivernal," and that by his enterprising organisation of "Sports d'hiver," he had raised the number of visitors by nearly three thousand in a single winter.

Coming in just for the end of the déjeuner, Mr. Clarkson found long rows of English people at one table and long rows of "foreigners" at another. Nearly all were dressed in white woollen jerseys turned down at the throat, and all had white woollen caps which the men tucked into their pockets. To Mr. Clarkson they looked like Anatole France's Penguins soon after their conversion.

"I think, after all, this is the most beautiful valley in the Alps," said Mr. Clarkson to break the ice with the female Penguin next him.

"Not such good tobogganing as in the Rhone valley," she said, drawing on a pair of white woollen gloves that reached up to the pinion joint.

"Don't feed you so well, either," said a male from the opposite side.

"I was thinking of the peculiar beauty of nature here," said Mr. Clarkson in self-defence.

"Oh, nature!" answered the man, less deferentially than Mr. Squeers when he said "She's a rum 'un, is Natur! I should like to know how we should ever get on without her."

"Do you ski?" asked the girl, fearing that the conversation was becoming dangerous.

"You mean sliding over the snow with long planks on your feet?" Mr. Clarkson asked. "Well, no; I've never tried. But I see from the advertisements that on skis you have the high Alps at your mercy. I don't want to have the high Alps at my mercy, but how does one begin?"

"You must get a white jersey and a pair of skis first, and, perhaps, you will find the sloping field at the back enough to start upon, without the high Alps," said the girl, and they went out laughing, the man lighting his pipe as soon as he came in line with the foreigners' table.

Mr. Clarkson bought a white jersey, hired a pair of skis, and he did find the sloping field at the back quite enough to start upon. Hour after hour he shuffled and trampled up that slope, zigzagging painfully sideways with six feet of narrow board firmly strapped to each boot. If he attempted to walk straight up, the hideous things slipped backwards, and he fell forward on his face, straining his toes to breaking point against the straps, and only thankful that he escaped putting out his eyes upon the upturned points of the skis. Having struggled up about a quarter of the slope, he waddled slowly round, like a huge web-footed crane practising the fifth position in dancing, and looked back. From that height the slope appeared much steeper than from below. It appeared almost precipitous. But there was no helping that. The moment he got the skis fairly side by side pointing downhill, they began to move of themselves, and everywhere the skis went Mr. Clarkson was sure to go. They slid apart till his legs were like opened scissors. They clashed together; the points interlocked, flinging him violently on his head and again straining his toes till they almost cracked. They glided over an atrocious hummock that always threw him on his back. They acquired a detestable impetus that bore him towards destruction against a cottage wall. He could not guide, he could not stop. His only safety was to fall, and he dared not do it. It was like leaping from an express to escape a collision. Happily, the skis themselves always brought him down long before the danger point, and with a sense of hairbreadth preservation, he found himself wallowing in the snow, only bruised and flayed, while, with these ridiculous planks kicking in the air and a spiked pole plunging about in his hands, he struggled to get up, as vainly as a cast sheep.

"Rather nice, isn't it? Don't you think it's rather nice?" said the girl, skimming past him as he lay once, and bringing herself up with the Telemarch turn. "And you're getting on splendidly!"

"Thank you," said Mr. Clarkson, pretending he was only resting. "Certainly, a natural exhilaration is induced by every form of escape."

"Topping!" cried the man, as he rushed by and adroitly sat down sideways.

But Mr. Clarkson, thinking enough was done for honor, turned to what he supposed the more peaceful joys of the toboggan. Having planted his little "luge" or sleigh at the top of the straight run home, he tucked the string between his legs, clutched the sides, and hoped for pleasure. But he found himself gliding downwards at a still more deplorable pace than on skis, though he jammed both heels hard down upon the course. He swung from side to side, he charged into the snowy barriers on either hand alternately. Splinters of ice, kicked up by his heels, flew into his face and blinded him. Covered with snow from head to foot, careless of time and space, he let the thing go its own way, and it went. Sprawling headforemost down the middle of the course, with blinded eyes, he just perceived it dribbling away to the finish, and then he crawled over the snowy barrier, barely in time to escape four men in a bob-sleigh who rushed past at a mile a minute, and took the final corner with bodies horizontal, parallel to the ground.

This experiment he tried twice more, while the mule was drawing the bob-sleigh up to the summit again, and each time he experienced that distinctly pleasurable sensation when at last the toboggan flung him off and he found himself still alive and almost unhurt.

"You'd see better if you lay on your stomach and went head first," said a sympathetic observer.

"No doubt you are right," Mr. Clarkson answered, "but there is a limit to absurdity."

With some thankfulness he perceived that it was getting dark. The snow crunched with frost under his feet, and overhead the sky had turned to a deep blue, fading into green down the valley. In a cleft between the aiguilles one white star was already visible. But the highest peaks and domes of the mountains still glowed with the reddish brown and orange of sunset, though already there had fallen on them the silence of coming night. For a few moments still one aiguille flamed, and then all was cold.

"'God made Himself an awful rose of dawn,'" Mr. Clarkson murmured regretfully, as he went to join the others in the English tea-room where they always gathered to discuss their prowess and their health. "Yes, it still goes on—the mountain mystery, the gloom, the glory, the evening glow, and the awful rose of dawn; and still it may be said that Nature never did betray the heart that loved her."

And as he dressed for dinner he read on a printed notice in his bedroom that all visitors would be charged twopence a day for the embellishment of the valley, thus ensuring beauty and comfort of the first order.

"I feel rather like Flora in 'Little Dorrit,'" he thought. "Her engagement to Mr. Clennam—'it was the morning of life it was bliss it was frenzy it was everything else of that sort in the highest degree.' And then her marriage with Mr. F.—'only necessary to mention asparagus and it appeared, or to hint at any little delicate thing to drink and it came like magic in a pint bottle; it was not ecstasy but it was comfort.'

"Comfort?" he added, as he tried to sit down without pain and wriggle his toes into his dress shoes. "Well, I don't know about comfort!"

THE BIRD AND ITS FRIENDS.

"TAP, TAP, TAP." The sunniest day in spring or the hottest in summer does not seem to express itself properly without some such tiny instrumental music performed by one of its wild creatures. In March, there is the mellow clatter that the great spotted wood-pecker makes on a selected bough as a call to his mate, who duly responds on a tuning-fork of her own pitched, we believe, a third lower. A little later, you can hear, if you go up close to the potting shed, the ticking of the wasps' teeth as they gnaw off fibres with which to build their many-celled city. In summer, you have the stridulation of the crickets, the click of beetles and, hottest sound of all, a vegetable artillery made by the broom pods firing off their seeds. But what is this winter "tap, tap"?

We know it but too well. On the alighting board of our best bee-hive there sits a great tit in gorgeous indigo and saffron, his white face turned up to show the black stock and waistcoat line, as he waits to see what is to come of the rat-tat he has just rung at the front door. There comes out a sleepy bee not filled with the anger of a defending citizen, but with curiosity as to what the sound can have meant. In a trice the tit has it and with insult upon injury takes it to the roof where he splits the honey-fed insect as deftly as a butcher splits a bullock's carcase, removes the sting and wipes it on the ridge beside those of earlier victims, then makes a dainty and nourishing meal.

For years the tits and we have been friends. We have given them weather-tight boxes to build in, hung up cocoanuts, almonds, and bones for them to pick in winter, and generally rewarded them for their cheery industry about the trees. But this is our first year of bee-keeping and our loyalty to the oxeye and the nun is rather strained by their notion of what bees are meant for. Some say we must trap or shoot the robbers. A milder counsel is to put a bit of wire netting across the hive porch so that the bee is not in danger the instant it comes into the light. It seems a very small matter to take the latter precaution instead of the former, which looks very like curing toothache with a rifle. For even if nothing but death would avail as a preventive, we can see that the tit's attentions to the bees are not all to the bad. It may be just as well that the more winter-wakeful bees should be removed before their example leads the rest of the hive into dangerous excursions on a nippy morning. At any rate, even from the narrow outlook of the bee-master, the tit is probably to be written down a friend instead of an enemy. Of how much sound apple blossom might we be robbed by maggots, if the tits did not search the trees three or four times a day? How much more of that hateful product, honey-dew, might not our bees bring home, if the tits did not wage industrious war on the aphides? He cannot claim tribute for the white clover harvest, simply because he is a tree scavenger, and the clover is not a tree. But there are ground scavengers and air scavengers in this large and beautiful class of our servants. The good work they do is simply incalculable. Like most good work it is strictly unobtrusive, and too likely, where ignorance reigns, to be cancelled by a little honest mischief. That is why, this beautiful morning, another rat-tat brings a letter bidding us to the annual meeting of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds.

The grudge of a man who will not pay wages to the scavenger is not the worst motive that bird preservers have to fight. The jay, which spends most of the summer in destroying the nests of those very birds the fruit robbers, is not, therefore, spared. His raids on our cherries and raspberries are to his discredit, and anything that eats eggs is an enemy of the keeper; but it is doubtful whether this wary bird would be so waited for if it were not for the pretty blue-chequered panels he wears on his wing, and which the village beauty loves to wear on her hat. Sordid crime! But what can you expect of the bucolic mind? How much more chaste and artistic is the desire of the fashionable lady for the plumes with which the white egret decorates itself at nesting time! The innocent white egret, with which, on economic grounds, we have no quarrel, but which we sacrifice to our pure pleasure, as Shibli Bagarag plucked out the palpitating heart of the sleeping damsel in "The Shaving of Shagpat." The Malayan belle, who covers herself with parrot skins as a sign of the prowess of her admirers, and the haughty white woman, who will wear nothing less than a bird of paradise, are on a par in this matter. It remains for minds just a little bit ashamed to pick a quarrel with a beautiful bird as an excuse for hanging it on the hat instead of on the keeper's barn door.

By the way, a very recent inspection of that barn-door would have given great food for laughter if it had not given grave pain at the ignorance of the man entrusted with the executioner's gun. Of owls we say nothing; they were, of course, there, both tawny and of the barn. But actually there was a cuckoo, and there were two night-jars that an ignoramus had shot for sparrow hawks, and boasts of having destroyed with one barrel. Let us add that it was not the keeper who did this thing, but his master, a man who has shot partridges, pheasants, woodcock, and other winged things for years —a naturalist of the gun who does not know the difference between a puckeridge and a sparrow hawk.

Extreme science is yet more fatal than extreme ignorance. The species threatened by the farmer, though we cannot say the same of those threatened by the gamekeeper, are safe enough from extinction. It is when an uncommon bird begins to attract the special attention of a certain kind of naturalist that its extinction draws near. The wren of St. Kilda has been saved, if it is saved, with extreme difficulty, at the expense of much devotion on the part of bird lovers and by means of an Act of Parliament devised almost to that sole end. The chough, the kite, the eagle, the bearded reedling are a few of the birds whose lot resembles just now that of a lamb surrounded by wolves. The amateur collector of eggs or skins stands in the background, his money proving the impulse under which the professional dealer is prepared to run almost any risk. It is the honorable province of the Protection Society to maintain watchers over the safety of these birds during the breeding season; but it is almost impossible to pay such men as will certainly be proof against the bribes with which they will be assailed. We suppose that it is hopeless yet to protest against the shooting of such occasional non-breeding visitors as rollers, bee-eaters, and the hundred winter migrants that annually fall to the collector's gun, but there are few lengths to which we would not support those who are trying to save the few last specimens of certain of our resident species.

The human conscience is a queer one that can contemplate with equanimity a clutch of eggs supposed to be the last of the kind ever laid in Great Britain, and procured by the lying, theft, and, possibly, the violence of a paid agent or vendor. It is, perhaps, a conscience that cannot appreciate a less appeal than peremptory punishment for being in possession of unlawful property. It is pre-eminently a male type, of which the female is that which wears with joy the white "osprey" that can only have been obtained by the murder of birds in the full joy of their nuptial season, and probably with young left to starve in the nest. "Murder millinery" it has been called, and the justice of the name is annually more apparent. Last year, the world was just a little startled by the announcement that a watcher of the Audubon Society had been murdered by a plume hunter in Florida who found his vigilance inconvenient to the wishes of the fair osprey wearers in England and elsewhere. To-day, the news comes that the blood of two more of these devoted men has stained this year's supply of those desired plumes.

Short Studies.

THE BELIEVER.

"I WANT to have a straight talk with you, sir," said the carpenter, ominously, leading the way to a stone wall, whose seating capacity he proposed putting to the test. As I have never known his conversation suffer from indirectness, the announcement seemed superfluous. Perhaps, however, he intended to excel himself.

"You b'lieve in what you call the Cathorlic faith?" he began, catechetically.

I gave him the necessary assurance.

"Well, what is it? What is this Cathorlic faith you an' the 'Church Times' are always blabbin' about?"

I hardly know whether I was most pleased or offended at being associated with this well-known medium of advertisement.

"Why, the Creeds," I answered plurally.

"I knew you 'd say that!" he exclaimed, with unflattering delight. "It 's hard to get out of an old rut. Only I didn't know that you could b'lieve in more than one creed—at a time. Well, an' what are these wonderful creeds o' yours? That's my p'int."

"You 'll find them in the Prayer-book," I recommended, virtuously conscious of restraining my temper.

"An' what good 'd that do me? Would it sew on a button?"

The utter unexpectedness and nature of this retort caused me to dislodge a stone, which travelled down the back of my leg, vulnerable heel included. My companion apologised for the rottenness of his wall.

"Better luck next time," he added, sympathetically. "But now about these wondeful creeds o' yours? How many people, d' you honestly suppose, understand anythink at all about 'em?"

I replied that I was not a statistician.

"But do you mean to say that the han'ful o' Christians who repeat 'em every Sunday are the only b'lievers in the world?"

"The only true believers."

"Well, sir, if you can be blunt, so can we," he challenged. "I daresay now you 'd call a gram'phone a b'liever if it ground out th' At'nation Creed?"

"Certainly not," I repudiated.

"Well, then? How can sing-songin' 'alf a page o' words or so make a person a b'liever? It 'd be mighty easy to get to 'Eaven if that was all."

"But they believe in the truth contained in the creeds," I expounded.

"How do you know? An' what is this truth, might I ask? Come! I'll bet a barrer o' potatoes to a cloth button that there isn't one in a 'undred has the smallest idear what he 's talkin' about. It may be very nice an' comfortable to say whatever's put intil your mouth, but it isn't good enough for 'uman beens. The Creeds may be all very well; but I strongly objeck to usin' the dumb alphabet after th' Almighty has opened our mouth, an' given us the gift o' plain speech."

"But the Church explains her meaning."

"Oh, does she? I never 'eard or read an explanation that didn't make it worse. No, sir! No one needn't expect the Church t' explain. She don't want to give the show away. Punch an' Judy is nothink till her."

Perhaps I should here have walked away, righteously indignant; but, like the Ancient Mariner, this presumptuous parishioner held me. "What would you call a believer?" I asked, curiously; "for I suppose you have some creed."

"I have the creed," he answered, dogmatically. "There's only the one."

"The Apostles'?"

"I don't know whether the 'postles knew it or not," was the careless reply. "They 've bin dead some little time, you know. An' I don't pertend to have bin inside their minds," he added, modestly.

"Well, what is this original creed of yours?" I spurred him.

"I hope to God it isn't original. I b'lieve in Life!" he stated, simply and grandly.

"Well, of course! So does the Church."

"Why doesn't she say so then in so many words, 'stead o' beatin' about the bush?" was the indignant rejoinder. "But wait a minute! I b'lieve in Life without any 'emmin' or 'awin'. I b'lieve in people livin' an' workin' an' marr'in' an' dyin' an' rottin' an' makin' room for the next gen'ration world without end. My b'lievers, for the most part, never lighten th' inside of a Church; perhaps some day they'll be 'lowed an' welcome; but they build houses an' cities an' bridges an' ships, an' make roads an' plant trees an' till fields an' bring up children an' keep things goin' gen'rally. They work at Life, sir, as a man works in his garden, diggin' an' prunin' an' manurin' an' puttin' everythink ship-shape. An' they keep on doin' it, spite o' hearthquakes an' thunder an' lightnin' an' pain an' sickness an' death, knowin' very well that they'd be bigger fools if they didn't. That's my idear of Faith, sir—keepin' the ball rollin'! An' th' only onbe'lievers are the ones who ask what 's the good, or if Life 's worth livin'."

"But the Church teaches all that," I stammered.

"I 'm very glad an' imazed to hear it; but, as the man said to the hegg, I doubt it. Any'ow, it used not to be the case when I attended; an' that' s not so long ago. We was taught to renounce the world, 'stead o' to make the best of it, if I 'member rightly. Wonder th' Almighty didn't strike us all dead!"

"You believe in natural Immortality then?"

"Certingly. You wouldn't expect me to b'lieve in it if it was onnatcheril, would you?"

"But what matter whether the world does or doesn't go on when we are dead?"

"Ask a pear tree! It 'll go on whether or no; so you might as well make up your mind an' enter into the spirit o' the thing. When it 's a Huniverse against Nothink, I'll put my money on the world. An' who said you 'd be dead? But you will, if you don't take care an' use your common sense! You surely wouldn't like to think that the 'ands an' the feet an' the brain an' the tongue an' the et ceteras, which (accordin' to Darwin an' them) took such a many millions o' years to make—not to mention th' Almighty's wish an' share in the matter—to be throwed away an' wasted? If that 's not good enough reason, we'll try an' think out another or two for you. But, for goodness sake, stop usin' parrot phrases, an' let people see an' know what you mean. Then they can either lump it or leave it; but there' ll be no dust in their eyes. An' if that don't sep'rate the chaff from the w'eat, an' the sheep from the goats, you can call me what you like."

"Amen!" I said, humbly, ignoring the carte blanche.

The Drama.

"THE TRUANTS."

"The Truants," at the Kingsway Theatre, is certainly a play to be seen. It is alert, interesting, entertaining, full of clever things, and capitally acted. Moreover, if not precisely original, it is distinctly odd. There is a sort of superficial unconventionality about it which masks its conventionality of spirit. Nevertheless, Mr. Wilfred T. Coleby must think more competently and construct more carefully if he is ever to do work of permanent value.

Mr. Coleby may perhaps imagine that I impugn the competence of his thinking merely because I happen to disagree with him. Well, it is true that I do disagree with him: I think his case a bad one. But it is not of the badness of his case that I complain: it is of the inconsequence of his argument. There is a gap, a chasm, between his premises and his conclusion. He has not succeeded in constructing a fable which should bear out the moral he meant to draw. Or, supposing him to have started, not with the moral, but with the plot, he has failed to discover its true centre of gravity, and has represented it as resting on a general idea to which, in fact, it has little or no relation.

What is the general idea? Clearly that a sort of religiosity, a sentimental "faith," an observance of convention in church-going and kindred matters, a renunciation of the right to think for herself, is a woman's safest path towards salvation in this world, and can, at any rate, do her no harm in any other. The details of the requisite "faith" are not clearly laid down. We gather that it is not indispensable for her to believe that Jonah actually passed three days in the whale's belly. That statement, I suppose, she may interpret figuratively without positive danger to her moral well-being. But beyond this we are not given any definite guidance. Perhaps we may say, without doing injustice to Mr. Coleby's thought, that she may pick and choose a little in the Bible, but must swallow her Prayer-Book whole.

Very well, then; that is an opinion, like another; it is even an opinion which thousands of worthy people, explicitly or implicitly, share with Mr. Coleby. The question is: how does he enforce it? Does his story really mean what he represents it to mean, what he would have us deduce from it? The reader shall judge.

Freda Saville is a woman of strong and courageous character, who, though still young, has travelled a great deal, seen a great deal of life, and written a book of distinctly heterodox tendency. As to the precise nature of its heterodoxy we have no information; but we may divine very sad things from the unquestionable fact that she goes motoring during church hours on Sunday. Some eight or nine years ago she was on the Indian frontier when, in some tribal rising, a small British garrison was massacred. Among the victims were a Mr. and Mrs. Carstairs, the brother and sister-in-law of a certain Lord Strelland. Shortly before the catastrophe, Mrs. Carstairs (we are told) gave birth to a boy, and confided the infant to the care of Freda Saville, who somehow contrived to escape with it. She is thus the "informal guardian" of little Jack Carstairs, to whom his uncle, Lord Strelland, proposes to leave all his immense property, though the title must go to some other kinsman. When the play opens, Freda and little Jack are staying with a bachelor squire, named Dick Chetwood, a neighbor of Lord Strelland's; and Dick and Freda have just become engaged, to their immense mutual satisfaction. It is supposed, too, that another engagement is imminent, between Dick Chetwood's younger brother Bill and Miss Pamela Grey. Who is Miss Pamela Grey? I confess I did not discover. All I know is that she is a quite young girl, that the Chetwood mansion is apparently her home, and that Freda and she, though constantly quarrelling, are passionately attached to each other. Brother Bill, again, has spent ten years in the Argentine, where he has made his fortune. He has recently returned to England, and presents himself to us in the guise of an ill-conditioned, grumbling, quarrelsome, masterful barbarian. Nevertheless, Pamela is wildly in love with him; and this is the condition of affairs when the curtain rises.

The first signs of trouble appear when someone speaks of Bill as engaged to Pamela, and he roughly repudiates the idea. Then he has a scene with Freda, in which he tells her that it is her emancipated teaching which has ruined Pamela, and made her wilful, undisciplined, and utterly different from his conception of what Mrs. William Chetwood ought to be. Now there is undeniably a touch of observation in this character—the man who values himself upon his coarseness and ruggedness, boasts of the lawless life he has led, and yet insists on all the conventional virtues and graces in his womankind. He is a sort of Petruchio without a sense of humor, whose shrew-taming manners are not put on for the nonce, but are habitual and ingrained. Moreover, Brother Bill hints pretty clearly that he knows something about Freda's past which she would not like Brother Dick to know, and that he refrains from telling it only because, in spite of her detrimental doctrines, he likes Freda and considers her "a good pluck'd 'un." I forget whether he actually employs that phrase; it is the usual one under the circumstances. Before the end of the act, a telegram arrives demanding Brother Bill's instant departure for South America; and when the curtain falls (this is a technical mistake, Mr. Coleby) we have practically no glimmering of what is to follow. The interest is not sufficiently carried forward. Notably, we have had no scene between Brother Bill and Pamela, to give us any clear insight into their relation.

All the greater is our surprise when, in the next act, which takes place the same evening in Pamela's bedroom, we find that she has arranged to elope with Brother Bill, and to go with him to South America, on the chance that he may marry her in the end. Certainly, this is a very unwise resolve of hers; and if it be due to Freda's teaching, then Freda's teaching has certainly done her harm. But can it rightly be attributed to Freda's teaching? Freda herself does not think so; and one is entirely disposed to agree with her. It cannot be Freda's fault that Pamela is a badly brought-up, harum-scarum, hot-headed, ungovernable child; and even if, as we may conjecture, Freda's book contains some heterodox views on marriage, they surely cannot be interpreted as encouraging any girl to elope with the first ill-tempered brute she comes across who is base enough (under his own brother's roof) to take advantage of her folly. The profoundest wisdom may be misread by fools, and no author can rightly be held responsible for silly misinterpretations of his teaching. I do not say, of course, that Freda's teaching was wise, but only that we have no evidence to the contrary. In the course of a very animated, entertaining act, which comes to an amusingly melodramatic close, Freda succeeds in thwarting the intended elopement, and in coercing Brother Bill into good behavior. I will not go into such details as would spoil the reader's pleasure in witnessing the scene.

With the end of the second act the Pamela-Brother-Bill romance is over. The marriage of the queerly assorted couple takes place next day, amid farcical details which once more recall "The Taming of the Shrew." But what is all this about episodes in Freda's past which Brother Dick must not know? The facts are as follows: Freda, when in India, was married to a Major Some-one-or-other, who had omitted to mention that he had another wife in being. Little Jack, then, is Freda's son; but it was at the suggestion of the deceased Carstairs couple that she passed him off as their child. Brother Bill has ascertained all this through a detective agency in Buenos Ayres, which has branches, it would seem, on the Indian frontier (how small the world is!); and now Lord Strelland learns the same facts, through the discovery of some old letters in the ruined frontier fort. (Mr. Coleby, by the way, ought to be more economical in his methods of revelation.) Strelland is willing to keep up the fiction that little Jack is his nephew, if Freda will renounce all claim upon the child; otherwise, he will "blow the gaff." At first, Freda thinks she can consent to this arrangement, and there is a scene of parting between mother and son, very well written, and very beautifully played by Miss Ashwell. But when it comes to the point, she cannot make the sacrifice; she bids Lord Strelland do his worst, and herself breaks the truth to Brother Dick. He, being a sensible fellow, takes the matter quite calmly; and we ask ourselves at the end, as we asked ourselves when first we learned the secret, why Freda was such a goose as not to have told him long ago. The curtain falls upon a sort of preliminary recital of the marriage service, arranged as a duet, by Freda and Dick; which typifies, I imagine, her reconciliation to all the respectable orthodoxies.

But when did she quarrel with them? Mr. Coleby alone knows. When Brother Bill, in the first act, hints mysterious things about her past, we imagine that she has put in practice some daringly unconventional theory, and that retribution is now about to fall on her. But no such matter! As she herself more than once says, "she has never done anything wrong" by the most conventional standard. She imagined herself legally married to her Major, and it was her misfortune, not her fault, that he happened to be a bigamist. Her story, then, in no way illustrates the break-down of any advanced or emancipated theory of conduct. Freda has been heterodox (if at all) only on paper. Absolutely the worst moral delinquency which is brought home to her is that of motoring on Sunday; and for this no Nemesis overtakes her. The general implication, then, that Freda is to learn, in her own case and in Pamela's, the folly of emancipated opinions, is not in the least justified by the facts. There is, as I hinted above, a hiatus in the author's logic. Freda has not kicked over the traces at all, nor can she reasonably be held to have encouraged Pamela to do so. When she says, then, that since her engagement to Dick "it has all come back again, all her old happiness, all her old faith," we are not in the least impressed; for we have no evidence of her ever having lost any faith in particular. We do not know what may have been the audacities of the book she is so anxious to disclaim; and we cannot accept the play as an argument against certain unknown principles, which she seems never to have put in practice.

Miss Ashwell's performance of Freda is throughout admirable, no less in the quiet strength of the scenes with Pamela and Bill than in the restrained tenderness of the passages with the child. Miss Athene Seyler, who plays Pamela, is a young lady with a great deal of dramatic temperament, who embodies to perfection the impulsive, ill-disciplined, warm-hearted schoolgirl. Mr. Dennis Eadie gives a very able and original rendering of Bill Chetwood. It seemed to me that he spoke an improbably vulgar dialect; one could scarcely believe him to have been brought up in the same environment as his brother Dick; but no doubt the actor simply followed the author's indications. These three—Freda, Pamela, and Bill—have the whole play in their hands; but the other parts are all well filled. One of the best things in the piece is the Parish Council scene on which the curtain rises—and which leads to nothing. Mr. Coleby, by the way, repeats in "The Truants" one of the peculiarities of "The Sway Boat": he is curiously vague as to the domicile of his characters. We do not know whether Freda is or is not staying in Dick Chetwood's house. We gather that she has a place of her own, somewhere near; but why, in that case, does little Jack pervade the Chetwood mansion in his pyjamas? That Pamela is staying at Dick Chetwood's we know, for we are privileged to visit her bedroom; but who she is or why she is there, I certainly failed to discover; and explicitness on these points would have been all the more desirable as our judgment of Brother Bill's conduct towards her must in some degree depend on them.

PEACE AND KING EDWARD'S VISIT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—"He came at the right moment and said the right things." This is the general opinion of King Edward's short stay in Berlin. Seldom have circumstances so much favored a Royal visit with a political purpose. King Edward found the German nation in a very favorable mood—sobered down in every respect. The exaggerated notions about his private life, propagated particularly by the comic papers, whose satire is often a mere appeal to the prejudices of the thoughtless, have given way to a recognition of his intellectual qualities and an appreciation of his sense of proportion. A similar change has come about in regard to the general relations of the two nations. On the whole the feeling is best expressed with the phrase—Distrust is on the wane.

This is a great success, for only political children could have expected more. A feeling so deeply rooted and so incessantly fostered by interested agencies will not disappear at once in consequence of the visit of a crowned individual and some obliging speeches. The "Simplicissimus," the most widely circulated of the German satirical papers, paints King Edward as an angel of peace, attired in boxing gloves, and makes the German angel say—"I would rather welcome thee if thou hadst taken off those gloves." Doubtless the "Simplicissimus," with all its radical proclivities, has for many years made Anglophobia its particular note; but this time it is not far off the truth. Increased naval armaments will not convert distrust into confidence. King Edward has not brought us the millennium.

But his visit may yet effect something in this direction. It has given occasion to many promising utterances. Among these must be reckoned the quasi-revelations of the "Berliner Tageblatt" on the proposals made to Germany by the Balfour-Chamberlain Cabinet in 1899. For the relations of the two countries it is to-day of no great consequence whether those offers were frustrated by Mr. Chamberlain's blunders or by the aversion felt in Germany from an alliance which might involve Germany in England's quarrels. The international situation is so different to-day from what it was ten years ago that it matters little who made the alliance impossible if we consider the beneficent effect of the reminder that Germany could have accepted such an alliance under favorable conditions, and that her rulers refused it.

Remarkable coincidence! Ten years ago there were hardly to be found amongst Europe's leading politicians two men more buoyant and boisterous in foreign politics than William II. and Mr. Joseph Chamberlain. To-day the one is a suffering and broken man, and the other would be in almost as unhappy a plight were he not twenty years younger. William II. has gone through most trying experiences. He was accustomed to attack, but, conscious of his power, he could afford to scorn his assailants as long as they merely censured his whims and outbursts of humor or temper. But to know that the masses of his people speak of him as a vain and unsteady politician, and that the cry for more parliamentary control was not the cry for protection against the wilfulness of a tyrant, but for insurance against the blunders of an unskilled hand, was a far sorer trial. Its effects upon him are shown by his present aversion from publicity. Let there be no mistake about it. The opinion I have described is held by a large section of the German public. The praises lavished on Edward VII. because of the discreet and efficient discharge of his regal office read like so many criticisms on his nephew.

It is not for me to say whether the eulogies bestowed by the men in the street on the present holder of the British crown are justified or not. From the observer's point of view they are interesting, because they help you to understand what the people want. Edward VII. has been received in Berlin with more splendor than any other crowned head. But behind the luxury of Unter den Linden and the neighboring streets were concealed the hardships and miseries engendered by a commercial depression that hangs over pushful Germany no less than over other countries. In the building on the left-hand side of the highly decorated Brandenburger Thor, which Edward VII. passed in entering Berlin, the representatives of the nation deliberate anxiously on the burning question—how to cover the deficit of 500 to 600 millions of marks in the Imperial Exchequer? There is much wealth now in Germany, but the most influential section of the wealthy classes, the great landowners, refuse to take their share of the burden. Thus the great bulk of the money wanted will be drawn from the masses in the shape of higher taxes on their luxuries—from the masses whose necessaries are already taxed to the profit of the agrarian. Under these circumstances higher taxation on beer and tobacco will mean the ruin of many thousands of small traders and loss of work for a comparatively large number of workers. This is not the situation for men to get enthusiastic about the race in "Dreadnoughts."

It is now proved beyond contradiction that it was only by the play of chance that the meeting of the unemployed, convoked by the Social Democratic party in Berlin, happened to take place simultaneously with King Edward's entry into the German capital. But would Social Democrats have been seriously to blame if they had purposely chosen the day and hour? Is it not their duty to call the attention of those in power in the most vigorous and most effective way to the fact that pleasant words about peace and temporary understandings about clashing interests abroad, if good in themselves, are not sufficient to meet the requirements of our time? There is no mistake about the friendly feeling of German Social Democrats for the British people, and also for King Edward. No offensive remarks can be found in their papers. Rather the contrary may be said. The picture they paint of the superiority of British diplomacy over German diplomacy is, perhaps, a little overdrawn. "A victor enters Berlin"—thus began the leader in almost all the Social Democratic papers on the day of the entry, and this referred to the successes of King Edward's Government over the Kaiser. It was also shown in how many ways peaceful and friendly relations with England were in the interest of the German people.

But there is peace and peace. The reactionaries also shout peace to-day, only with them it means peace at daggers drawn; that is to say, with increasing armaments. The inspirers of papers like the "Kölnische Zeitung," the "National Zeitung," the "Rheinisch-Westphalische Zeitung," and similar papers, play on the same harp as those of the "Standard" and the "Times," and their chorus on the other side of the North Sea. With them peace is an expedient, not the fundamental principle of their policy. It is a good thing that they are compelled, by the desires of the mass of the population, workers and traders alike, to emphasise peace; but their present support is no proof that the work of the upholders of genuine peace is already accomplished.

It is not given to a King who, after all, is connected by many ties with the semi-feudal and plutocratic classes, and, as some of his speeches show, shares or upholds a good number of the pretensions of those classes, to lay the foundation of a real international alliance of the nations. Be he ever so sincere in the desire, and ever so clever in his negotiations, as long as those classes and their hirelings influence the foreign policy of the nation, his best work can be undone by a tricky adventurer who knows how to propagate mistrust. He can help a movement, but he cannot give it fixity.

German democrats believe that Edward VII., as the mandatory of the British nation, has achieved good work in the first respect, and gladly give him and his constituents their due for it. But they know where on this side of the North Sea the final guarantees of peace rest. Just now the first results of the German census of June, 1907, are out. They show—against the previous census of 1895—an extraordinary increase of the industrial and commercial classes, as compared with the agricultural sections of the nation. The whole increase of the population and more has gone to the former. They mustered in 1895 with their families 26·2 millions of heads, or 40·6 per cent. of the nation, and number now 34·6 millions of heads, or 56 per cent. of the nation, whilst agriculture represents only 17·7 millions of heads, or 28·65 per cent., against 35·74 per cent. in 1895. Two-thirds of Germany are industrial, and only one-third is agricultural. These results may in some respects give food for reflection; but in regard to international peace they are most hopeful figures. Industrial nations, and particularly industrial workers, hate war, and have the cohesion and the strength to make this hatred powerfully felt.—Yours, &c.,

IS NONCONFORMITY TOO POLITICAL?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—With reference to your article on this subject in the current issue of THE NATION, has not the author of "Nonconformity and Politics" based his argument on an assumption which remains to be proved? He takes it for granted that a sharp line can be drawn between what is spiritual and what is political, whereas it is impossible to state where one ends and the other begins. He traces the birth of Nonconformity to a spiritual ideal, but it would be equally easy to prove that a political ideal brought it into the world. The political element was bound up with the spiritual, and cannot be separated from it. The fundamental principle of Nonconformity that religion is not a matter of State is as much a political as a spiritual principle, and even if this be denied, the fact remains that the earliest Independents not only stood for the spiritual principle of immediate access to God, but also for the political principle that "the poorest he that is in England hath a life to live as much as the greatest he; and a man is not bound to a government that he has not had a voice to put himself under." Further, was rebellion against the Test Act, the Act of Uniformity, and the Five Mile Act, spiritual or political? When the pilgrims set sail for America in order that they might worship God as they pleased, was their action a spiritual or a political one? Was not their conduct as much occasioned by political conditions as by spiritual motives? Can you make water-tight compartments sufficiently tight to prevent the spiritual and the political mingling? I do not think you can. Certainly, to change the simile, in the history of Nonconformity these two strands are inextricably woven. The author of "Nonconformity and Politics" appears to admit that when Nonconformist churches were fighting for their existence, political action was justifiable. But even if we grant that they no longer have to fight for existence (and in view of Mr. Balfour's Education Act of 1902 this is granting a great deal), are we to remain content with the bare right to exist? Is it not our duty to continue political action until every disability is removed, until our tributary waters are free to flow into what Matthew Arnold called "the main stream of national life"?

Moreover, our author seems to imagine that to say the State shall have nothing to do with religion is the same as saying that religion shall have nothing to do with the State—a conclusion no Nonconformist would admit. On the contrary, our business is to insist on the application of ethical principles to political affairs. Nor have the Nonconformist churches ever been the docile servants of the Liberal, or of any other party. Naturally, as you point out, Nonconformists, anxious to free themselves from their political fetters in order better to pursue spiritual aims, turned to the political party which exists to make life better worth living; but has any Liberal Prime Minister ever been able to count on Nonconformist support, no matter what line of political action he followed?

Mr. Gladstone's name has been mentioned. Could Mr. Gladstone count on the servile obedience of Nonconformists? Let those who think so turn to Lord Morley's biography, and read the pages dealing with the incident of Mr. Parnell's divorce. Nonconformists followed Mr. Gladstone for a very noble reason: because, as Spurgeon finely said, while they believed in no man's infallibility, they believed in this man's integrity. Gladstone knew well that he could only count on Nonconformist support so long as his policy accorded with Nonconformist convictions. Could Lord Rosebery, when Prime Minister, depend on the unqualified adherence of Nonconformists? Did they not leave him on account of his pro-Turkish policy, and do their utmost to aid those who were endeavoring to awaken the country concerning the obligations it had incurred in the Near East by the Berlin Treaty? Can Mr. Asquith count on the slavish allegiance of Nonconformists? Those who think so might turn with advantage to the current issue of the "British Weekly." The partisanship referred to by the author of "Nonconformity and Politics" has neither been blind nor unintelligent.

Nonconformists believe that they have to get the Kingdom of God set up in this "present evil world." None too soon they have come to see that if you cannot make men better by Acts of Parliament, you can by such enactments make it less difficult for them to be good. At every turn in this attempt to make "reason and the will of God prevail," they are met by obstacles which only the State can remove. They create "institutional" churches, churches which seek to cover the whole of a man's life, which recognise that there are six days in the week in addition to Sunday, and that men have bodies and minds, as well as souls; the Borough Councils, however, at once step in and rate such "institutional" churches, because the work being done in connection with them for the neighborhood does not come within the letter of the law relating to public worship. Churches thus treated must either stultify their life or acquiesce. If they do not submit they are driven to take political action. This is a single illustration. How is it possible for Nonconformists to remain Liberals or Socialists individually, and yet keep their churches out of party warfare? Here, for example, is a church working in a poor and overcrowded district. The minister and nine-tenths of his church members are driven, as Robertson of Brighton was driven, to be Radicals, because they are Christians; a Bill is introduced into the House of Commons which, if it becomes law, will give the people "a chance"—to quote Father Dolling. Are the minister and the nine-tenths of his church members to decline to act collectively in support of such a Bill? Does the author of "Nonconformity and Politics" imagine that if they take no collective action the remaining tenth will be placated? Not for a moment. It is quite sufficient for the one-tenth to know their minister is a Radical or a Socialist for offence to be taken. And better it should be so. The spirit of Christ is utterly alien to the spirit of "proputty," and the sooner Nonconformity sheds those who are engaged in the impossible task of gaining the whole world and keeping their own souls the better.

As for the statement that Nonconformity has ceased to produce "saints," we need to know two things before we pay much attention to it: First, what our author means by "saint"; and, secondly, whether he is omniscient? Only knowledge of such a sweep and intimacy as is attributable to the Deity could justify such a generalisation. If our author is thinking of the Mid-Victorian edition of the medieval saint, he is, I trust, correct in believing this type to be extinct. This was the "saint" who thought politics and the devil synonymous terms; who tortured little children with questions about their souls; who, when urged to undertake social service, replied: "The poor ye have always with you"; who restricted salvation to the swallowing of a theological formula; who drew vain and subtle distinctions between the sacred and the secular; and generally developed one side of his nature at the expense of every other.

In conclusion, when a little time ago we annexed, through military conquest, "two small states, lawfully inhabited, possessed and governed by white men," where were the Nonconformist "saints," and where the political Nonconformist sinners? Sad to say, sir, the "saints" were jingoes, and the most pronounced political "agitators" Pro-Boers! The like phenomenon was exhibited in the Anglican Church. It was left to men who "meddle with politics" in the Free and Established Churches, to Dr. Clifford, the Bishop of Hereford, and Canon Scott-Holland, to protest against the iniquitous South African War, and to remind their holier brethren that piety is no excuse for injustice.—Yours, &c.,

RICHARD MUDIE-SMITH.

Eastbourne, February 14th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read this article with much satisfaction and acceptance, except on one point. The words "Nonconformity" and "Nonconformist" are harped upon until one is obsessed by them.

They savor too much of an admission of subjection to an authority claiming superiority which we resent, to be grateful in the ears of the progressive Free Churchmen of these days.

Can we not be embraced by some other appellation expressive of the freedom implied by that sentiment on which you are so insistent, viz., the yearning for a distinct cleavage between the Church and the party platform?—Yours, &c.,

THE COMING SLAVERY IN EDUCATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Elementary education is now in the hands of public bodies, and is being managed, for good or for evil, by the "councils" of the land, through their educational committees.

Many people are seeking to get secondary education under the same authorities. Some are led to this line of action by their "magnifying the office" of councils: more by their desire to get the State or some public bodies to take in hand the management of everything. But, whatever may have been the necessity for elementary education to be taken up by a public authority, there is not the same need or any need for secondary education to come under their power. Voluntary effort and private enterprise did not, probably could not, take up satisfactorily the education of the masses of the people. Yet no case has been made out of a similar necessity in regard to education other than elementary. And there are very serious objections, social and educational, to the councils being masters of secondary education.

We need not object to a council inspecting all schools, public or private, to see that they are sanitarily sound, and are not frauds. But it will be an evil day for us if they have the same hold over secondary, as they have now over primary, education.

The universities and the big public schools will doubtless be able to keep out of the clutches of the councils. But the tendency to-day is to bring all secondary schools under the cast-iron hand of the councils. These councils are a poor authority even for primary education. They are elected for other purposes besides education, which is now a sort of "tag" upon drainage, lighting, etc. They have not the time to attend properly to education, even if they had the ability. But, for these already over-burdened bodies to undertake secondary education would be disastrous in the extreme. Already they more or less manage many secondary schools. And it would be well if they knew how many masters frown under their interference, and wish their authorities at Jericho, but dare not say so.

The less the councils touch secondary education, the better for education, and the better for the ratepayers. By the aid of the rates they can give an education under cost price, and help to "pauperise" people. Thus the man with no children or whose children are grown-up, can be made to pay part of the education of his neighbors. They might as well try to provide free tailoring or free feeding. Free education was perhaps a necessity for the elementary scholars, because so many of the parents actually could not pay the fees, and many had the greatest difficulty. People felt that the share in the nation's wealth, which the toiling manual-laboring classes possessed, was less than that to which they were morally entitled. Hence came free education. But to advocate free education, or even partially free education (i.e., scholars paying less than cost price), for those in better circumstances, is pauperising people. Some folks who would object to be fed by the rates do not object to being educated by the rates. This tendency to give, at the expense of the ratepayers, an education to a middle-class boy, at a county school, is bad for the ratepayers, worse for the private schoolmasters, who are sometimes crushed out of existence by rate-aided schools, and worst of all for education. It will be an evil day for England if all private schools are crushed out by unfair competition. For a private school teacher has his heart and soul in his work, and, not being dominated by a public inspector, can strike out new lines of education, show more initiative, and make his school much less of a "dead level" sort than a school under a council.

In Denmark private schools are aided by public money when they are doing good work—that is, most of them receive public money, and, of course, submit to public inspection, but are not publicly interfered with. If a private schoolmaster, seeing a council school plumped down near his school, and trying to freeze his school out by aid of the rates, were to adopt the "passive resistance" policy, one could hardly blame him. He might say, "I have an efficient school, but the council is going to kill it by aid of the rates. And I am to pay for my own destruction." He would have quite as good a case as the "passive resisters" to Mr. Balfour's act. The Nonconformists largely voted khaki at one election, handed themselves over to Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Balfour, and then grumbled that the Tory party, true to its traditional policy, favored the State Church and the Roman Church at the expense of Free-churchmen of the land.

But, if all the secondary schools were council schools, the injury to education and to the moral self-respect of parents would be worse than the pecuniary injury done to private schoolmasters and ratepayers. One of the chief glories of many of our forefathers has been the pride they took in manfully struggling to do the best they could for their children's education. To-day the fanatics would have even secondary education free, thus saving parents at the expense of the ratepayers.

If the councils manage all the secondary schools, we shall drift into a cast-iron system of dead-level uniformity as bad as that of Germany, and we shall have "slavery in education." "Central inspection of schools almost inevitably leads to an unwholesome sameness." Do we desire all "teachers to become mere officials subordinate to a bureaucracy in Whitehall?" The councils cannot manage elementary education properly. Often it is very difficult to get people to serve on the education committees, and still more difficult to get them to manifest any deep interest or enthusiasm in the subject. Naturally so: for how can we expect men already overburdened with work to be enthusiastic over more work? It would be simply a farce for the councils to have secondary education as well as primary on their hands. And if true friends of education, and those who do not want to pauperise parents, do not wake up soon, they may rest assured that "slavery in education" will become an accomplished fact.—Yours, &c.,

EMPLOYERS AND THE TERRITORIAL ARMY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Having been asked to co-operate in assisting the movement for the Voluntary Army of Home Defence, and being satisfied that a conference between the employers of labor and Mr. Haldane is essential to its success, a meeting of employers already representing between 30,000 and 40,000 employees, will be held at 4 o'clock on Tuesday, 23rd February, at Whitehall Rooms, and will be addressed by the Secretary of State for War.

As I have undertaken to be responsible for a purely informal reception, for which cards have been issued in my name, will you allow me the privilege of your columns to offer a cordial welcome to employers, or the member of the firm interested in the question, who may not have received an invitation, and to whom I shall be happy to forward one if requested?

In the interest of all of us, it is hoped to complete within this year the authorised establishment of the Territorial Army, which Mr. Haldane and his military advisers are confident will prove an efficient, economical, and invaluable form of insurance to the commercial community, besides being of inestimable advantage to the manhood of the Kingdom.

These are among the reasons which seem to claim one's active support of this movement, and even demand a sacrifice of personal convenience.

The end is a great one, and is worth some sacrifice.—Yours, &c.,

THE LYKE-WAKE DIRGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I be allowed to summarise the facts about "The Lyke-Wake Dirge," perhaps the most impressively beautiful of all our folk-songs?

All the references quoted by your correspondents can, I think, be found in notes printed by me in the second series of my "Popular Ballads of the Olden Time," pp. 88, &c., and 238, &c.; but the question has also been discussed in "Notes and Queries," Vols. X., XI., and XII., of the eighth series, and in the "Athenæum," April 1st, 8th, and 15th, 1905. In the latter place I ventured to point out to the Rev. A. L. Mayhew that the reading "fleet" is much older than Brand's "Popular Antiquities," or Sir Walter Scott's version. In my book I printed the oldest text letter for letter from Lansdowne MS. 231, John Aubrey's "Remains of Gentilisme and Judaisme," of 1686-7. This undoubtedly gives "fleet."

The variant "fleet" has therefore the advantage of age; but it is interesting to note that Aubrey glosses the word as equivalent to "water," and this is confirmed by Bishop Kennet (whom Murray in the "Oxford Dictionary" does not quote in full), when he says, "hence the Fleet, Fleet-Ditch, in Lond."

Out of all this confusion two points are salient. Firstly, that "fleet" is much the earlier and better-authenticated reading; secondly, that Sir Walter Scott was justified in saying that salt is (or was) placed on the breast of a corpse in Highland wakes. The curious may find an explanation in Pennant's "Tour in Scotland" (1771), quoted in my notes referred to above.

If I may express my own opinion, I am a "whole hogger" for "fire and fleet"—on all grounds.—Yours, &c.,

PRONUNCIATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—I thank you for admitting discussion on this subject, as it will help towards the much-to-be-desired end of spelling reform.

I do not believe much in party pronunciation, nor do I know what difference the old Whigs are supposed to have made between the endings of "satiate" and "palliate."

I am myself in favor of pronouncing "gîrl" with final sound like that of "eerl" in "peerless," but I have not the courage so to pronounce it in public. It would sound Irish, affected, almost vulgar. I cannot find the place in "Earle's English Prose" about the proper sound of "exile." I think I sound it "eksile," but how does your correspondent sound "exíst," "exért," "exámination"? In these the accent seems to require the sound—e.g., "z."

I remember the first Lord Tennyson saying to me, "I am glad you say 'ate.'" I should hold "et," for the preterite of "eat," as vulgar or colloquial as "I aint" for "I have not," or "I haven't."

Lord Tennyson told me he only caught himself just in time from correcting Queen Victoria for rhyming "knowledge" with "college."—Yours, &c.,

MOORE'S "LALLA ROOKH."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is too bad to take up your valuable space with dissertations on Kishm and its amber vines; but I did not begin the discussion, and, after this short and belated letter, I will not transgress further.

Concerning that quotation, I suggest to Mr. Beveridge, that what he saw in his edition was the passage which occurs comparatively early in the poem, and which runs thus:—

> "Beside him, 'stead of beads and books of prayer,
> Which the world fondly thought he mused on there,
> Stood vases, filled with Kishmee's golden wine."

Seeing these lines, he triumphantly pounced upon them and accused Lord Curzon, and myself, and the various other persons who have dealt with this subject, of quoting incorrectly. For it is really hard to believe that any edition would lapse so severely from sense and symmetry as to substitute "golden wine" for "amber vines" in the verses we quoted from, which, you will remember, were as follows:—

> "The morn has risen clear and calm,
> And o'er the Green Sea palely shines,
> Revealing Bahrein's groves of palm,
> And lighting Kishma's amber vines."

"Golden wine" would indeed be a curious reading here: somewhat as if it were to say:—

> 'Revealing Windsor's stately spires,
> And shining on the beer in Tap."

An allusion comprehensible to Etonians, but none the less wholly incongruous.

As to our friend Tavernier: I happened to visit Persia rather more than a couple of hundred years later than he did, and with, perhaps, better facilities for gaining accurate geographical knowledge, so it is at least possible that my views upon the locality, direction, and destination of Bendemeer may be as worthy of credence as his.—Yours, &c.,

FITZGERALD CENTENARY CELEBRATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The centenary of the birth of Edward FitzGerald is to be celebrated at Ipswich and Woodbridge on Saturday and Sunday, March 27th and and 28th. The arrangements comprehend a tour of the FitzGerald country and a dinner at Ipswich on the Saturday, at which Mr. Clement Shorter will deliver a commemorative address. The programme for the Sunday is in process of arrangement. Several eminent literary men have signified their intention to be present. THE WRATH OF SIR ROBERT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Sir Robert Anderson's bark is loud, but his bite is only skin deep.

He really has a tender feeling for his burglars and their dependants. His office records will show, as I know from professional experience, that in one case where a many-times convicted burglar was again convicted, although his victim obtained a London magistrate's order for restitution out of a considerable sum of money which stood to the credit of the burglar's bank account, Sir Robert, in the exercise of his discretion, which the law gave him as convict's "administrator," notwithstanding the magistrate's order, permitted the burglar's supposed wife to live upon and wholly exhaust such funds.—Yours, &c.,

ENGLAND V. BRITAIN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As a constant and appreciative reader of your valuable paper, will you kindly allow me to draw your attention to an important mistake of frequent recurrence in your present issue?

On page 734 you say the Franco-German agreement apparently "gives Germany a special advantage not conceded to England," &c.; "it makes the task of bringing England and Germany together much easier." On page 735 we read of a play which describes the invasion of England by a German army; on page 737 the same reference to Germany and England occurs.

From the context, I gather the term England means the British Isles.

Now, sir, do you consider it fair to apply the term England in this fashion? It is a point on which we Scots people feel very strongly, not because of any ill-will towards you English people, but from the sense of justice; for did not the first clause of the Treaty of Union of 1707 declare that the name of the two united countries was to be Great Britain?—a term which, since Ireland was united in 1801, must in all justice be Britain.

May I say, in all fairness to you, that you do not commit the mistake with the adjective English for British?

Lord Morley, on one occasion, apologised in Scotland for using this term, and has since, when addressing meetings in Scotland, been conscientiously careful, and I feel sure that such a high-toned paper as The Nation must have committed this mistake more from want of thought than want of heart.—Yours, &c.,

THE CHANGE OF PARTY NAMES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—It is an important point to consider, in connection with Tory tactics, that they have deliberately altered their name. In Imperial politics they have ceased to call themselves Tories or Conservatives; they are "Unionists," forsooth! In municipal politics they have ceased to call themselves Conservatives or Moderates, and now dub themselves "Municipal Reformers." Liberals may well ask themselves what these changes mean. Unionism is a mere cloak to hide the cloven hoof of the Tory. Municipal Reform is a mere dodge to hide the worst kind of reaction in municipal affairs. And the worst of it is that Liberals help their opponents in thus hiding their professions. In Liberal newspapers and Liberal circles generally Tories are called Unionists, Moderates and reactionaries are called Reformers. It is time this sort of thing ceased. Whatever these people call themselves, Liberals at all events ought to keep to the true title, "Tory." This title states the naked fact. They have not lost a single item of their mischievous creed. They hate progress. They hate liberty. They would keep the people down, except when and where they found it convenient in their own interests to allow a certain amount of progress. In any debate or discussion in Parliament or elsewhere the same dominant note of oppression is heard. They are to rule the nation, not in the interests of the people of the nation, but in the interests of those who at present occupy the prominent positions of wealth or success. Whether we consider their specious bid for Tariff Reform in the interest of class, or their terrible playing into the hands of the contractor and the trust, the story is practically the same. No one is to succeed in the future except those who have succeeded in the past. No intrusion into the select circle is to be permitted. Outsiders are to remain outsiders, and they are to take their morals, their religion, their education, their food, and their lives in accord with the wishes of those who govern.

The position is so intolerable that I cannot but think there will be a rude awakening for some of those who have flattered themselves that the people are going to be befooled by phrases and false titles. It takes a long time to rouse this country. Perhaps it is as well it should be so. But when it is roused the shock will be great, and then Tories, who call themselves Unionists, and reactionaries, who call themselves Reformers, will be asked some questions which it will be difficult to answer. What is united by the Unionists? Nothing but the collective interests of the Tory party. What is reformed by the Municipal Reformers? Nothing but the work of the progressive forces of this country, in assisting the poor and the downtrodden to live out their limited and forsaken lives. The whole thing is a farce and a sham, and Liberals at all events should no longer help the Tories by adhering to the names and titles with which they have dubbed themselves in order to hide their usual tactics.—Yours, &c.,

Municipal Worker.

CONSCRIPTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have read with keen interest the two letters on this subject in your last issue; that over the signatures "S. R." and "R. W. W." with more sympathy and, I would add, the greater respect.

Their letter as regards its general—largely class—argument would most fitly be, and I hope will be, answered by one of the working men (and they are not few; at a recent meeting at Haydock, in Lincolnshire, I am told, sixty-seven out of 100 working men present joined) who have become members and associates of the National Service League.

One thing is certain: the problems of national and Imperial defence will not be solved by class appeals, and merely critical mutual exhortations to put duty before rights. If that spirit prevails long enough we shall assuredly find ourselves no longer heirs of a great Past; trustees of a mightier Future; but dwellers on a small island of the Northern Seas; underlings it may be of a manlier race.

Your correspondents state, with admirable directness, in "confession and avoidance" of the unanswerable; namely, that the defence of one's country is an inescapable obligation of democracy: "ours is not a democratic country." Other critics state that the whole movement is an insidious attempt to "dragoon a progressive democracy." Truth in human affairs is a relative thing, and lies usually somewhere between two extremes.

The perfect democracy, let it be granted, will come with the perfecting of human nature: not an hour sooner.

But that we are as a people steadily seeking to give the democratic theory of Government fair play and honest trial, few will deny. In the great democracy of the future—if ever the old Earth see it!—leadership and rule will be the free gift of free men, to those best men whose title and right divine will be Power of doing right, and Will to do it.

Meanwhile, a wise democracy-in-the-seeking will accept and turn to best account power of honest leadership, wherever it be found.

Turning to Mr. Haywood's letter; the chief impression the writer leaves is, I think, of one who has singularly little faith in his countrymen. I have noticed that suspicion of motives and doubts as to the bona fides of its advocates underlie nearly all the criticisms of this proposal. It leads some into a certain recklessness in treating even of the facts, and yet more in the making of theories and surmises.

It is assumed because its leading advocate is a great soldier—than whom, I venture to think, however, none in our history has been less touched with the spirit of "militarism"—that this is primarily a soldiers' agitation. If it be so, it is clearly a sailors' too, for seventy-three Admirals have joined the League.

Does not this point to the truth: that as, in its inception, it was civilian, so in its strength it is simply and sincerely national and patriotic.

I yield to no Liberal in resistance to militarism, if by it be meant the triumph of the spirit of aggression—the yielding of control of the State to ambitious professional soldiers.

That, however, is not the militarism we have to fear so long as the heart of the nation is sound. It is rather the contempt justly felt by the fighting services of a fighting race for a people falling into indolent neglect of their first duty to their country; the will—as implying the ability—to defend it at need.

A people where moral fibre has become encrusted not merely invites a military despotism: it may need it. It is the belief of many honest Britons that in National Service lies the surest way of averting this danger and of checking the deadly drift towards the destruction alike of individual and of national freedom.

The experience of Norway and of the Swiss Republic (on whose national system that of the National Service League is mainly based), refutes the fears that the Civil Power will lose control under a compulsory system—unless it be assumed that the British are a feebler and less manly race.

Moreover, be it noted, our "conscripts" will be liable only for home defence; and even the maleficent expert cannot alter that.

How long is the poor flattery that "an Englishman is a poor subject to try compulsion upon" still to shame and weary us? Does your correspondent, then, I would ask, advocate voluntary taxation as well as voluntary defence?

The slave is he who is slave to his own spirit. And he who will not rule himself for his own good, and the good of his fellows, surely another shall rule him. To the fool life is a play-place; to the rebel a prison; to the wise man a school.

We are fast losing self-discipline as a people, and it may need sterner measures than national service to save us from the rule of a starker and less self-indulgent race.

Why is it that Liberals like Mr. Haywood find cause to complain of their dangerously small influence (such is clearly their feeling) when questions of our Naval and Military forces (the necessary means in the world to-day of safeguarding and making effective national ideals) are concerned?

I have considered long, and I would ask the question in no arrogant or partisan spirit.

Is it not because there is an aspect of national existence —nay, of human life—which they face always unwillingly and with repugnance?

Eagerly, even passionately sincere in their desire for human betterment, they forget—they indeed seek to forget —that life as we know it on the earth is and must be perpetual striving: that honest strife is better a thousand times, and makes more truly for human progress, than an insincere and festering peace.

Man is a fighting creature by inexorable decree; rising by infinitely slow steps from the physical battle-ground of his lower nature, to the higher planes of the warfare of the spirit; but a fighter always.

Peace is not, and cannot be, an ideal for human life: only one of the conditions of the ideal. Clergymen are not "committed to peacefulness," they are committed to righteousness, and to the search after it, whether it lead to the altar or the stake.

> "Peace?—there is no peace
> Till the wrong shall cease,
> Till all its battlements and turrets fall;
> Till God, Who is the right,
> Crown the ageless fight,
> And lives no lord but He—the Lord of all."

If, as I believe, the truer conception of the purpose and meaning of human life lies inherent in the right decision of such a question as this, then let the battle be joined! For we are come to a dividing of the ways, and on the issue hangs, it may be, the destiny of our race.—Yours, &c.,

THE EFFECT OF SUFFRAGETTE TACTICS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Many persons, whose near horizon is confined to the circle of those who agree with them, may not be able to see the far-reaching effects of the violent and often piteously ridiculous proceedings of the Suffragettes. The voice of experienced women is hushed and silenced, and the cause, which was in full progress, is thrown back. The majority of our actual lawgivers, more or less strongly favorable, has now largely reinforced a hostile minority. The Women's Anti-Suffrage League has been given notice and opportunity for existence, and is now widely influential, irrespective of the weakness or the strength of its arguments. False premises lead to false conclusions; and so also must neglect for any of the first principles of social conduct lead to like results. Those who deem that the special qualities of women should not be missing in the civic and political action, are prudent in giving their steady efforts alike in personal service, and towards the full attainment and exercise of the municipal suffrage.—Yours, &c.,

Poetry.

A BROADLAND INTERLUDE.

CAME little puffs of breeze, and each
Lived long enough to give us way
The next light sister-breath to reach;
Just as we all but ceased, and lay
Motionless on th' unruffled river
Even then we saw the rushes quiver
And felt the sail draw out and shiver—

Even then we heard our gliding prow
That had been silent purl once more
With lap of ripples pattering low
Against its passage—by the shore
The reeds again began to shake
As rose the wavelets in our wake,
And whiles we heard the wave-plash break.

So sailed we up the winding stream,
First thro' the tawny flats, and then
'Neath climbing groves, till on our beam
The woodlands opened out again,
And luffing through the gat we spied
The Broad spread out before us—wide,
Windy, tho' all was still beside,

For up the Broad the fresh young breeze
Came glad, to greet us, and the sail
Pulled strongly—even where the trees
Shelter the gat: small fear to fail
To find a breeze there any day,
There's space to catch the pufflet's play
That only breathes to die away.

It seemed a faery lake—the meres
Moonlit in dreamland's waterways
Are such, and yon swift shallop bears
No mortals—no, a troop of fays
Are crossing into cloudland. Lo!
Where soon the sun shall set they go
To set the welcoming west aglow.

Oh, well I love the wider scene,
Where, white, and scarce a mile away,
The sandhills shut the marshes in,
And near behind, you know, the grey
And desolate sea beats evermore
Till the low hills' long fight is o'er,
And swept away is all the shore.

Oh, well I love that threatened land,
Where always through the Zephyr booms
Old memoried gale, and hard at hand
Behind the hills the Shadow looms
That soon or late shall some day tread
Far inland—in its wake the dead,
And ocean—where men laboréd.

But here are happier fairies—dance
And feast they here—hold carnival
While white and glimmering 'neath the trance
Of moonlight lies the Broad, and call
The night-birds from the copses—stir
The night-winds in the reeds—the fir
Moans lonely 'mid the ploughland there.

Down the long Broad we sailed—a score
Of other sail beside—awhile,
Till the long race at last is o'er,
And off they speed, and all the mile
Of sunkiss'd solitude is ours,
Save that anon old haunting powers
Look laughing out from reedy bowers.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE chief literary celebration of the week is the tercentenary of the birth of Clarendon, which falls on Saturday. An amazing variety of judgments have been passed both upon Clarendon himself, and upon his "History." He has been called "a miserable sycophant and a canting hypocrite," and he has been praised by Southey as "the wisest, most upright of statesmen." Macaulay holds the balance more evenly, and pronounces that Clarendon "was, in every respect, a man unfit for his age, at once too good for it and too bad for it. . . . In the times on which he was cast, his errors and his virtues were alike out of place." The publication of the "History of the Great Rebellion," with its panegyric of the Royalist cause, played no small part in bringing about the Tory reaction in Queen Anne's reign. The work long enjoyed a reputation far beyond its merits, and Ranke, who has written what is perhaps the best estimate of Clarendon, says that "he belongs to those who have essentially fixed the circle of ideas for the English nation." But if he was not a great historian, Clarendon was a great painter of historical portraits, and the famous character of Falkland is unequalled in English literature. Dr. Phillimore was in the habit of recommending young men who took an interest in politics to read Clarendon's prose, and especially the characters, while Macaulay once said in conversation that there were few things in English literature better worth a young man's study than the characters in Clarendon. Scott once projected an annotated edition of Clarendon, but the failure of Constable put an end to the scheme. Part of the work has since been well done by Mr. W. D. Macray, whose six-volume edition of the "History" was published in 1888 by the Clarendon Press. There is also a capital volume of "Selections" by Dean Boyle. The title of the great Oxford Press is due to the fact that the printing-house near the Sheldonian Theatre was built from the profits out of the first edition of Clarendon's work.

A STUDY of Walt Whitman for the "English Men of Letters" series has been written by Professor George R. Carpenter of Columbia University, and will probably be published in the course of the autumn. We have recently noticed in THE NATION that America has failed to appreciate in its fullness the genius of her greatest man of letters, and although opinion has changed since Whitman was dismissed from his government clerkship as "the author of an indecent book," it remains true that the poet finds more appreciative readers in England than in America. The best critical estimates are those of J. A. Symonds, William Clarke, and Professor Dowden; but we are still far from having anything like the final word on Whitman's poetry and rank in literature.

THE collection of Shelley's letters upon which Mr. Roger Ingpen has been engaged for some time is now complete, and the work will be published in April. There will be more than 450 letters written by Shelley—nearly four times as many as have before been collected in one volume—many of them now printed for the first time, while others have only seen the light in limited editions produced for private circulation. Consideration of the feelings of Leigh Hunt, Godwin, and others, has prevented the publication of much of Shelley's correspondence, and we learn that Mr. Ingpen's volumes show the poet in a thoroughly attractive light, full of generosity and tenderness. There will be a large number of illustrations, among them a reproduction of the interesting portrait by Antonio Leiseman, which was said by T. L. Peacock to resemble his friend Shelley more closely than the more familiar painting by Miss Amelia Curran, now in the National Portrait Gallery.

M. ALCIDE PICARD publishes this week a work by M. Salomon Reinach bearing the title "Orpheus: Histoire Générale des Religions." M. Reinach's object, as he states in his short preface, is to provide the general reader with a sketch of the history of religion, which shall sum up the latest results of historical criticism in such a way as to be easily intelligible to those who have no previous knowledge of the subject. The new manual differs from any existing work of the kind in one important respect—namely, that it includes the history of Christianity, which is entirely omitted from the learned manuals of Conrad von Orelli and Chantepie de la Saussaye, and can at present be studied only in voluminous works beyond the reach of the general public. M. Reinach's choice of a title is due to the profound influence that Orphism has had on other religions. Mr. Heinemann will publish an English translation of "Orpheus" in April.

THE Rationalist Press Association deserves to be commended for its enterprise in issuing works on theology and philosophy at prices that bring them within the reach of nearly every student. Many of these works have been welcomed by readers who do not hold the distinctive views of the Association, and the "History of Science Series," announced for publication during the coming autumn, contains several promising volumes. The object of the series is to furnish concise histories of the various branches of scientific and critical inquiry, which will be of a larger scope than the typical primer, and serve as introductions to the sciences themselves. Amongst the volumes arranged for are "The History of Anthropology," by Professor A. C. Haddon; "The History of Chemistry," by Dr. Thomas E. Thorpe; "The History of Astronomy," by Professor George Forbes; "The History of Geography," by Dr. Scott Keltie; and "The History of Old Testament Criticism," by Professor Archibald Duff. The Association has also made arrangements with Messrs. Black to issue the "Encyclopædia Biblica" in sixty fortnightly parts, at sevenpence net—a price little more than half of that at which the work can be obtained at present. Another volume announced is "Revaluations," a collection of essays by Mr. A. W. Benn, dealing with "The Ethical Value of Hellenism," "The Influence of Philosophy on Greek Political Life," "Pascal," "Buckle," "Nietzsche," and other topics. Mr. Benn's work always shows freshness of thought and admirable clearness of exposition.

A BIOGRAPHY of special interest to come this season from Messrs. Hutchinson is that of Sir Robert Hart, whose long career in China has given him a knowledge of that country such as no other European possesses, and an influence peculiar to his personality. The book will be entitled "The Romance of a Great Career." Its author is Miss Juliet Bredin, Sir Robert Hart's niece.

A WORK called "Servia and the Servians," by Mr. Alfred Stead, the Roumanian Consul-General in London, is announced by Mr. Heinemann. The book comes at a moment when the Servian question occupies a large place in European politics, and, as Mr. Stead has secured the co-operation of the Servian authorities, including the Ministers of Foreign Affairs, of Public Works, of Education, and of Justice, in its preparation, the coming volume promises to be the most authoritative account of Servia that has been produced in this country.

WE learn that more than thirty thousand copies of the cheap edition of Lord Morley's "Life of Gladstone," published by the "Daily Chronicle," have been sold through the booksellers alone, since the work was issued in October last.

GEORGE CANNING.*

THESE two volumes, competently edited and adorned with some excellent portraits, are a welcome addition to our inadequate records of a great statesman and a singularly interesting personality. The letters, which are now published for the first time, throw a good deal of light on both sides of Canning's character. Most of the correspondence consists of letters to Canning's two friends, the Rev. John Sneyd and Charles Bagot. They include, among others, the famous rhyming despatch, of which Captain Josceline Bagot gives us the authorised version, remarking that the generally accepted version—that given by Lytton Bulwer—contains a mistake in every line:—

> In matters of commerce the fault of the Dutch
> Is offering too little and asking too much;
> The French are with equal advantage content
> So we clap on Dutch bottoms just 20 per cent.
> Chorus: 20 per cent., 20 per cent.
> Chorus of English Custom House officers and French Douaniers.
> ENGLISH: We clap on Dutch bottoms just 20 per cent.
> FRENCH: Vous frapperez Falck avec 20 per cent.

Falck was Minister for the Netherlands in London. There are some extremely interesting letters on the development of the Monroe Doctrine, and a personal interest attaches to the efforts Canning made to prevent the republication of the "Anti-Jacobin" with some caricatures of Sheridan, who had befriended him in youth.

When Mr. Gladstone went to Oxford for the opening of the Palmerston Club, he remarked on the strange irony that made him take part in founding a rival to a club that bore the sacred name of Canning. It is, indeed, something of a paradox that a Conservative club should have taken its title from a statesman who owed his great fame to his Liberalism. Yet the Canning Club could plead as a precedent the conduct of Canning himself. For Canning always proclaimed himself the disciple of Pitt, and it was the superstitious regard which he paid even to Pitt's mistakes that prompted him to behave towards the Grenville Government in a manner that can only be called factious. This intimate attachment, which is as eloquent of the personal power of the one statesman as it is of the personal fidelity of the other, had survived, as Captain Bagot's two very interesting volumes show, many a strain on the feelings and the confidence of the disciple. "P. has thrown us all away—Us—the country and himself—in consideration of which last we must forgive the other two." So wrote Canning, in 1803, to the Rev. John Sneyd, in one of many lamentations on Pitt's refusal to drive Addington from office. But however impatient Canning was of his master's tactics, and however sensitive about his slighting treatment of himself, he always acknowledged his leadership and worshipped his memory. Yet, if Canning died amid the passionate admiration of Europe and of England, if he established his place permanently in the history of freedom, if he gave England a glorious leadership in the diplomacy and politics of the world, he achieved all this by rejecting the principles of Pitt and adopting the principles of his great opponent. His domestic policy reflected the conservatism of Pitt, his foreign policy the nationalism of Fox. And it is not his resistance to reform, but his resistance to the Holy Alliance, not his support of the Six Acts, but his support of the smaller peoples of Europe, that has given its lustre to his name.

The leading ideas of Fox's foreign policy during the French Wars had been three. The first that England ought to have intervened in 1791 to protect the right of France to arrange her own government, from the interference of Austria and Prussia; the second, that the form of the Government of France should not be made a ground of making or continuing war; the third, that England should not conduct the war by subsidising Courts, but by aiding spontaneous resistance, respecting herself the rights of nationality, gaining the confidence of Europe and, not least, that of the lesser States. Pitt, whose mind was in certain other respects singularly liberal, had no sympathy with nationalist ideas. It was his business to subdue France, and he thought that end could most easily be gained by the traditional methods. He flung subsidy after subsidy to the Sovereigns of Europe; offered the small States as booty to the large, and when he thought that he could fire resistance by outlawing the French Government, he was quite ready to do so. Canning, whose original nationalist ideas, of which an early letter in these volumes gives an illustration, had entirely disappeared in the panic, supported Pitt in most of this policy, as he did in a more deliberate attack on the principle of nationality, in the case of the Irish Union. A letter in this volume speaks of the famous answer to Napoleon, which dictated to France her choice of masters, as very becoming. But when Canning had power in his hands, he adopted very different ideas. He abandoned Pitt's policy of subsidies, which had prostrated Europe before Napoleon, and adopted the Whig policy of helping States that wanted to resist him. It was, above all, this instinct for the power of popular feeling that made him see, as it made Lord Holland see, that the Spanish rising was the great opportunity of English diplomacy, and at one time, as he said to Stapleton, "his opinion alone was the cause of the continuance of the war in the Peninsula." He went out of office before that war was over, but not before he had shown Napoleon that England would not make peace as long as Spain was in his power. It is perhaps not fanciful to suppose that it was the sympathies that were roused by this spectacle that made him afterwards defend the liberties of nations with such tenacity and such imagination from the conspirators of Aix-la-Chapelle. At any rate, it is probable that if he, and not Castlereagh, had represented England at Vienna, the smaller nations would not have been treated as so much raw material for the bargains of diplomacy.

Canning entered Liverpool's Government in 1816, two years before the Congress at Aix-la-Chapelle, which put into shape the idea of the Holy Alliance. That Congress represented the consummation which Fox had dreaded, and with good reason, in 1793. If France had then been crushed, a combination against domestic reform in the several States would have been overwhelming. By 1818 the danger was much less, for the Napoleonic Wars, if they had spread fire and sword, had at the same time made it impossible for the populations of Europe to submit permanently to the retrograde institutions of the old order. But the danger that an England governed by Liverpool and Castlereagh, who had no feeling for freedom or for the sensabilities of peoples, would join in such a combination was very great, and it was averted by Canning. It has for some time been a matter of controversy whether Canning or Castlereagh deserved the credit for isolating England from the Holy Alliance. Some of Castlereagh's defenders have asserted that the praise which has gone to Canning is really due to his predecessor. But Mr. Temperley has shown in his excellent study (the best book that has appeared on Canning's career) that, though Castlereagh drew back from the Holy Alliance, it was only in consequence of Canning's protest, and that Castlereagh had been drawn by Metternich into an approval of his general method of conducting the international affairs of Europe. Mr. Temperley quotes the admission made in a letter to Bathurst, the Colonial Secretary: "Alexander suggests all the Powers of Europe being bound together in a common league guaranteeing to each other the existing order of things in throne as in territories, all being bound to march if requisite against the first Power that offended. I tried to present something which would meet somewhat his ideas, which we could present to Parliament." This was Castlereagh's own account of his designs. When the Cabinet met to consider the scheme, Canning alone opposed it, but he opposed it with such tenacity and such power, that he carried the day. "Even had he never held the seals of Foreign Secretary," says Mr. Temperley with justice, "he would deserve immortal honor for this protest, at a moment so heavily laden with the destinies of both England and Europe." Metternich, at any rate, does not seem to have imagined that there was no difference between Canning and Castlereagh, for he called Castlereagh "my second self," while Londonderry, meaning to injure Canning, but succeeding only in injuring his own father's memory, declared that Canning, as Foreign Minister, had betrayed and abandoned all the principles of Castlereagh. So thought the Liberals, who rallied with ardor to the support of a Tory Minister, who was devoting his great powers to the prosecution of their ideas. Canning's own view is indicated in a letter published in these volumes. Writing to Bagot in 1824 about his arrangements for sending a special mission to St. Petersburg, he says of his choice of a Secretary of Embassy: "He is my predecessor's brother-in-law, consequently acceptable to the Holy Alliance." In 1822 Canning became Foreign Minister, and there ensued England's most splendid period of foreign policy. In East and West, in the New World and the Old, followed in quick succession the victories of a diplomacy that made the cause of England the cause of freedom, and served both causes with an incomparable insight and power. The name of England resounded all over the world, as it had done in the great days of Chatham; but it resounded with the triumphs of peace.

Canning the domestic politician is a very different character. He was Pitt's disciple in his understanding of Free Trade and his prosecution of commercial reforms. But in his attitude to political reform he was, as Mr. Herbert Paul justly observes in his interesting article in the "New Quarterly," a disciple rather of Burke than of Pitt. Pitt's interest in Parliamentary reform cooled after 1785, but he never shared Burke's emotional and mystical devotion to the anomalies of the ancient régime. Canning was in this respect more like Burke than Pitt, and he carried mysticism still further, for he contrived to speak with a solemn face of "the sacred lips" of the last of the Georges. His contempt for the liberties of Englishmen at home was complete and consistent enough to explain the suspicion with which Grey regarded him to the end of his life. In the "Anti-Jacobin" he pursued the obscurer victims of Pitt's coercion with a savagery that is only tolerable when it lashes the strong. A letter in this volume shows on what slight provocation he was prepared to destroy the elementary conditions of freedom, for he writes, in December, 1793, of "times of trouble, but not of much danger." In 1819 the case for this violent suppression of all discussion was still slighter, but Canning supported the Six Acts, and provoked from Cobbett as pointed and telling an example of irony as any that Canning himself had ever employed against the Reformers. The truth is that Canning never escaped from the atmosphere of the French Revolution. Both he and Burke lost their composure and equilibrium, but the demoralisation of his judgment was a more serious public disaster than the demoralisation of Burke's. Burke was almost at the end, Canning was on the threshold, of public life. Burke was steeped in the prepossessions of the oligarchy; Canning was free from their spirit of patrician exclusiveness, and rightly despised their arrogant pretensions. He should have become a popular leader, calling to his aid the great public forces of opinion and enthusiasm, for an attack on the power and spirit of the old régime. As it was, his independence, which ought to have put him politically, as he was morally, in advance of the Whigs, left him in a ridiculous impasse. He set up against government by families a theory of the monarchy which would have been ridiculous in any case in the contemporary state of politics, and was a positive danger with men like George the Third or George the Fourth on the Throne. Thus it is true to say that if in his foreign policy he emulated Chatham's prowess and escaped his weaknesses, in his view of domestic government he imitated his errors and disregarded his wisdom.

RUSSIAN LITERATURE.*

We possess already in English two serviceable guides to Russian literature, one by Waliszewski and the other by Prince Kropotkin. Herr Brückner, who is Professor of Slavonic literature in Berlin University, is quite a match for his fellow Pole in learning, and decidedly superior to him in stability of judgment. Kropotkin's "Ideals and Realities in Russian Literature" is an admirably bright survey of the general field, but the "Literary History of Russia" before us, which has been translated from the German with more fidelity than feeling for style, has the great advantage of filling out the literary picture with a variety of cunning descriptive touches that create atmosphere and social background. In this respect Herr Brückner is a model literary historian, for it is of little service to supply the foreigner with detailed criticisms of literary movements and schools of writers, when he has no means of comprehending the character of the soil and the social environment from which they have sprung. Thus, in the admirable chapter on Púshkin, one of the best in the volume, our author contrives very cleverly to make us feel the whirlpool of influences, native and exotic, in the shaping of the poet, this "servant of the beautiful," and to show in his successive stages of Anacreontic lyricism, revolutionary Epistles to Freedom, Byronism, historical Epics and Dramas, and final championship of Orthodoxy and Autocracy, the response of a lyrical nature to the forces strongest in the air. Herr Brückner, while condemning Pushkin's apostacy and "political sloughing," "dreads to be unjust to him," and owns that "the political and Radical part" the poet had been expected to play, "was not the least in his blood, but had been forced on the easily swayed man by youthful friends." And Vyázemsky's judgment of "this flunkey poetising on his knees, and singing the praises of the hangman," is qualified by the statement, only too true, that "Russian Liberalism is apt to lose color sadly," and by the clever little pen-drawing, on page 203, of the mental apathy, and restless, nervous haste, into which the Liberals of 1825 fell in their recoil after the failure of the Decembrist conspiracy.

Propaganda on one side or the other, in the great, indeterminate battle waged, for the last hundred years, between liberal thought and the forces of reaction, is indeed always hovering on the horizon, if not actively deploying in the mental foreground of the bulk of Russian writers. And in the chief creative artists who represent the underlying forces and qualities of Russian nature, Púshkin, Gogol, Dostoévsky, Turgenev, Ostrovsky, Tolstoy, Saltykov and Chekhov, we feel that they have stretched penetrating roots down from the surface soil of the contemporary struggle into the sub-soil of the national character. The unsparing self-criticism, the remorseless mental sincerity of the Russian genius at its best, are precisely the qualities which have given Russian literature its unique place among modern European literatures, and it is these qualities, we may add, that make the English reader fight shy of it. The more we come to study the history of Russia, the more we must recognise that this instinct of the Russian writer to drag forth the unpalatable truth, is the social conscience of the nation. How typically Russian, for example, are the aspirations, the work, and the fate of the luckless Radishchev, who published in 1790 "A Journey from St. Petersburg to Moscow," a series of truthful pictures, drawn without exaggeration, of the terrible sufferings of the serfs, with a pathetic dedication, which anticipates Tolstoy's teaching, "I found that man's woes proceed from man himself, because he does not see things in their true light; remove the curtain from the eye of natural feeling, and you will be happy." This honest man, "the foe of slavery," as Pushkin styled him, was delivered by the Empress Catherine into the hands of "the terrible Sheshkovsky, and was condemned to death; but the sentence was reduced to banishment to Eastern Siberia, with transport in chains. Paul pardoned him, and Alexander had him reinstated; but the dread of autocracy had so sunk into his bones, that when his superior, Count Zavadosky, threatened him in play with Siberia again, he poisoned himself at once." This "harmless book" is still unobtainable in Russia, and the author's name was long forbidden to be mentioned, "even in dispraise"!

A generation later we have the fate of the poet Rylêev, who was one of the five Dekabrists hanged by Nicolas, out of the total of 125 condemned, "the mental élite of Russia." Of this poet Herr Brückner says "his tumultuously protesting tone contrasts forcibly with the almost Asiatic fatalism of the Russians, their long-suffering and gentle submission which so greatly facilitated the ruling of them by all Teuton or Mongolian conquerors." Wherever we turn in Russian literature, we are confronted with this ceaseless conflict between the "terrible Sheshkovsky" element, and the humane and revolting Radishchev element in society. "We hang and forgive and spit on history" is one of the epigrams of Griboêdev, the author of the famous classical comedy, "Wit Comes to Grief," which satirizes the truckling, time-serving life of the Russian nobility. This conflict in the national soul between arbitrary power and the feeling of common humanity is shown pathetically by Derzhavin's ode at the accession of Alexander I. "The age is new! A young and splendid Tsar has come to us to-day along the path of spring. The people's sighs and streams of tears, the prayers of injured souls shall rise high like a vapor and arouse the thunder in the clouds. . . . Ye mighty powers, give ear, and see that ye oppress not the people given you to rule"—an ode which might have been written indeed yesterday at the accession of Nicolas II. We should feel sceptical as to the truth of this panorama of generations of frustrated hopes, gnawing despair, cynical self-forgetfulness, and impotent rebellion, if so many minor Russian authors had not in their own persons suffered a tragic fate, like the student Polegháev, who for the freedom of his "humorous narrative poem, Sáshka," was drafted by Nicolas I. into the army, deserted in order to present a petition, was condemned to run the gauntlet, escaped the punishment, and was sent to the Caucasus, took to drink, was retransferred to Moscow, with the sequel—"consumption and spirits completed their work of destruction: the soldier was already dead, but the rats gnawed off his leg in the hospital cellar."

As we turn Herr Brückner's pages, we feel ourselves inevitably weighed down by the distressing history of human suffering disclosed by the Russian authors, and the English reader may well ask himself—are not their national pictures too gloomy? The answer is not a simple one. Mrs. Newmarch has pointed out in an essay on Koltsov, the Folk poet, that we find in him, as well as in the Bylini and folk songs "an undercurrent of melancholy, but by no means the reiterated note of despair, nor any of that resentful bitterness with which the cultured poets have invested the destiny of the peasant classes." And against the unrelieved pessimism of the poet Nekrassov, and the lacerating cynicism of the satirist Saltykov, we may place the all comprehending humanity of Tolstoy, with his epic breadth of sane and living emotion, the deep and tender justice of Turgenev's outlook, and the impartial objectivity of Ostrovsky, the leading dramatist. We must remember also that while English optimism has forbidden our writers to sound the gulf of human misery, the Russian spirit has long found refuge in the recognition of the worst. Were India swayed by Russian rule, what appallingly truthful pictures should we not have had in literature of those very horrors of pestilence and famine which are recorded to-day only in a dozen curt lines in our Press telegrams, forthwith to be dismissed from the English consciousness. Speaking broadly, while English literature of the period, 1830-1880, voiced the moral outlook, ideas and ideals of our triumphant middle-class, Russian literature undertook the sterner duty of exposing the evils of the national life. Even the Byronic Romanticism of Púshkin and Lérmontov was not divorced from their criticism of contemporary life. But Romanticism, a Western exotic, could take no real root in the Russian soil. With the death of Lérmontov, of whose poems some interesting renderings by the editor, Mr. E. H. Minns, enrich the volume before us, Herr Brückner tells us, "Russian song became silent for decades; it had lost the ear of the nation, which now thought of other things."

The year 1842, which saw the publication of Gogol's "Dead Souls," proclaimed by the great critic Bêlinsky, "a genuinely Russian work, as true to life as patriotic, mercilessly tearing the veil from reality, breathing passionate love for the fruitful essence of Russian life," is, indeed, the chief literary landmark for our guidance, since into the firmament "swim into our ken" in rapid succession the galaxy of stars above mentioned, as well as Herzen, Goncharov, Grigoróvich, Gleb Uspénsky, Nekrássov, and Alexis Tolstoy.

It is not necessary to dwell here on Herr Brückner's criticism of Turgénev and Tolstoy, which are weak in æsthetic appreciation. Illuminating, however, is Dostoévsky's verdict on Tolstoy made in 1877: "In spite of his colossal artistic talent, Tolstoy is one of those Russian minds which only see that which is right before their eyes, and therefore press towards that point. Obviously they have not the power to turn their necks right or left to see what lies to one side; they would have to make the turn with their whole bodies. Then they will perhaps maintain the direct opposite, for they are in any case strictly honest." The chapter on Dostoévsky is admirable in its deep appreciation of the great Russian "sorcerer," who sought to sound depths in the human consciousness never before explored. And equally good is Herr Brückner's exposition of the great satirist Saltykóv, the Russian Swift, a fascinating figure, who "destroyed unsparingly Russian illusions."

Will no English scholar come forward with a translation of Saltykóv's satire on the good people of Glúpov—i.e., Russia? The war-cry of the first Dynastic Chief of Glúpov, "Thrash to Death," seems to have become an inherited family motto.

THE PROBLEM OF UNEMPLOYMENT.*

This is the first comprehensive treatment of the unemployed problem that has appeared in the English language. Mr. Beveridge has set about his task in a thoroughly workmanlike fashion. Beginning with a careful examination of the value of the trade union percentages furnished by the Board of Trade, he shows how much is known and how much remains unknown as to the dimensions of unemployment. A close and thoroughly practical examination of the facts of seasonal and cyclical fluctuations in the demand for labor leads to a formulation of what may be termed his central doctrine of "the reserve of labor." This doctrine is, in effect, an enlargement and an economic justification of the judgment expressed by Mr. Charles Booth—that "the modern system of industry will not work without a margin of unemployed." Within certain limits the doctrine is indisputable. There are few trades where the pressure of work can lie quite evenly over all seasons of the year, and over a period of years. There are unavoidable fluctuations in the rate at which the raw materials of wealth can be extracted and supplied to the productive processes; weather and other natural causes impose seasonal or more casual irregularities on the volume of work to be done; while corresponding fluctuations from the side of the consumer stamp themselves on most trades. When we add that in competitive industries there is no security for an equal or regular distribution of orders among the various competing businesses, or local groups of businesses, we recognise that redundancies of labor power must always be found in certain parts of our industrial system.

"Unemployment arises because, while the supply of labor grows steadily, the demand for labor, in growing, varies incessantly in volume, distribution, and character." There must be wastage between jobs in trades like building; printing has a slack time in the autumn; every change in machinery or method, in materials or public taste, is certain to displace some workers, who lose time in getting other work; in the general growth of national trade and employment some trades will be declining, some localities decaying, and a good deal of wastage of labor-power occurs when such changes are sudden, rapid, or unforeseen. Owing to such shrinkages, there must always be a number of unemployed workers. But in the true economic sense they do not merely stand for waste. They represent a reserve of labor essential for the freedom and fluidity of industry. So far as they constitute "the unemployed," the problem is to economise this necessary reserve, and to make humane and reasonable conditions for them while they are waiting for employment.

To this task the most valuable part of Mr. Beveridge's constructive proposals is devoted. He shows how, by a well-ordered system of labor exchanges, the loss of time in fitting employers with the men they want might be reduced, while for a large mass of casually employed labor a smaller quantity of regularly employed might be substituted. This smaller mobile reserve must be regarded as a normal expense of industry, its members being furnished with a decent subsistence when they are not wanted. If labor exchanges could once be established as the ordinary accepted method of coming together between employers and workers, registry at an exchange might be a safe "labor test," entitling out-of-works to support. But it is mainly to an extension of insurance, either through trade unions, or by some public system, that Mr. Beveridge looks for his provision for the waiters. Relief works he regards as a radically unsound remedy, nor does he look with much favor upon afforestation, or any other new public industry, as a method of dealing with unemployed workers. Public bodies, by regularising their business operations, can do something to level employment, the substitution of short time for dismissal by private industry can do more, though on this point Mr. Beveridge omits to face the danger lest short time should be utilised for keeping a larger reserve within the trade than is desirable.

While agreeing, however, with most of Mr. Beveridge's constructive proposals, we cannot see in them a satisfactory solution of the main problem of unemployment, that which is related to industrial depressions. Dismissing various theories for explaining these cyclical movements, he appears to hold that, in their existing forms and dimensions, they are essential to industrial progress, and that the unemployment they carry is necessary to the healthy operation of competitive industry.

"Trade fluctuation is, indeed, at times obviously and directly the means by which the standard of production and of comfort is driven upwards. When trade is expanding, many new factories are built; they have then their chance to overcome initial difficulties and to get a footing while competition is less severe. When trade contracts again it is not the new, but the old and relatively obsolete factories that have to close. The next expansion starts from a higher level of efficiency. In this way fluctuation appears intimately bound up with the possibility of material progress" (page 64). The phrases we italicise convey a doctrine of the unexplained inevitable. Frankly, we refuse to accept the suggestion that it is either necessary or desirable that for long periods, at intervals of seven or eight years, some eight or ten per cent. of the labor power, together with a corresponding capital, should be standing idle, or that the doctrine of the "reserve" covers any such enormity. Mr. Beveridge asserts that cyclical fluctuations of this order are simply "structural changes," without which industry would become "stereotyped and unprogressive." There is no reason to hold that any single factor of production, the ability and enterprise of employers, the saving and investment of capital, the efficiency of labor, is rendered more productive by a period of depression. On the contrary, these periods are the greatest obstacles to industrial progress: they represent not the wholesome rhythmic pulsation of vigorous growth, but periods of debility and disease in the industrial system. We cannot regard as an adequate remedy any scheme of industrial reconstruction which fails to cope with this largest factor in the case, the difference between the 2½ per cent. of unemployed in a good year and the 9 per cent. in a bad year. Mr. Beveridge does not show that this is part of any useful reserve, except by assuming the inevitability of booms and depressions.

Until some remedy, or at any rate some sensible alleviation, of cyclical depressions can be discovered and applied, it is, moreover, tolerably clear that the efficacy of the sound palliatives advocated by Mr. Beveridge will be seriously impaired. Labor exchanges could do little at times like the present to help competent workmen to get employment, and they would fail at such times to furnish "tests" for the genuineness of applicants. The dimensions and duration of unemployment in depressions already strain the resources of the strongest unions, and invalidate the contention that the great majority of workers could afford to make adequate insurance. Moreover, if private co-operation or State assistance made such insurance possible, the waste and demoralisation of character involved in long periods of idle maintenance would remain as the most striking testimony to the irrational economy of our industrial system.

A FROLIC.*

The genius of Mr. Snaith is certainly of a curious and essentially original type. It is very varied, and it breaks out in quite unexpected places. It may owe something to Meredith in style and in choice of subject, when, for example, it falls upon a line of humorous fantasy or seizes on and criticises the characteristic lines of English social life. But it is thoroughly modern, and as it gathers ease and self-confidence, we think that its author should take his place in quite the front rank of our novelists. His "Araminta," is, on the face of it, a little puzzling. It is a pure study in playfulness, with little or no hint of the seriousness of "Broke of Covenden" and "William Jordan, Junior." Nothing in it is real, or, let us say, more real than the figures in one of the more innocent of Aubrey Beardsley's pictures. The world that he imagines is a kind of æsthetic world, with Dresden shepherds and shepherdesses masquerading as Earls and fairy godmothers and daughters of the gods divinely tall and gloriously flounced and bewigged. This is far enough away from the path where despised genius walks its forsaken way, or the foibles and passions of our barbarians break themselves on a world grown too hard and practical for them. For that reason we have no doubt it will be more popular than either of its more serious predecessors. It should, we think, make an excellent farcical comedy, and indeed, as we read it, we could both hear and see Sir John Hare playing the part of Lord Cheriton. What its author's purpose was, save to indulge the skittishness of a rather playful muse, we have no idea. It is delightful, high-spirited brilliant frolic. If it had been sustained at the level of the first fifty pages, and we had had a few more scenes like the awful toilet of Lady Crewkerne, or the entrance of Araminta into the Hill Street drawing-room, and the enunciation of her famous formulæ about Slocum Magna and Widdiford, we should have found nothing in modern English fiction quite comparable to it for freshness and high spirits, save perhaps an early extravaganza of Thackeray. And while it has no plot, no point of feeling or serious play of character—nothing more, indeed, than the wilful artifice which a clever writer employs in order to adorn his humor—its entrain, the pretty, puppet-like arrangement of its scenes and tableaux, must please all but the most morose of critics.

"Araminta" is, we suppose, the heroine of the book. She is the great-grand-daughter of a duchess, the daughter of a poor country parson, from Devonshire, brought up to town by a whim of Lady Crewkerne, of Hill Street, her grandmother, an aged harridan, drawn a little from Thackeray's Lady Kew, but also a good deal from the author's freakish fancy. She is an absolute beauty, a duchess of curds and cream, and an absolute fool. Arrived at Hill Street, where she is taken for the new housemaid, and shakes hands with the butler, she is discovered to be a kind of "throwback," the physical image of her great-grandmother, Araminta, Duchess of Dorset. Araminta the First has been painted by Gainsborough, and her picture is the chief ornament of the Hill Street drawing-room. When, therefore, Araminta the Second arrives, in cobbled boots and hat "like an inverted vegetable basket," and seats her magnificent self on the sofa, with her finger in her mouth, Lord Cheriton, the amateur of beauty, catches the exact likeness to the portrait of her forbear, and insists on making her the "success of the season." To this high end, he summons all the social powers, the dressmakers, the Church, and even an aged rival in the shape of a battered Duke, who joins him in the discreet chasse à l'Araminta which follows. A new "creation" in the shape of a Gainsborough hat is designed for Araminta the Second, her gown is sat upon by a jury of experts, and when she is fitted with these marvels of fashion, Lord Cheriton and Lady Crewkerne escort her to Church. But the effect is not yet quite perfect, and as the party bearing Araminta's social fortunes enter the sacred building after the congregation has assembled and the service well begun, Lord Cheriton finds it necessary to improvise a veritable coup de théâtre. And this is how he manages it:— with the fervent voices still upraised and the organ loudly pealing, more than one pair of eyes took their fill of it. There was not a worshipper within those four walls who did not know who the old woman was with the hawklike features and the ebony walking-stick. Nor were they at a loss for the identity of the distinguished, if slightly overdressed, gentleman who came in her train. Moreover, the wonderful creature in the picture hat and the lilac frock did not fail to inspire their curiosity.

Caroline Crewkerne's pew was at the far end of the church, next but two to the chancel. The procession had reached the middle of the central aisle when there came a brief lull in the proceedings. The organ was muffled in a passage of peculiar solemnity; the fervor of the voices was subdued in harmony; there was hardly a sound to be heard, when Cheriton had the misfortune to drop his umbrella.

The sound of the ivory handle resolutely meeting cold marble at such an intensely solemn moment was really dramatic. Not a person throughout the whole of the sacred edifice who could fail to hear the impact of the ill-fated umbrella. For the umbrella was indeed ill-fated. The ivory handle lay upon the marble, shivered in three pieces. Almost every eye in the church seemed to be fixed upon the owner of the umbrella. A wave of indignation, which seemed to make the air vibrate, appeared to pass over the congregation. Not only did the owner of the umbrella come late to church, but he must needs disturb the sanctity of the occasion by mundanely dropping his umbrella with extraordinary violence and publicity.

From a little to the left of Cheriton, as he stood ruefully surveying the wreck of his umbrella, there penetrated cool and youthful tones.

"My aunt!" they said, "who is the gal the old blighter's got with him?"

"Sssh, Archibald!" came a sibilant whisper; and then arose a louder and more decisive, "Overdressed!"

Araminta finally slips out of the hands of this accomplished entrepreneur into the arms of the young artist who paints her, and adores at once her brainlessness and her beauty. Most of the scenes in the book resemble the one we have quoted, designed, as they are, as mere play, too light even for social satire. The latter half of the book disappoints us a little, for Lady Crewkerne, the freezing Medusa of the earlier pages, fades into something like a commonplace match-making old woman in the later. But all of the characters have something to do with the fortunes of this wonderful blond beauty who lets herself be tossed from one to the other till her stalwart artist carries her happily off, with a blessing and an endowment from her æsthetic chaperon. The book is pure fantasy throughout; it does not advance Mr. Snaith's reputation, save in so far as it shows how gay and droll a fancy is his, and how lightly he plays with it. But we should say that it will greatly advance his popularity.

NEW ZEALAND, PAST AND PRESENT.*

Little more than a year ago New Zealand was declared by Royal Proclamation to be a Dominion. The change in her title signified the attainment of her desire to be raised in status above the ruck of colonies, even of self-governing colonies; to stand, in fact, on a level with Canada as a political and territorial entity recognised by the whole world. In Great Britain, it must be confessed, no great stir was caused by the new style. Only a few realised its inner meaning; having concerned themselves in the past less with the political development of the colony than with a few prominent facts of commerce associated therewith. It was known, for example, that New Zealand gave us frozen mutton and Mr. Seddon; but it was not nearly so widely recognised that her position at that time was an almost critical one, the time having come for her to decide whether she was to retain her independence or to become incorporated in the federation of the Australian States. This was the question that she had to answer for herself in 1907. There were obvious good reasons why she should join the Australian Commonwealth. There were, to her mind, equally sound arguments in favor of her standing aloof. She chose the latter course, and the title of Dominion, accorded in answer to her Parliament's petition, was the formal ratification of her choice, and, as such, assumes considerable historic importance.

It is, however, hardly with politics, or at any rate not the latter-day politics, that the two books on New Zealand which are before us attempt to deal. The one is a volume in the "Romance of Empire" series, and is written by Mr. Reginald Horsley; while in the other the country, as it is to-day, is described by no less an authority than a former High Commissioner, the Hon. W. P. Reeves, and illustrated by the landscape drawings of Messrs. F. & W. Wright. The two differ in regard to their general intention, since Mr. Horsley deals mainly with the past of New Zealand, and his fellow-author with the present; but they are alike in that the political standpoint is, in both, subordinated to the picturesque. The scope of each overlaps that of the other since Mr. Horsley brings his history up to the present age, and Mr. Reeves illustrates the present by references to the past. But the particular province of each is clearly enough defined. One might go further and say that Mr. Horsley's story is that of the Maori, and Mr. Reeves's that of the white man. The former is at any rate a word pageant of Maori warriors, fights, victories, defeats: a record of almost Homeric romance; while in the latter narrative the black man has fallen into his place of little romance and less importance. The first, moreover, is very largely tinged with an imaginative sympathy for the Maori point of view, the second mainly occupied with those natural beauties of the country, of which the Maori remnant forms a picturesque item, and with the white settlers in whose habits the intending emigrant or tourist naturally takes the most interest.

Mr. Horsley's narrative, which may be read profitably as an introduction to the other, sketches Maori history from the legendary accounts of the Polynesian immigration to the more substantial records of the coming of the Paheka, or White Man, thence, through the great and little wars of the last century, to the present day. The first European to discover New Zealand was Tasman, the Dutchman, who sailed thither in the seventeenth century, but never landed on its shores; and it was not till 1787, some years after the death of Captain Cook, that the islands were included by Royal Commission in the British dominions. Queen Victoria's sovereignty was declared by Governor Hobson in 1840. Five years later the first Parliament was instituted at Auckland. Such are the principal points in the constitutional development of New Zealand. The very wide spaces between them are filled up by the Maori wars, notably the revolt of Heke in 1845 and that of Te Kooti twenty years later, the doings of private colonisers, and the struggle between the Crown and the New Zealand Land Company. With this struggle the early history of the Colony is largely bound up. In the end the Crown won, and the Company, like the East India Company in an older Colony, faded out of existence. But for long afterwards the land question was the source of trouble between Maoris and settlers. The Maoris clung to their own system of land tenure. They could never understand how the land possessed by them for generations could be permanently taken away from them, even by purchase; to sell it seemed to them the same thing as leasing it, with the right of re-possession in the future. The Colonist buyers were—naturally, perhaps—unable to see the matter from this point of view; neither would they allow that the ridiculously low purchase price that was often paid affected their moral claim to hold fast by their bargains. Consequently questions of proper title were always arising, and out of them came quarrel and bloodshed. Some famous fights and figures are vividly described by Mr. Horsley, whose book, if it were nothing else, would be an informative study of the methods of Maori warfare. Besides the Maori leaders a few Europeans stand out strongly from the picture—men like the late Sir George Gray and Bishop Selwyn, both Empire-builders in the best sense—and Mr. Q. D. McCormick's dramatic drawings in color are thoroughly in keeping with the spirit of a stirring story. Mr. Reeves's literary taste has been of a more peaceful character, but his book is wholly interesting. He shows a peculiarly intimate knowledge of the natural history of the Colony, and his appreciation of its scenic beauties is expressed in terms always scholarly and often eloquent. It is, perhaps, unnecessary to state that he knows every inch of the social fabric in town and country, and describes it with insight and, one may add, an implied cordial invitation to the reader to make its better acquaintance. One could desire no better apologist for a still young land.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Mr. Atlay's sketch of Lord Haliburton's official career ("Lord Haliburton: A Memoir of His Public Service," Smith Elder, 8s. 6d. net) is rather severely restricted by Lady Haliburton's desire that it should be not so much a biography as a story of Lord Haliburton's methods and ideas of work in the War Office. It tells us, therefore, little of Lord Haliburton's personality, which was a highly agreeable one, nor of his social life and its relationships, which were interesting. Lord Haliburton had wealth, entertained much, and attracted and retained his friends. However, the book, as it stands, is indispensable to close students of the British Army System, which Haliburton's long association with the office in Pall Mall helped to form. To-day we suppose he would be called an old-fashioned administrator, which means that he adhered to economy, to civilian control of matters that civilians can always do better than soldiers, and to the essential features of the Cardwell system, namely, short service and the maintenance of the exact balance between the number of battalions abroad and of those at home—that is to say, between the growing plant and its roots. When Haliburton was called into the field in the "Times" correspondence to defend this system against Mr. Arnold Foster's very muddle-headed attack upon it, he must be held to have thoroughly crushed, pulverised, and destroyed his assailant. For this work he was excellently equipped, for he wrote a pointed style, perfectly suited to controversy, simple, concentrated, and always informed by correct knowledge. Mr. Atlay gives an interesting sketch of Lord Haliburton's final attitude towards Army reform. Apparently he desired a form of national, but not compulsory, military training, beginning with the schools and perfected by means of the Militia organisation, but such ideas were, of course, crushed by Mr. Haldane's destruction of the Militia. He therefore disapproved of the Haldane scheme, and we are bound to say that his disapproval counts with weight, for if ever there was a clear thinker, it was the late permanent under-secretary to the War Office. Mr. Atlay's sketch strikes us as an adequate piece of work, but it is disfigured by one or two mis-spellings of proper names.

We observe that "The Fellowship Hymn Book" (Headley Brothers & Co., and E. Dalton, fourpence, net) is designed by the joint compilers for the special purposes of the P.S.A. and adult school movements, for which, we have no doubt, it is admirably suited. With this purpose it combines new and old work, with the definite object of mingling purely religious poetry—either of the objective or of the meditative kind—with modern strains of thought and aspiration, democratic and ethical in tendency. To this latter type belong verses such as Ebenezer Elliott's "When Wilt Thou Save the People?" J. A. Symonds's "The Men of the Future"—(why not Shelley's perfect poem, "The World's Great Age Begins Anew," of which Symonds's fine verse appears to be a reminiscence?)—Edward Carpenter's "England, Arise," Mrs. Howe's "Battle Hymn of the Republic," and "Home, Sweet Home." This is no doubt a necessary development, though we confess that, being conservative in this matter, we ask for nothing more in a hymnal than the Latin and Moravian hymns, Watts, the Wesleys, Cowper, James Montgomery, and perhaps Keble and Newman. We would add, on pressure, one or two moderns like Canon Ellerton and Lynch, and we admit the feeling which appeals for one or two of Mrs. Alexander's verses. But we should not accept Faber, or anything of Frances Ridley Havergal. The compilers of this volume have exercised a wider choice, and, considering their special aim, they have shown a singularly catholic spirit. One ground of quarrel we must take, and that is the imperfect form given to Charles Wesley's "Come, O Thou Traveller Unknown," one of the most perfect poems in the English language. The brief critical or biographical note at the head of each hymn which demands such treatment seems to us excellent.

The career of a nineteenth century captain of industry of the best type is well told in Dr. Stuart J. Reid's "Sir Richard Tangye" (Duckworth, 6s.). The son of a small Quaker farmer who also kept the village shop, Sir Richard Tangye started in business with no advantages save character and a good education. The latter he obtained at the Friends' School at Sidcot, an institution which has reared quite a number of distinguished men. He began as a clerk in a small engineering firm at Birmingham, and then set up on his own account, without capital. His brothers joined him, and the tide in the firm's career came when Brunel built the "Great Eastern." The ship could not be launched, as the type of jack then in use proved powerless. James Tangye made an hydraulic jack, which solved the problem, and the real foundation of the business was laid. "We launched the Great Eastern, and she launched us," Sir Richard Tangye was in the habit of saying. As an employer of labor, Sir Richard Tangye was one of the first among the Birmingham employers to introduce a nine-hours day, and his consideration for the welfare of his workpeople was always a marked feature of his management. He was a strong Liberal, and his stalwart support of the party at the time Mr. Chamberlain left it, did much to keep Liberalism alive, if not flourishing, in Birmingham. Though often invited to enter Parliament—once by Gladstone himself—he felt that his health could not stand the wear and tear of Parliamentary life. Dr. Reid has given us an excellent portrait of a genial, public-spirited, and attractive personality. Those who enjoyed his "Life and Times of Sydney Smith" will not be disappointed in this biography of Sir Richard Tangye.

We rejoice to see a revised and enlarged edition of Professor L. T. Hobhouse's "Democracy and Reaction," published at one shilling net by Messrs. Fisher Unwin. Its searching analysis of the intellectual and emotional nature of Imperialism has lost none of its value since the book first appeared. Indeed, recent events have only served to confirm the accuracy of Professor Hobhouse's diagnosis by exhibiting new symptoms. As he points out in the valuable Introduction to this popular edition, "the hot fit of Imperialism is past, but the cold fit succeeds. Those who the other day were loudest in proclaiming their nation the appointed rulers of mankind, are now in panic because our neighbors want to have one warship to our two. The same Press influences which so misled the nation in the matter of South Africa can proceed seemingly with undiminished influence to work up a scare on the subject of Germany." No more serviceable volume can be put into the hands of a young politician.

The fall of Kiamil Pasha checked the rapid growth of "bullish" settlement on the Stock Exchange, and speculative persons began to wonder whether it was quite safe to have such large commitments open with the Near East still unsettled. The Austrian loan, which has been announced, is also regarded as a preparation against Servia and Montenegro, whose attitude is still threatening, the more so as there are several millions of "unredeemed" Serbs in Bosnia and Hungary. But I am inclined to think that the loan is to pay for the partial mobilisation of the past few months and the Turkish indemnity, rather than for dangers ahead. Meanwhile, recent issues have retained good premiums. Among future loans China is mentioned, and there is in this case the vexed question of whether Chinese railway loans should be purely national, or should have conditions attached for foreign supervision, so that investors may have guarantees that the money is really being spent on the work. It is said that on the average only about a fourth of the money raised throughout China in taxes really

All About Investment.

By Henry Lowenfeld. Now Ready. 5/- net.

"It is success which colours all in life."—Opening the first chapter with these words, the author shows how investment success can only be attained by adhering to a definite investment-aim. He divides investors into ten classes in one of which every reader—be he thrifty artisan or wealthy landowner—is bound to recognise himself and his needs. In the succeeding eight chapters the reader is taught how to avoid the risks which are inseparable from haphazard investment; how to achieve his own investment aim and "the success which colours all in life." It is a logical book for logical people.

Not a dull moment nor an abstruce point in its 282 pages.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

H. G. WELLS'S MASTERPIECE.

Morning Post.—"A book that everyone must read. Mr. H. G. Wells is the most clear-headed critic of modern England, and, though the most distinctive, he is at the same time the most good-humoured. One learns from him even when one disagrees from him most, and one never fails to feel in company with his books that one is in the company of a familiar friend with whom one can share the laughter of the heart. His best qualities are to be found in Tono-Bungay, which is a book to read and to consider and to read again."

TONO-BUNGAY. 6s.

Daily Telegraph.—"We think that we shall be within the limit of reasonable prophecy if we suggest that 'Tono-Bungay' will prove to be Mr. H. G. Wells's 'David Copperfield.' . . . One of the most significant novels of modern times, one of the sincerest and most unflinching analyses of the dangers and perils of our contemporary life that any writer has had the courage to submit to his own generation. Mr. Wells has certainly done nothing to approach this book, both for courage and for conviction."

Six Per Cent. Investments.

To go in quest of six per cent. is rather a dangerous adventure, and no one should think of it unless he can afford to have his income reduced. Six per cent. is not a safe figure, and an investor who goes for it must always remember the risks he is running. But at the same time there are plenty of securities on the London market which yield six per cent. at their present price and are nevertheless fairly sound investments. Of course they are speculative, and the dividend is in most cases at least as likely to go down as to go up; but they are not "gambles," and even a cautious investor may legitimately buy them, and do quite well out of them. As an example of the sort of security that can be bought to give about six per cent., I may quote the following, drawn at random from the London list:—

Security.	Present Price.	Yield. £ s. d.	Highest 1908.	Lowest 1908.
Buenos Ayres & Pacific Ord.	110½	6 6 9	124½	108⅞
Central Argentine Deferred...	100	6 0 0	109½	95½
Costa Rica 2nd Debs.	101	6 6 3	101¼	91
San Paulo Ord.	211	6 3 3	211½	190
John Brown & Co. Ord.	1 11-16	5 18 6	1 7-32	1 1-32
United States Steel Pref.	116¾	6 0 0	118	90½
P. & O. Deferred	206½	6 6 9	215½	202
American Telephone and Telegraph Cap. Stock	133	6 0 3	135½	106½
Indo-European Telegraph	53½	6 2 0	58	52
Lon. General Omnibus Debs.	80½	6 4 3	87½	77½

The prices of 1908 are added to the present price and yield in order to show the "margin of fluctuation"—the sort of movement that an investor may expect in the future. The list is a curiously mixed one, and, of course, it only contains a very few of the six per cent. securities on the London market. But it gives an idea of the sort of share that can be bought to yield that percentage, and in this way may be a useful guide. Perhaps the most remarkable stock in the list is the United States Steel Preference, which would seem to be well enough secured, and yet yields more than a good many ordinary shares of comparatively small English steel companies. All the railways in the list are South American, and two of them are Argentine railways, whose price has been depressed by the perpetual issue of new capital. If the Buenos Ayres and Pacific fulfils all the hopeful predictions made of it, its stock ought to be a good bargain at the present price; but then Argentina with her population of 5,000,000 has already absorbed nearly £300,000,000 of English money, so the rate of interest is naturally high. The Indo-European Telegraph is one of the cable shares that have been curiously weak for the past twelve months, while the American Telephone is a company new to the London market, but with a good record behind it. Among shipping companies the P. and O. has a class to itself; but its deferred stock nevertheless yields over six per cent. Of course, all shipping business is speculative, for it is very sensitive to depression; but in the case of the P. and O., uncertainty as to the future management of the company probably tends to send prices down. The line has been controlled by one man for quite a quarter of a century, and no one can say quite how much of the company's success depends on him personally.

The American Depression.

"It is very apparent," writes Mr. Henry Clews, in his last letter from New York, "that we are feeling the reactionary effects of the panic more plainly than at any time since it occurred. There is more hesitation in spirit than has been experienced in many months. By general consent the tariff is blamed for this state of affairs; yet while an element of delay and uncertainty, it cannot be held responsible for many of the signs of depression which are daily coming under observation." The truth is, adds this experienced critic, the readjustment process is still incomplete. "We must come down to lower costs of production and lower costs of living; then we may be ready for a fresh start." "Meanwhile Tariff Revision will continue to be used as a bogey by those who wish to frighten Congress out of making any important reductions in the schedules." This is plain speaking from a Wall Street magnate. As a matter of fact the steel, woollen, and other trusts are getting nervous about tariff revision. It is one of the misfortunes of a tariff that it has to be periodically revised, and these changes naturally upset trade and business.

Harrod's Stores.

The worst of "industrials," whether they be of the manufacturing or shopkeeping class, is that their value as investments depends so much upon management. If good men die or leave, and incapable men are appointed, your property disappears into thin air. Still, we continue to watch new stars rising and others setting, and the successful ones have no difficulty in obtaining capital. Just now Harrod's Stores are a phenomenal success; and, as one of the critics has been pointing out, Harrod's expansion during the past decade has been little short of marvellous; it is certainly one of the most remarkable instances of industrial prosperity in this generally lean period. Here is a table showing the increase in the business during the past year:—

	1908.	1907.
Gross Profits	£578,800	£528,400
Net Profit	198,300	172,800
Ord. Dividend and Bonus...	25 p.c.	24 p.c.
Carry forward... ...	£34,800	£27,100

The company places 10 per cent. of the net balance available for dividend, which amounts to £14,870, to the reserve. The reserve now stands at £688,529. During the year the issue of 44,000 5 per cent. Cumulative Preference shares was successfully made at a premium of 17s. 6d., and the premiums, amounting to £31,200, were placed to reserve.

Canadian Promoters.

The speculative habits of Canadian financiers are well known. Though Canadian Government and municipalities and industrial concerns are all large borrowers, and though Cobalt and British Columbia offer plenty of scope to mining promotions, the Canadians are not by any means satisfied. Various people in Toronto and Montreal have formed a sort of trust for obtaining concessions in Mexico and South America. They collect money to float these enterprises, and to fill their own pockets from more or less simple investors in London and Brussels. The Mexican Trams and the Mexican Light and Power Company are well-known creations. In Brazil they started with the Sao Paulo Trams, and were encouraged next to tackle Rio. Their biggest achievement so far has been to run up the common stock (which looks decidedly watery) of this Rio Tramway Company from about 30 to well over 100 without having paid a single dividend! On Tuesday our Stock Exchange learned that a fresh issue of stock was intended, and the Rio Tramway stock promptly fell from 106 to 99. It appears to me that these Canadian promotions in South America make rather risky investments at present prices. Nor does one like the methods that have been used to hoist them.

A Memorable Debate

An Interesting Reminiscence of

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE

and Mr. Lloyd George, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer.

In a debate in the House of Commons, on the 13th June, 1890, on the Local Taxation Bill, Mr. Gladstone said, "Enough of idle words; if you were to multiply these amendments till they were as thick as the leaves in Vallombrosa, or as plentiful as the advertisements of you would not prevent the consequences of this clause." And in the same debate, as the Pall Mall Gazette reported, "Mr. Lloyd George, the new Member for Carnarvon, made a capital maiden speech, full of promise for his future career."

This was eighteen years ago, but tributes to the popularity of Pears' continue to appear in an ever-broadening stream. It is 120 years since Pears' was invented, and it still remains the leading toilet soap of the world—first in purity, first in beautifying properties, first in point of economy and first in public favour.

The highest possible honours at the leading International Exhibition since 1851 (including the only Grand Prix ever given for a Toilet Soap) have been awarded to Pears.

Diary of the Week.

It is understood that Wednesday's Cabinet Council resulted in a decision to build four "Dreadnoughts," rather than six, but to maintain a certain reserve power of building in view of contingencies. We presume that this refers to the speeding up of the rate of construction in German shipyards, a fact—if it is a fact—which is a set-off against the long delays which occurred over the earlier types of German "Dreadnoughts." We hope the House of Commons will part with none of its powers of supervising finance and voting money with full knowledge of what it is to be spent on. It is curious that the Admiralty should be represented as asking for six "Dreadnoughts" at a bound—a sheer panic demand—in view of the remarkable fact that progress on the two "Dreadnoughts" voted last year has been so slow, and that the "Téméraire" and "Superb" have been behind their times. We wonder whether the directors of the Admiralty could give Parliament any satisfactory assurance that they could deliver, arm, and equip any such number of leviathans within two years, or even thirty months. We are not at all sure that the best safeguard for the public would not be in some such House of Commons inquiry as Mr. Bellairs has demanded.

Our Paris correspondent writes, describing a naval situation having some close parallels to our own: "The difference between the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Marine has reached an acute stage and the resignation of one or the other seems to-day (Thursday) to be inevitable. It is believed that M. Picard has the support of the majority of his colleagues in the Cabinet, and in particular of M. Clemenceau, in which case M. Caillaux will be the seceder unless an arrangement can be made at the eleventh hour. M. Caillaux's friends declare that his opposition to the demands of the Marine is due not merely to the enormous amount of the credit for which M. Picard asks but also to the absence of any guarantee that the money will be well spent. He desires that the abuses in the Service should be effectively tackled before Parliament is asked to vote more millions. The suggestion is that there is a grave leakage and that M. Picard shrinks from a thorough investigation which might put some highly-placed officials in an uncomfortable position. It is also suggested that the attacks on M. Caillaux are indirectly aimed at the Income Tax Bill and at Old Age Pensions, and it is certainly the case that the reactionary and conservative Press is unanimously hostile to the Finance Minister, and calls on M. Clemenceau to get rid of him. In any case a Ministerial crisis is more than probable."

On Thursday of last week the Russian Government decided to receive Prince Ferdinand at the funeral of the Grand Duke Vladimir with royal honors, and on the same day rumors were circulated from St. Petersburg that Austria was on the point of issuing an ultimatum to Servia, and immediate war was almost inevitable. No such ultimatum has been issued, and the Austrian Government professes to have no wish or thought of war, but a furious Press campaign has been raging between Russia, Servia, and Austria, in which the "Novoe Vremya" has won special distinction. If there is any likelihood of war much responsibility rests with the Panslavist agitators in Russia. Austria's position is that Servia must drop her inadmissible demand for territorial compensation, and then, but not till then, Austria will think of generous economic compensation. An attempt, originating in Paris, to secure joint representations by the Powers at both Vienna and Belgrade has fallen through, because Germany holds that Servia alone threatens the peace. If, on the one hand, Russia cooperated in bringing Servia to reason, instead of stimulating Servian passions, and, on the other hand, Austria dropped her stiff refusal to give shape and substance to her hints of economic compensation, a settlement ought to be easy enough.

Lord Morley's great Indian Reform Bill was read a second time in the House of Lords on Wednesday without a division. It will probably pass the House, and therefore Parliament, without amendment, especially as its author has settled the Mohammedans' discontent by giving them a separate electoral register, and seats on the Council in excess of their numerical strength. The third demand—that of a Mohammedan member for the Viceroy's Council—he necessarily rejected, for that would give a third of the whole body to native representation. Lord Morley was able continuously to claim Lord Minto as a friend of the Bill, especially of its pivotal proposal for admitting a native to the Viceroy's Council. In his fine speech he held firmly to the language of the Act of 1833, confirmed by the Proclamation of 1858, that fitness was to be "the criterion of eligibility" for service in Indian Government. On the whole, the reception was favorable, even in the suspicious and highly official atmosphere of the Lords.

The most critical speech was Lord Curzon's, whose general line was that Lord Morley had gone beyond Indian official opinion. He specially opposed the admission of a native to the Viceroy's Council on the double ground that it unsettled the foundation of our rule, and that native India could not supply the mixture of "expert" and "statesman" who could properly be seated in the Indian Cabinet. But, although he thought Lord Morley went too far, he hoped to join hands with him on his general plan. Lord MacDonnell, a thorough bureaucrat, who spoils his great gifts by wrong-headedness, was slightly more hostile, but Lord Ampthill was, on the whole, very favorable. The same may be said of Lord Cromer and Lord Reay, and Lord Midleton, though critical, disclaimed hostility. This was, in the main, Lord Lansdowne's attitude, and it seems clear that the Lords will yield a grudging assent.

Mr. Ponsonby's amendment to the Address calling on the Government to bring in a Bill on the lines of the Campbell-Bannerman resolution of June, 1907, was rejected on Monday by 225 votes to 47. Only fourteen Liberals voted in the minority, though a few weeks ago 223 signed an almost identical memorial to Mr. Asquith. Mr. Ponsonby spoke with the simplicity and courage which give him a standing in the House, his chief point being that the country was ready for battle with the Lords, but that it disliked the hesitancy of the Government, and would be unfavorably impressed by it. Mr. Lehmann pointed to the sure fate both of the Welsh Disestablishment Bill and the Irish Land Bill. For so brilliant a Parliamentarian Mr. Asquith's reply was embarrassed. On the one hand he agreed that the pure Tory partisanship of the Lords had brought things to a "climax"; on the other he pleaded that the Government must not concede them the right of forcing a dissolution, and that it must fulfil its honorable engagements to pursue social reform and legislation. But the Government would act "at the earliest possible moment," and in the delay the country would have time for a considered judgment.

Mr. Balfour pressed the dilemma arising from this argument. Mr. Asquith must in his heart think the Lords would treat his Bills fairly. If he did not, he was wasting time in withholding from the country the issue between the Houses. It was time to cease blowing the trumpet and walking round the walls of Jericho, expecting them to tumble down. There was really nothing brave about the Government but its speeches. On the whole, Liberal speaking showed a desire for battle, but observers noted depression and uncertainty in the Ministerial ranks. The Welsh members, we understand, are pressing for the reference of the Disestablishment Bill to a Grand Committee. But even if this course be taken, and the Bill goes to the Lords, rejection is certain.

The Protectionist amendment to the Address was defeated on Friday week by 276 votes to 107. The only feature of the debate beyond Mr. Balfour's muttering of the various Protectionist formulæ in the kind of sotto voce which he adopts on these occasions, was Mr. Churchill's statement that a Free Trade Government was free, if it pleased, to use revenue duties for retaliatory purposes. We doubt the use of retaliation in any case, but Mr. Churchill's reference—which was clearly in the nature of a hint to the French Government in view of the threatened new tariff—applied only to duties, like those on wine or tobacco, levied on articles not produced at home. We fancy that, on one occasion, Gladstone made a similar diplomatic use of the wine duties.

Both France and the United States are in the throes of a considerable tariff agitation. The extreme French Protectionists have discovered that M. Méline's tariff of 1892, reactionary as that was, is behind the times, and a Customs Committee of the Chamber has drawn up a new general tariff which would raise the duties on 866 articles and lower them on six. The apology for this insolent demand is that the general tariff is merely nominal, because in practice practically every country would come under the minimum tariff, but the Protectionists propose to manipulate the minimum tariff so as to raise the duties it imposes on 182 commodities. The "Temps" and the "Débats" point out that this new tariff would not only plunder the mass of consumers, but open a general tariff war and nullify the laborious efforts at improving international relations just at the moment they were producing good results. The Belgian Minister of Foreign Affairs has already promised reprisals if the French project is adopted; there is considerable agitation in Switzerland and Germany; and numerous English Chambers of Commerce have already protested, while the Government is watching the situation.

The Finance Reform Committee of the Reichstag appointed a secret sub-committee to work out a compromise, which it professes to have done. The sub-committee, in harmony with the views of the Conservatives and the Centre, condemns the death duties and estate duties proposed by the Government, and suggests in their place that the State contributions should be increased, the increase to be raised by the individual States within two years by means of direct taxes. This proposal means that the Reichstag should practically abandon the task of levying direct taxes itself, and the Radical and Liberal Press condemn an arrangement which is at once an abdication and wholly illusory. The question of direct taxation is, of course, the crux of the financial problem, for the proposed new indirect taxes, if not accompanied by direct taxes, would be a gross injustice to the poorer classes, upon whom the tax system already bears inequitably. Addressing the Agrarians on Tuesday, Professor Wagner, the well-known economist, denounced "the selfish battle of the propertied classes against the taxation of property." Germans with small incomes, he said, were already more heavily taxed proportionately than Germans with large incomes, and persons with less than £45 a year, though they paid no income tax, owing to Protection had no tax-free source of income. Two points are worth noting about this conflict in Germany. The struggle, as the struggle between Free Traders and Tariff "Reformers" in England, is one between taxation imposed on wealth and taxation imposed upon poverty. In the second place, the Conservatives and the Centre are working together, and, if they force their scheme through, the bloc must break up, and with it Prince Bülow.

Mr. Haldane's approval of the action of the Alliance Insurance Company in promoting what Sir William Collins properly called an indirect form of conscription, has been strongly discountenanced by leading employers. In the Insurance world, Mr. Noverre, of the Norwich Fire Union, told the "Daily News" that he entirely disapproved of it, and considered the action of the Company a great mistake. Sir John Barker, who has vigorously promoted the growth of the Territorial Army, said that he would not be a party to anything which "smelt of conscription," and flatly stated his disagreement with Mr. Haldane. The managing director of Maple's declared that the Alliance Company's plan did away with "all the glamor" of volunteering. Similar repudiations come from the director of Whiteley's, the managing director of Messrs. Shoolbred, the secretary of the Law Accident Insurance Society, and the heads of many firms whose names are household words in British commerce. The secretary of the Clerks' Union also insisted that the plan of the Alliance was coercive. This repudiation stamps decisively on the attempt of a Liberal Cabinet Minister to introduce "compulsory volunteering." Indirectly, it is sure to undo much of the sensational recruiting achieved by the "Daily Mail," for it prejudices those who join the Territorials equally with those who do not. If the latter class is handicapped in trying to enter a firm where the exclusive rule applies, a member of the former is handicapped when he endeavors to enter a business which does not put a premium on Territorials or is not able directly to encourage the movement. A clearer tampering with personal liberty could not be imagined.

Mr. Haldane has not mended matters by his extraordinary speech, at Newcastle on Saturday, in favor of the organisation of an Imperial Army. He suggested that to the thirty Divisions of the Over-seas and Territorial Army Canada might add six, Australia five, New Zealand one, and South Africa four or five. In all, he hoped for an army of forty-six divisions or twenty-three Army Corps. This force would exactly equal the German Army, and no other military power in the world had an organisation so great. We believe that Australia will be repelled rather than attracted by Mr. Haldane's suggestion that the New World should be called in to settle the disputes of the Old. In any case, this flamboyant militarism upsets the entire theory of a "peaceful, unaggressive Empire" on which our statesmen build. We observe, without surprise, that Mr. J. A. Bright proposes to ask Mr. Haldane what change in our military policy has made it necessary for us to maintain a force equal to the German Army.

The Opposition amendment calling for coercion in Ireland was rejected on Wednesday by 336 to 118, no Liberal votes being detached. The Opposition, through Mr. Balfour, Lord Percy, and Sir Edward Carson, practically asked for the re-enactment of the Peace Preservation Act and the enforcement of the Crimes Act. Mr. Birrell's reply was to produce an exhaustive return of the state of order in all the Irish counties, showing that in only three districts—Clare, East Galway, and Sligo—were there other than slight exceptions to a generally "satisfactory" condition. He also showed that no possible comparison could be made between the Ireland of 1886 and 1887, which provoked the Crimes Act, and the Ireland of to-day. For neither cattle-driving nor boycotting did the Crimes Act provide a remedy, and all terrorised persons—such as the cruelly persecuted Mr. Clark—were being adequately protected.

Mr. Balfour found it necessary to repudiate the slight advance towards the Irish Nationalist vote which the Protectionists are making, and declared that his party would never guide Irish policy by what they thought Irish votes might do for them. Remembering the Maamtrasna deal, Mr. Asquith replied curtly that it was easy to resist the temptations of to-morrow. The Prime Minister's speech—an excellent one—pointed out that the measure of Irish discontent was Ireland's disappointment with the hopes that the Wyndham Act held out to her of the redistribution of the grazing lands of the west. Coercion was no remedy, political and agrarian trouble going hand in hand. The only cure was, both by legislation and administration, to associate Irish sentiment with the law. The trouble, we are afraid, is that Ireland is becoming more and more dependent on the land. A young farmer on the coast said recently to a Minister: "America is shut down on us, the trawlers have the fish, and the graziers the land. What are you going to do?"

Answering a question by Mr. Dillon on Tuesday, Sir Edward Grey made by far the most satisfactory statement that has yet appeared with regard to the Government's Persian policy. The British Government, he said, has informed Russia that in its opinion the best course would be to stand entirely aloof from the internal affairs of Persia, but, as Russia's frontier position might make such an attitude more difficult for her, the British Government would co-operate with Russia on certain lines, conditioned by the understanding that there could be no improvement in Persia without representative government. Great Britain would agree to advise the Shah to dismiss his reactionary advisers and summon able and energetic men to draft a scheme of representative government on an elective basis, and to inform him that unless he granted constitutional government he would get no support of any kind from Russia and Great Britain, who, on the contrary, would have to take measures to safeguard their interests. If, later on, a loan was considered necessary, the conditions would require careful consideration, and Great Britain would not consent to any advance unless approved by an elected Assembly. This is very re-assuring.

The election campaign in Italy is not yet either strenuous or exciting. The Government is putting no programme before the country, but relies partly on its control of the administrative machine, partly on its record—it has some good work to its credit—and partly on the steadiness of the political situation. The Opposition is not much more enterprising. The Constitutional or Conservative section, led by Baron Sonnino, clamors for heavy military and naval expenditure, a reform of taxation, and the maintenance of the Triple Alliance. It urges that the sane policy for Italy cannot be one of mere negation, whether the negation of clericalism, Socialism, militarism, or Freemasonry. The Socialists, of course, have their minimum programme, and they have decided to put up their own candidates wherever they have a chance of election, but, where not, to support the Radicals and Republicans. The Clericals still remain under the rules of the Papal decree, Non expedit. The Papacy will not have a Catholic party in Parliament, but in the exceptional cases where the intervention of a Catholic candidate is necessary to prevent the election of an enemy of the Church a Catholic may, with the approval of the bishop, offer himself, and receive the votes of the faithful. Some 26 Catholic candidates are standing, chiefly in Lombardy, Venetia, and Emilia, but these include Signor Romolo Murri, the Christian Democrat priest, who is in sympathy with the Socialists, and has been suspended by the Church.

Politics and Affairs.

THE BASIS OF SECURITY.

It is news of great relief to the Liberal Party that the Government, in strict harmony with the desire of the mass of their followers, are likely to prepare a moderate, rather than an excessive and alarming, programme of battleships for 1909. Had another issue been presented, there might have been no Liberal Party worth the name to deal with it. There is, we are afraid, little room for excessive congratulation. There must be an advance, and a serious advance, on last year's Estimates. There will be a reversion to the highest scale of "Dreadnought" building known to the Admiralty. And we may well doubt whether we have secured more than a brief respite from the alarms which closed the career of the greatest of Liberal leaders, and continually vexed his two last Governments. With this we must for the moment be content. The habit of forcing "scare" programmes on the nation by the dint of an extemporized Press campaign is engrained in the Admiralty, and only a vigorous personality at the head of the office, a man with powers of criticism and independent judgment, resolute to obtain a fit subordination of technique to policy, will stamp it out. On this subordination we hope that the Liberal Party in Parliament will insist. It is clearly necessary for the preservation, not only of the force of statesmanship, but of the rightful influence of the permanent official. If he insists on pressing the powers of agitation into his service on his own presentation of his case, he must come forward and stand the brunt of Parliamentary inquiry into the general range of his administration. The country must know what use he is making of its money; whether, in fact, he and his comrades are men fit to be entrusted with an order for so many battleships, and whether they can deliver their goods in due order and completeness. This is the answer to the demand of the "Times" that when an Admiral comes forward and says that he must have so many ships for the defence of the Channel, no question remains for statesmen but bare compliance. The statesman, and especially the Liberal statesman, has a right to reply: "How is it, then, that on every fresh demand on the Treasury you ask for more ships than you get, and are able to assure the nation of safety on the smaller number? How is it that by the wholesale scrapping of comparatively new ships you, from time to time, acknowledge errors of construction and judgment?" Such a reply is the answer of the head of a firm to his agents; and it is as servants, not as masters, that the soldiers and sailors will have to do their work in a democratic State.

This, we think, is the necessary attitude of a Liberal Government which declines to be crushed beneath the weight of social and military pressure. But we are by no means blind to the necessity of "national security," and to the close connection between it and the maintenance of a powerful and adequate fleet. To this object we would make three important concessions, for we recognise not only that the country must be safe, but that the commercial world must be convinced that it is safe, and must be protected from just such a panic as that to which its ungovernable "experts" periodically expose it. First we would keep the fleet superior to any "probable combination." Secondly, we would meet the special demand created by the new German rivalry by maintaining a superiority of, say, three to two in "Dreadnoughts," and accelerating our present rate of building them. Thirdly, without provocation, and with every attempt to secure an appeasement of the diplomatic situation with Germany, and a mutual restraint in armaments, we would meet a programme like that of the Germans, which extends over a series of years, with a similar programme, based on the standard of strength we have suggested. This is not the ground of a "fanatical" peace party, and within its bounds every element of abundant "security" is to be found. These points are not difficult to establish. They can be maintained by reference, not to organs of the peace party, but to the fairly careful and scientific statements of naval strength, based on the official figures, annually issued by the Navy League. Does this organisation, which stands in the forefront of the "big navy" school, admit safety on the basis of a programme of four "Dreadnoughts" this year? The answer is emphatically "Yes."

The facts as to the "Dreadnoughts" happily lie in a tolerably small compass. In an unhappy hour Sir John Fisher and his colleagues started the type, which they now use in such a manner as to destroy the popular belief in their judgment, for they act, or at least speak, as if it wiped out the earlier overwhelming superiority of our fleet. Germany only followed us and France and Japan and America, so that she cannot be accused of an attack on our naval supremacy, but only of an adoption of the type which we had declared indispensable to naval power. We secured our advantage. We began building in 1904. Germany practically started three years later. We finished our first "Dreadnought" in fourteen months, have a small fleet of these vessels actually at sea, are now building improved and enlarged types of them, and by the end of next year should have three squadrons of "Dreadnoughts" on service. Where does Germany stand? Her first "Dreadnoughts" were provided by the Estimates of 1906. Neither of these ships has yet been commissioned, both were delayed, and they may, or may not, be completed by the end of this year. By that time we shall have ten such vessels, including the two "Nelsons," on the seas.

At present, therefore, there is no rivalry or the shadow of rivalry. But we have what is popularly called the danger years of 1911 and 1912. We will assume that Germany builds at her fastest, and that not one accident occurs to qualify her speed of output. This, of course, is most improbable. Essen, says the "Navy League Annual," is a "hot-bed of trade unionism," and the materialisation of Germany's naval ambitions depends on the "good-will of the National Labor Party," which, we may add, strongly desires peace with England. But, assuming that everything German goes like clockwork, there will be in March, 1911, according to the "Navy League Annual," and every other naval authority that we know of, a proportion of fourteen British "Dreadnoughts" to nine German. But we will assume that the three battleships and one cruiser laid down this year will, a few months later, be completed and added to the German Navy. Against them we necessarily put our four ships, which we hope will this year be laid down earlier than usual. Even if the Admiralty is incapable of this exertion, and we allow for a late beginning of these vessels, we shall by the first months of 1912 possess eighteen "Dreadnoughts" to Germany's thirteen. There is, we know, a talk of a speeding up of German plans. But is it argued that our Admiralty, which built the first "Dreadnought" in a little over a year, is incapable of responding to such a stimulus? If it is, there must be something more at fault with its administration than Sir John Fisher might care to disclose. And if the suggestion be true, we have to make the additional criticism that the building of six "Dreadnoughts" within the stated period of twenty-four or thirty months would be even less within the compass of our constructors than the building of four, and the demand for an excess on that rate is blown into the air. It is one thing to say that we must have an adequate number of ships. It is quite another thing to pretend that they cannot be built, armed, and fitted with tolerable speed. In the one case Mr. McKenna might be held to account. In the other, we are afraid that Sir John Fisher and his colleagues would also have to answer for it.

But, indeed, we have only touched one part of our naval strength when we survey the special and, we admit, important problem of the "Dreadnoughts." Let us again take the Navy League as our guide, and reproduce its conclusions as to the relative strength of Great Britain and Germany in the years when the two Powers approach each other most nearly—namely, 1911 and 1912. Taking all the fighting types together, our authority gives us the following reassuring results for March, 1911:—

In Modern Battleships
Great Britain will have	...	63, of 958,130 tons.
Germany ,,	...	29, of 370,729 tons.
In Armored Cruisers
Great Britain will have	...	35, of 416,600 tons.
Germany ,,	...	9, of 93,345 tons.
In Protected Cruisers
Great Britain will have	...	48, of 240,520 tons.
Germany ,,	...	32, of 112,404 tons.
In Destroyers
Great Britain will have	... ...	78.
Germany ,,	... ...	78.
In First Class Torpedo Boats
Great Britain will have	... ...	49.
Germany ,,	... ...	0.
In Submarines
Great Britain will have	... ...	72.
Germany ,,	... ...	8.

To sum up, in battleships and armoured cruisers—or, let us say, in ships fit to fight in line of battle—Great Britain will, two years hence, possess 98 of 1,374,730 tons; Germany will have 38 of 464,074 tons; and her strength, combined with that of America, will but slightly exceed one million tons. In protected cruisers our strength will be more than double the German tonnage, while in torpedo craft it will be more than double in point of numbers. Is any process conceivable by which, twelve months later, this superiority can be turned into anything approaching equality? How are the additional men to be found and trained and the ships tried? In 1912 Germany will doubtless add three "Dreadnoughts" and one "Invincible" (nominal cruiser) to her strength in the "all-big"-gun class—i.e., the class which carries only 12-inch guns. But for that year the four "Dreadnoughts" which we shall construct will be available, and the 76,000 new tons of German leviathans will be balanced by an equal, or probably larger, addition to the mass of our own force in line of battle. The 1911 standard of comparison will, therefore, still obtain, and it may be added—though the comparison seems to us a false and useless one—that our own strength will probably yield us a substantial advantage, both in tonnage and in the number of battle units, over the combined navies of Germany and the United States.

We conclude, then, that a broad margin of complete naval "security" remains with us on the more reasonable programme to which we hope that the Government and the Admiralty will finally assent. What more can, or should, or will, a party do whose prime concern lies with the building up of the credit and commercial strength which its spendthrift predecessors laid low, and with the moral causes of European peace and social reform? To what authority in its past could it appeal for a different policy? What approach could it make to modern democracy, carrying in its hand the poisoned gifts of ambitious ascendancy over other European communities, and boundless extravagance in armaments? In policy how futile would it be, in view of the rapid growth of wealth and industrialism in America and Germany, to set still higher a scale of warlike expenditure, to which these powerful peoples would inevitably respond! In spirit how fatal would be the breach with the masters and guides of Liberalism! From such an error the Government has, we hope, been saved so as by fire, and we may well rejoice that even if its present course be beset with perils, it can lead neither to ruin nor to dishonor.

THE NEED FOR A EUROPEAN CONCERT.

For the third, or even the fourth, time in six months the Balkan crisis has reached a point at which sober students of international affairs are contemplating the possibility of war. Austrian statesmen have arrived at that rather deliberate phase of anger in which, looking into their own breasts, they feel bound to announce that within a period, variously measured in days or weeks, they will quite certainly lose their patience with Servia. To onlookers it has naturally occurred that a passion subject to such nice prediction might conceivably be controlled, with the help of a little pressure from outside. France, which has for some months been sincerely anxious to bridge the absolute gulf that divides Europe into two hostile camps, suggested, for the second time in this crisis, a joint mediation by the three disinterested Powers—England, France, and Germany—at Vienna and Belgrade. It was the first condition of success that Germany should be willing to co-operate, and Germany has refused. She was quite willing to take her part in lecturing the Servians—to be lectured by Great Powers is the daily lot of all small nations. But she would not join in urging Austria to offer adequate compensations. Once more the attempt to restore the reality of the European Concert has failed. No Conference can be got together. No mediation appears to have much prospect of being accepted. Europe is paying in this deplorable impotence the accumulated consequences of five years of restless high politics, in which the unappeasable conflict of two firmly-organised groups of Powers has destroyed all sense of fraternity and confidence. The chances of peace and war appear to turn on a series of nice calculations as to which ally might at a moment of trial desert her obligations. If Austria attacked Servia, would Russia intervene? If Russia intervened, would Germany also go to war? And if Germany went to war, would all Europe join in the conflict between the Triple Alliance and the Triple Entente? It is hardly too much to say that it is this universal doubt and suspicion as to the loyalty of allies and friends which alone suffices to preserve peace.

It is not at all difficult to understand the irritation of Vienna against Belgrade. Servia, by daring to resent the annexation of Bosnia, has undoubtedly put Austria to considerable trouble and expense. She has to maintain a large force on a war footing, in order to watch the Servian and Montenegrin frontiers, and to terrorise the Bosnians, who only await a favorable moment to revolt. All this costs money, but, above all, it is an offence to Imperial pride that it has month after month to watch inactive the outspoken anger of a little people whom it despises, much as our own purple party despised the Boers. Empires will pour out money like water to meet the rivalry of a strong Power, but they are all economists when it is from a puny nation that the menace comes. We can understand the mood, without sympathising with it. Austria is only paying the price of her own disregard of treaties. She chose to achieve by a coup de main what she could certainly have obtained by negotiation. It is salutary that she should discover that violent methods are in the end neither prompt nor cheap.

The position of Servia is only too tragically clear. It is easy to sneer at the truculence of her Crown Prince and her Press. It is easy to discredit the primitive, yet corrupt, little coteries which govern Belgrade. But, at all events, her wild words are not the froth of a city crowd which would hesitate to make them good. Servia would fight to-day as recklessly as she did in 1876, and the Montenegrins are not much beyond the plane of civilisation of the Afghans, who live with no ideal save prowess in the field. Behind it all is a peasantry which contrives, in spite of politics, to live happily, and to nourish a passionate patriotism on the land which it owns. The issue which both branches of the Servian race is facing to-day is nothing less than the conservation of its independence. Landlocked and hemmed in, Servia finds herself exposed in every crisis to the economic dictation of her Austrian neighbor. An intimation in Vienna that "swine-fever" is raging in Servia suffices to close her only foreign market, and to menace her peasantry with ruin. "Swine-fever" is a name which Austrian statesmen apply to any passion for independence among Servians. The little kingdom keeps her integrity only by selling it—only, that is to say, by submitting to the alternate dictation of Austria and Russia, even in her most intimate concerns. While Bosnia was still in name a Turkish province, and Macedonia seemed open to partition, it was possible for an imaginative people to cherish hopes. But the same summer saw both these outlets closed. Bosnia has been annexed; Macedonia has been pacified. In demanding some economic arrangement which will give her exports a free outlet on the Adriatic, Servia is making her last bid for a real independence. It might, we think, be satisfied without a territorial re-arrangement—a free port and a neutralised railway are not impossible expedients. On one point let there be no delusion—Servia has little to lose even by the most desperate course. If she receives compensation she remains small, poor, isolated, but free, and renounces all thought of a union with the Serbs, who are under Austrian rule. If she fights, and is absorbed by Austria, it is about as certain as anything in politics can be, that a united Servian kingdom, a third in the now dual Monarchy, must ultimately be constituted. If such a solution could be achieved without war it would be of all the best. The real obstacle to it is much more the jealousy of Russian Pan-Slavism than the interests of the Serbs themselves.

It is, we think, a misfortune for the Servians that their cause has been so hotly espoused by Russian Chauvinism. This it is which has made the whole controversy something more than a mere Balkan tangle—a capital issue between the two European groups. The Russians are manifestly thinking much more of their rooted antagonism to Germany than of the interests of their Servian clients. While that mood endures it is difficult to induce an atmosphere in which mediation can be applied, or a disinterested consideration of the problem on its merits attained. The ideal, for which M. Delcassé and Lord Lansdowne were first responsible, of rehabilitating Russia as a Great Power, was unluckily ill-timed. Europe would have been to-day a happier Continent if they and their successors had agreed to wait until Russia became as a preliminary a Liberal Power. Her recent indignation at the Franco-German détente, her conduct in Persia, and her premature recognition of Prince Ferdinand's personal ambitions, are all advertisements of the difficulty of co-operating with her in any loyal policy for the general good. There is still no hopeful way of escape save by mediation or a conference. Either solution requires the active aid of Germany. There can be no Europe from which she is excluded. To restore the concert by conciliating Germany is for England and France an interest more vital than the rehabilitation of Russia.

THE REMAINING WORK OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The inexorable course of events has put the Government to a rather severe test. To have taken up the challenge of the Peers and brought the "dominating issue" to a test would have required the plain, straightforward courage of the soldier. To have accepted the insult in silence in order to continue unimpeded the great work of Liberalism would have required the higher courage of the Christian. But to combine the two attitudes, to take up the gauntlet and yet postpone the fight, to denounce the Lords as usurpers and yet accept the constitutional position which they have laid down, to proclaim the issue dominant and still refrain from contesting it, argues a union of qualities to the height of which no known system of ethics has yet risen. It is difficult to measure the effort which it must have cost the Prime Minister to explain that when he spoke of the constitutional question as the dominating issue, he meant merely that it had dominated the Liberal Party for twenty years. He might, indeed, have elaborated the theme, and, but for its painful nature, would doubtless have done so. He might have pointed out that in the sphere of legislation the Lords have now all but reduced two Liberal Governments to a nullity; that for twenty years no first-class Liberal measure outside finance has found its way into the Statute-book; that the destruction of the last Liberal Government and the débâcle which followed it, were due to the discredit and disorganisation resulting from those failures. He might have added that, as the issue has dominated Liberalism for twenty years past, so on the present lines there is every reason to expect that it will dominate it for twenty years to come. When Mr. Asquith told us that this was the dominant issue, we innocently supposed him to mean that it was an issue asking for a decision—an issue to which all others were to be subordinated. Not a bit of it. The issue was only dominant in the sense in which it long has been, and long will be, dominant; that is to say, in the sense that it reduces Liberal legislation to a nullity and Liberal promises to a farce.

However, rightly or wrongly, the decision is taken. The victory of the House of Lords is, for the moment, complete. No organic social reforms will now be possible except such as can be compassed by financial measures. It remains to consider what great public objects remain of which, under these conditions, the Liberal Party can still be the instrument. From this point of view no sincere politician will give any weight to such measures as the Welsh Disestablishment Bill. Under existing conditions the debating of this measure will be a mere academic exercise, and when we find Welsh leaders, instead of concentrating all their attention on the constitutional issue, demanding that this Bill should be brought forward, without the smallest prospect of becoming law, we are tempted to doubt the genuineness of the feeling for Disestablishment in Wales. If that feeling were strong and intelligently directed, it would not demand an academic and unreal discussion. It would urge practical measures towards its realisation. He who does not will the means does not effectively will the end, and no rational end can accrue from a foredoomed measure of Disestablishment, which, for all the relief it will give Wales, might just as well be introduced into the Hampstead Parliament.

There remains for legislation the question of social reforms in connection with the Poor Law Reports. This is a field in which the Lords, our masters—let us accustom ourselves by every means to the truth—are sometimes graciously pleased to make concessions. Possibly we may redeem our barren years by efforts in this direction. Unfortunately the King's Speech does not carry us very far on this point. The immediate question is: what can be done for the unemployed? On this head the Speech promises us Labor Exchanges. Labor Exchanges, taken alone, will not carry us very far towards a solution. A network of such exchanges was, indeed, contemplated by the Unemployment Act of 1905, and, as the Minority Report points out, it is by the default of the Local Government Board that such a system does not already exist. Administrative zeal in place of obstruction from high quarters is the thing mainly needed in this direction. But there is more to be said. As the "axis" of a comprehensive scheme for dealing with unemployment in all its phases, the Labor Exchange may be of considerable value. If it is to serve, for example, as one means of testing the genuine unemployed, and giving a trustworthy measure of the mass of distress that has to be dealt with, and if then we have means, whether through public works or, as the Minority of the Commissioners suggest, through some system of industrial training, of providing for those who are left on our hands, then indeed it may be a valuable contribution to the most difficult of social questions. Standing alone, it is of less avail. More valuable contributions to the problem would be found in a scheme of insurance, which will, at least in part, meet the case of the skilled trade unionist, or in a scheme of afforestation, which will be a first step towards the further regulation of the labor market, or, again, in raising the age of industrial employment for youths and girls, which will tend to block up one source of recruitment for the class of unemployable. If the time remaining to this Parliament is to be utilised for a serious effort towards social reform, we must expect the Government to grapple with such questions as these.

But, apart from constructive work, a Liberal Government may be held to justify its existence by resistance to positive measures of reaction. At the present moment the tide presses strongly towards Tariff Reform, and still more strongly towards militarism. Let us see how the Government stands in relation to these forces. If the Unionist Government were in power, we should undoubtedly have an attempt to establish Tariff Reform, but we should be a vigorous and united Liberal Opposition. The danger of the present situation is that some of our own leading men may make concessions to the Tariff Reform principle which, during the coming years of opposition, may prejudice the fighting power of the party. The danger is still more urgent in relation to the question of militarism. A Unionist Government would build six "Dreadnoughts" without hesitation, but it might be held back by a determined Liberal Opposition. That Opposition, however, will be paralysed from the outset if the party when in power itself sets the example of increasing the Navy beyond the limits of the dreams of Jingoism. Again, if the Unionists were in power they might very possibly take some steps towards compulsory military service. Nothing, under ordinary circumstances, would be so stoutly or so successfully resisted by a Liberal Opposition. But suppose that a Liberal Minister of War has himself, unrebuked by the party or the Cabinet, taken or sanctioned the first steps in that direction. With what face is the party in future to denounce the principle of compulsion if it quietly acquiesces when its own Minister publicly approves compulsion by employers? Surely a conscriptionist might rejoin that if there is to be compulsion at all it is far better that it should be State compulsion, regular, impartial, and deliberately accepted by the people, than that it should be a hole-and-corner compulsion, exercised on unfortunate clerks through irresponsible employers, who may not even be Englishmen by blood. Had the most pessimistic critic of Liberalism three years ago prophesied that compulsion of this kind would be sanctioned by a Liberal Minister before this Parliament ended, we should have said that in the present House of Commons no such Minister could after such a blunder have retained office for a week. But in those days we were fresh from Opposition. All we have now to say is that Liberalism, being shorn of much of its power of constructive legislation, has now to justify itself largely by strenuousness in resistance to evil tendencies, and that if it fails us here, we shall encounter at the next election something worse than a party defeat. We shall have inaugurated a second reign of reaction.

SOME FATUITIES OF PROTECTION.

The rules of the game doubtless required that two valuable Parliamentary days last week should be given to a bout of tariff controversy. The dominance of the issue in the Opposition programme needed formal reiteration, and Mr. Balfour's "zeal for righteousness" must be once more put in evidence. But as a display of controversial tactics, the debate was singularly ineffective. Intended partly as a general parade of Tariff Reform arguments, partly as a special opportunity for advertising Protection as the cure for unemployment, it floundered in hopeless confusion between these two inconsistent purposes. Preference, Retaliation, Revenue, and Protection were continually tripping one another up, and needed a more skilful drill-sergeant than Mr. Bonar Law to draw them into line. But when they were set to march along with the new popular recruit, "Tariff as a cure for Unemployment," the embarrassment became ludicrous. In the first place, Mr. Balfour damned their new champion with the faintest of negative acknowledgments. "No such expectations have been held out by any leader of the party, so far as I know, that this particular question of unemployment, or any other question, is going in our complex social system to be wholly healed by any such arrangement or rearrangement of our tariff system." Indeed, Mr. Balfour doubtless recognises clearly that the objects on which his own tepid enthusiasm is set are utterly at variance with the new popular appeal. Colonial Preference may increase employment in Saskatchewan, as Mr. Lloyd George shrewdly pointed out, but can do nothing for the British working man, except put up the price of his bread. Retaliation can only be effectively applied against high protective countries by duties upon raw materials, which must injure British trades and reduce employment. Tariff for revenue must let in foreign goods in order to collect the tax, and is pro tanto an ineffective instrument for increasing home employment, which, according to the orthodox protective reasoning, depends upon the exclusion, not the taxation, of foreign goods. The only novelty of the debate (apart from the revelation of the division between those who would and those who would not tax Colonial wheat) consisted in the formal introduction to the House of several weird arguments upon the economics of employment which have made successful débuts upon the provincial stage.

Mr. Austen Chamberlain, on the authority of a well-known figure-finder, propounded the extraordinary doctrine that, as a nation, we were passing rapidly from "productive" to "unproductive" occupations, pointing his contention by the feigned accuracy of percentages. We presume that Mr. Chamberlain alludes to the familiar fact that certain groups of industries, such as mining, building, transport and distributive trade, have, in recent years, been absorbing a larger proportion of our workers, while the staple manufactures and agriculture have been employing a smaller proportion. If, to the intelligence of Mr. Austen Chamberlain, railroads, docks, warehouses and shops, and the whole labor apparatus for moving and distributing goods, rank as "unproductive," we can hardly hope to persuade him to the contrary. There was once a school of economists to whom agriculture was the only really "productive" employment. But we do not imagine that he will ply this particular "argument" with much effect before audiences at Liverpool, Crewe, Derby, or in the City. Mr. Wyndham, indeed, seemed on the track of a similarly profound discovery in his statistical investigations, which disclosed the alarming fact that our three leading manufacturing industries, cotton, iron and steel, and woollen and worsted, are not expanding in the proportion they contribute to our export trade, and that our exports are containing a larger proportion of raw materials and partly manufactured goods. These gentlemen must entertain a curious notion of a progressive industrial State which is to employ as large an increase of its labor-power in those industries to which new mechanical economies are applicable as in those where they are not, and in which all the vast supply of new wants for the home markets and for foreign trade is furnished without any disturbance of the relative preponderance of the staple manufactures. Does it never occur to them that the enormous increase of material goods, due to improvements in the extractive and primary manufacturing processes, necessitates an ever-increasing proportion of employment in the subsidiary and secondary industries, and particularly in those concerned with the transport and marketing of the enlarged mass of wealth?

A graver, because a more insidious, fallacy underlies the attack to which Mr. Wyndham, and, we regret to say, Mr. Balfour, lent themselves in suggesting that the large investment of British capital abroad was injurious to trade and the employment of labor in this country. An excellent practical answer was supplied by Mr. Winston Churchill, who pointed out that the periods in which the largest flow of British capital went into foreign investments were those of greatest prosperity and of fullest employment at home. The contention that this capital, if it had not been able to find more remunerative foreign investments, would have been used at home in giving more employment to British labor, is absolutely false. There is no lack during a trade depression of any form of industrial capital. During such a period of trade distress as that through which we have been passing, unemployed labor has been confronted by unemployed capital in equal excess, factories, machinery, and other plant closed or working short time, ample available supplies of materials, and loanable capital at a cheap rate for any business man who can show a probability of using it for profitable production. The capital that goes abroad, either in good times or bad, does so because it is not needed here. It is a "surplus," seeking a vent elsewhere instead of remaining to congest a home market already fully supplied. The protective temper is a constant breeding-ground of novel fallacies, but this notion that "the amount of capital going abroad was a loss" is quite a "record" of fatuity. Protectionists actually represent the interest upon these foreign investments, the surplus imports which come to us chiefly in the shape of wheat, sugar, cotton, hides, and the like, as inflicting injuries upon the British industries whose raw materials they cheapen, and upon British workers whose real wages they enhance by lowering the prices for foods and other commodities which they consume.

It is, of course, quite true that a constant flow of British capital has spread over the industrial world, developing railways, mines, manufactures, and other industries, not only in raw, backward countries, but in civilised states which have thereby been enabled to "compete" with us in their own, our own, and neutral markets. To those who are obsessed by the inveterate falsehood that international commerce is fundamentally an antagonism of national interests instead of a co-operation, this may appear a terrible admission. But for Free Traders it ranks as the finest testimony to the efficacy of their policy that under it the prosperity of British industry has been so great that its savings suffice, not merely to furnish the full requirements of our own expanding businesses, but to open up new rich resources in all parts of the world. Thereby we stimulate a continual growth of the capacity of foreign peoples to purchase our products. By this process they are always sending us larger and more regular supplies of the materials we require for the effective development of our home industries and the improvement in quantity and quality of the standard of consumption of all classes of our population.

Life and Letters.

THE LIFE OF A ROMAN CITIZEN.

Two civilisations—and two only—have established peace and comfort in Western Europe. They were separated by a catastrophe of centuries, occupied by the evening, the night, and the dawn. The imagination has still some difficulty in swinging itself across that huge gulf of time, to reconstruct an age in many respects parallel to, in some things in advance of, our own. We still read into the days of its glory the subsequent tragedy of its decline, and cannot believe that in the splendor of the Imperial peace men were not afflicted by the feeling of frost in the air, heralding the approach of Autumn. To many observers the credulity and superstition of the world which emerged but slowly from the great overthrow is read back into that secure and established and sceptical society which preceded it; and the people amongst whom Christianity first came are but little distinguished from the people who had been terrified into fears and tremblings by generations of calamity, until they came to believe in all grotesque and marvellous fancies. But the Rome into which intruded this and other Eastern faiths was a city which had run through the whole scale of human beliefs and ideals until it had become tired of them all. It had sought virtue. It had sought pleasure. It had sought renunciation. It had tried Democracy, Aristocracy, Absolutism. It had experimented in Republicanism and Socialism. It had even believed (for a time) in the religion of humanity. It had settled down at first to modest, afterwards to more feverish enjoyment of a world which at last had swallowed all the formulas. It had achieved that ideal of intelligence and security to which we are struggling, which we have not yet completely attained. It could not conceive that it could ever be moved, while already there could be heard in the shadow the sound of the forces which were to ensure its destruction.

Dr. Dill, in his fascinating volume, has revealed the intimate life of this civilisation at two periods—in the height of the Imperial peace, when a material progress for the first time found itself in supremacy untroubled by discomforts or religions; and again in the last century of the Western Empire, when already, had they known it, the end was come. Mr. Warde Fowler, in "Social Life at Rome in the Age of Cicero" (Macmillan) carries the study a little earlier—to the period when the Imperialism is on the road to consummation, and the comfort is already becoming assured. It is a period extraordinarily resembling our own. There are differences, indeed, in manners and organisation which might seem to present insuperable divergences. The dependence of wealth upon slave labor, the occupation in the armies of so much of the best life of the city, the absence of much mechanical ingenuity, might seem sharply to distinguish this first experiment in civilisation from its successor. It is doubtful, however, if these are other than superficial distinctions. A proletariat in modern society is still essentially enslaved to the forces of hunger and cold. Fighting may not at times have been a severer drain than our present armaments or the demand for rulership made by an Empire of four hundred millions. And to the soul of man the driving of a motor car along the Thames Embankment or of a chariot along the Appian Way are essentially similar, essentially irrelevant. The points of resemblance are certainly far more noticeable: sudden wealth sucked in from the provinces and conquered dominions to the heart of the Imperial rule; the slow and steady, if almost imperceptible, decay of the popular religion; and a pursuit of pleasure common to all classes, to whom the old austere obligations of duty and service appear tedious and unreal. A population of half a million at least (a surprisingly low estimate) is crowded on these little hills and valleys by the banks of the Tiber. At the top of the social order is the old "governing class," in the middle the new plutocracy—merchants, bankers, money changers; below them stretch the masses of the common people. The more luxury and extravagant display increased amongst the wealthy, the more was excited an envy and discontent amongst the poor. Mr. Fowler laments the absence of a Mr. Charles Booth to provide us with exact data of comparison between the poverty of the ancient world and of our own. Essentially the attitude of the "haves" to the "have nots" has not changed. "The statesman, if he troubled himself about them at all, looked on them as a dangerous element of society, only to be considered as human beings at election time; at all other times merely as animals to be fed, in order to keep them from becoming an active peril."

Mr. Fowler is not surprised that even the best men of that age—Cicero, Cæsar, Lucretius—show hardly any sign of sympathy with, or interest in, that vast mass of suffering humanity, both bond and free, with which the Roman dominion was populated. "To disregard misery, except when they found it amongst the privileged classes, had become second nature to them. We can better realise this if we reflect that even at the present day, in spite of the absence of slavery and the presence of philanthropical societies, the average man of wealth gives hardly more than a passing thought to the discomfort and distress of the crowded populations of our great cities." What little we know of the "populace" is but of their occasional appearance in riot or revolution, protesting for a moment in the upper air before the hatches are battened down on them again. So, indeed, appear the "populace" in all ages—Nineveh, Jerusalem, Rome, England of the "forties," Chicago of to-day. They were housed in "block dwellings" like the people of Bethnal Green; huge "insulae," three or four stories high, owned by men of capital, who found a safe investment in the increasing "ground rents" of a growing city. They were almost entirely vegetarians, living principally upon the corn which came to be freely distributed by the Government at first under cost price, and later at no price at all. They drank water, and differed from the modern proletariat in being practically unacquainted with intoxicating liquors: although, when possible, they mixed their water with a little wine. They organised themselves in guilds of workers: and in Rome of the first century, as in London of the twentieth, they gradually passed from "productive" to "unproductive" labor as the demands of wealth, in a city living upon the tribute and interest of all lands—capital "invested abroad"—sought to spend that wealth on the apparatus of comfort and pleasure.

The keynote of the age, however, is less any change in the condition of the poor than the rise into wealth of the now successful commercial classes. "Nothing is more astonishing than the vast sums of money in the hands of individuals, and the enormous sums lent and borrowed in private by the men whose names are familiar to us as statesmen." They made money by land speculation first; by loans to the municipalities; by cheating their neighbors; by letting out gladiators on hire; by buying slaves; by all the methods, scarcely changed but in appearance, by which the modern world makes money to-day. Indemnities paid by conquered peoples, and the booty brought home by victorious generals, and the subsequent plunder wrung out of the new territories by able Pro-Consuls, formed a source of plentiful revenues. "The remarkable fact about this inpouring of wealth is its extraordinary suddenness," as sudden as the inpouring between the early Victorian Age in England and the first decade of the new century. The wisest of observers "saw clearly that the sudden influx of wealth was disturbing the balance of the Roman mind, and that the desire to make money was taking the place of the idea of duty to a State." Huge joint-stock companies arose, managed by the successful men of business, in which there was a universal demand for shares. The Forum in Cicero's letters was the centre of the life of Rome. "Going down to the Forum was the equivalent of 'going into the city,' as well as of 'going down to Westminster.'" Nor were Westminster and the City any farther apart than in Imperial Britain. For in this, as in all Imperialisms, politics were not disconnected from finance, and the appeal to Imperial sentiment became also an appeal to particular greed. Cicero, in urging extraordinary powers for Pompeius for the driving of Mithridates from Roman Asia, dwells on the necessity for preserving the province, "not only to the State, but to innumerable private citizens who had their money invested in its revenues." "Believe me," he declares—it might have been a speech at a gold mining company meeting before the South African war—"the whole system of credit and finance which is carried on here at Rome in the Forum, is inextricably bound up with the revenues of the Asiatic province. If those revenues are destroyed, our whole system of credit will come down with a crash." He invites them energetically to prosecute a war by which "the glory of the Roman name, the safety of our allies, our most valuable revenues, and the fortunes of innumerable citizens, will be effectually preserved."

The ancient theologians had more to say for themselves than at first appeared, in their affirmation that all knowledge of human history could be read in the record of one tiny race of men. They emerge in simplicities and pieties. They attain success in a hard struggle against nature and external foes. Success breeds arrogance, security, and love of pleasure. They quarrel amongst themselves for the booty. They settle down in contentment to enjoy this world. Their search for pleasure, always unsatisfied, passes from a moderation to a delirium. They are compelled to pronounce it all dust and vanity. They pass, and another race succeeds. No one who has walked through those silent streets which lie under the shadow of Vesuvius which overwhelmed them, and reveal, too naked to be shamed, the private life of a dead age, but is impressed with the extraordinary resemblance it bears to our own. Here are curious instruments of ease and comfort, pleasant houses and gardens, the decorated bathrooms and theatres, and arenas for the communal games. Here are even the evidences of the tiny conveniences of a refined social life, stepping stones to preserve from the mud of the streets, sockets for the torches, injunctions to voters on the walls, addresses inscribed to wife or to child. The prophets were there also, endeavoring to stimulate to action and indignation a people who (as to-day) applauded and passed by, wondering what all the pother was about, or agreeing that the teaching was very salutary to the times. Vicarious sport replaced military service, and the "Englishman's Home," with but verbal variation, might have attracted similar approval by a similar audience in Pompeii as at Wyndham's Theatre. "Gradually," says Mr. Fowler, "as vast sums of money were laid out by capitalists, and even by senators, upon the horses and drivers, the color factions increased in numbers, and their rivalry came to occupy men's minds as completely as do now the chances of football teams in our own manufacturing towns." The temples of the national religion were neglected. Men, in a society more and more completely sceptical, found themselves involved in the worship of strange gods. Some advocated that the historic and established faith should still be maintained by the upper classes, if only as an example to the poor. Wild men, like Lucretius, seeing men fearing death and fearing the gods, overvaluing life and yet weary of it, denounced them all. Finally, the orthodox religion was merged in a worship of Imperial rule. And the Roman civilisation crowned itself with flowers and called itself immortal, while already the barbarians were at its gates. The adventure into this distant world recalls inevitably the conclusion of "Les Pingouins": with its passionate, ironical summary of the sweeps and cycles of human life, and each successive conquering society thinking itself to have attained the secret of earthly immortality before being swept itself into the silence which has engulfed them all.

THE DIAL IN PARADISE.

In spite of all its water, Hammersmith does not sound much of a place for William Morris. But, apart from Hammersmith, one might almost think a Providence had arranged the most suitable scenes for him to live in, and had purposely set him there. The skirts of Epping Forest, long before they were cut to the municipal pattern, hung round his boyhood an interwoven tapestry of greens and purples. Close to his school at Marlborough stood another forest, the most beautiful now left in England, and the open downs under the sunset were scattered with vast grey stones and other vestiges of departed men. Oxford followed, still a medieval city when he was up, breathing with ancient life, untainted as yet by the red-brick suburbs of marriage and the pretty parodies of his later self. Then came the decorated Kentish house, and London, which also has a history, and was once small and white and clean. But the most benign provision of his destiny came last.

Where the Cotswolds shut out the wildness of the Severn, the early Thames runs through a broad and little-known valley, in which seven centuries have hardly altered the shape of the meadows. It is a deep and fertile country, fragrant as a cow's breath—a land of deep and quiet waters moving between banks of agrimony, loosestrife, and scented flags. Willows stand along the watercourses too, but the country's tree is the heavy elm, clustered about the old farmhouses, or in single file along the hedges round the corn. Grey watermills, with dark bridges and tunnels, span the streams, and beside the main river ancient villages stand around spires and churches designed by long-forgotten village builders. Cricklade, Kemsford, Lechlade—names full of quiet ancestry—bring us to Kelmscott and the many-gabled house. A quiet and abundant land, sheltered from wildness, plentiful in trees and water, and deeply rooted in a happy past—that was the scene which, of all others, one would have chosen as symbolic of Morris and his genius. It was more fitting even than the streams and sweet fertility of Touraine, in which one has sometimes imagined him placed. For, exuberant though Morris was, his was not the exuberance of Rabelais or of Balzac, who dominate Touraine. In spite of all his Celtism, Scandinavianism, and the rest—or rather just because of those deep strains in our blood—Morris remained essentially English, and we imagine him best among the English associations of that old, but gentle, meadowland.

He was, as Mr. William Yeats has said in his essay on "The Happiest of the Poets"—he was the poet of abundance rather than intensity. In all the beautiful work of his mature life, he never again approached the intensity of his youthful volume, "The Defence of Guenevere"—such intensity as is shown in the ballad beginning:—

> "Had she come all the way for this,
> To part at last without a kiss?
> Yea, had she borne the dirt and rain
> That her own eyes might see him slain
> Beside the haystack in the floods?"

Or, again, the intensity of the invocation, faulty in rhyme, but still the finest lyric he ever wrote—the invocation in the same early volume, beginning:—

> "Pray but one prayer for me 'twixt thy closed lips; > Think but one thought of me up in the stars."

In his favorite scenes there is no torture of unendurable passion, no thought or emotion that would leap beyond the flaming ramparts of the world; but we see rather some picture full of lovely colors and the ease of satisfied desire in mind and body. As Mr. Yeats has said:—

> "Now it is a picture of some great room full of merriment, now of the wine-press, now of the golden threshing-floor, now of an old mill among apple-trees, now of cool water after heat of the sun, now of some well-sheltered, well-tilled place among woods or mountains, where men and women live happily, knowing of nothing that is too far off or too great for the affections."

Outside that first volume, there is so little intensity in his work that hardly a single line can be quoted. Even in the first volume the scenes he loved to dwell upon were like that picture of brooding peace at the beginning of "Golden Wings":—

> "Midways of a wallèd garden,
> In the happy poplar land,
> Did an ancient castle stand,
> With an old knight for a warden.
> "Many scarlet bricks there were
> In its walls, and old grey stone;
> Over which red apples shone
> At the right time of the year."

In the touch of affected simplicity in the last line, as in the calm beauty of the whole description, running on for many stanzas, we see exactly what Morris was to become, and the kind of influence he was to have. We see the germ of all the pretty crimes committed in his name—the over-decoration, the expensive simplicity, the self-conscious picturesqueness, the deadly imitation that we still behold in the suburbs of culture. But we also see the ideal of happiness that was to remain with him to the end—a beautiful ideal, full of that "passion of the past" which, indeed, inspired it. He had before him always a land of streams and meadows, marked by buildings scarlet and grey, set in walled gardens—a land of "whispering trees in homely places, where the children play." He never wavered far from that ideal, and it is significant that, when in "News from Nowhere," he struggled to describe the Utopia of his so-called Socialism, he tired of economics long before the end, and wandered off into a charming account of the Upper Thames and Kelmscott, as they would be when all men and women were the kind of people he liked, and could employ their time in his own charming manner.

That was where his first trouble came in. He was, in his very essence, a happy man, and he would so much have liked all men and women to be as happy as himself, but they evidently were not. In nearly all the arts he was a master craftsman, preserving the sanity that the work of the hand always ensures, and composing his mental works with much the same ease of mechanism as his tapestries. Joy in labor was for him the first necessity of life, and as he was always an artist and always rich, it came to himself quite naturally. But to others it did not come, and, do what he would, he could not remain blind and deaf to the immense misery of the present manufacturing world. That was the basis of all his later Socialism—the knowledge that the enormous majority of civilised mankind is occupied upon industry without art and without pleasure. In later life the pain of this knowledge possessed him, but, as Mr. Alfred Noyes rightly observes in his book on "William Morris" (English Men of Letters, Macmillan), the origin of this sympathetic unhappiness may be seen much earlier. Speaking of the "Life and Death of Jason," Mr. Noyes says:—

> "It contains perhaps the first indication in his poetry that his mind was turning to the social problems with which he was soon to busy himself, and it shows from what direction he was approaching them. It is his first cry against 'the smoky net of unrejoicing labor.'"

He beheld modern England "meshed within the smoky net of unrejoicing labor," and the horror of the contrast between that sight and the bright vision he had formed of a Chaucerian England drove him, rather reluctantly, into his long and heroic efforts for social revolution. There was a time when Social Democrats used to claim William Morris as "a robust disciple of Karl Marx," but there was no scientific theorising and no pedantry in Morris's Socialism. The present writer often heard him in the earliest days of the movement, when he used to speak in the smudgy halls of Clerkenwell and similar districts for the "Democratic Federation," as it was then called, before the Socialist League was founded, or the "Commonweal" thought of. And it was always the voice of a sympathetic artist, keenly alive to the beauty and pleasure of the world, violently scornful of the rich who lived like swine, incapable of the beauty and pleasure he knew so well, and violently sorrowful at the misery of the working people, into whose lives such beauty and pleasure could never come. Joy was necessary for him, but the sense of community in joy was equally necessary. Of the theories and statistics and abstractions of dogmatic Socialism there was hardly a word, or, if Morris mentioned them at all, he sank at once to the pathetic level of a child repeating the dates of kings since "William the Conqueror, 1066."

The degradation and joylessness of the working people haunted him; they drove him to personal sacrifices in scenes that he abhorred; they forced him to gospels of equality when all his nature as artist cried aloud for variety of life. But, perhaps more than by the misery of the world, he was haunted by common death. Death was the shadow on the dial standing in the midst of the fair garden into which his desire transformed existence. There stood the ancient house of Life, lovely with mellowed walls and mysterious hangings; beyond the sunlit garden a living stream of white and purple water turned a mill-wheel half hidden under grey arches; beyond the stream one heard the hum of joyful labor and the pleasant chaffering of the cheapingstead, while up and down the garden and the street comely women moved, fit for motherhood and unquestioning desire. But always upon the dial's face that shadow crept noiselessly, and houses fell and women faded and artists died. The fairer the world, the more poignant was the regret, and ever in the midst of the garden, as to the Roman poet, a voice kept crying, "Thou shalt go! Thou shalt go! Nor will any of the trees but the deathly cypress follow their shortlived lord." All through the earthly paradise of Morris's wholesome and exquisite nature we hear that haunting voice. In his sweetest lyrics, when for the moment he almost rises to passion, it is there:—

> "In the white-flowered hawthorn-brake,
> Love, be merry for my sake;
> Twine the blossoms in my hair,
> Kiss me where I am most fair—
> Kiss me, love! for who knoweth
> What thing cometh after death?"

It is the old cry of that other Roman poet in his youth: "Suns may set and can arise again; but when once our brief day has set, we two shall sleep together in everlasting night. Kiss me a thousand times and then a hundred, and then another thousand times, and then a second hundred." So the shadow on the dial still moved on, haunting the beautiful world that the soul of Morris had created, and Mr. Noyes gives us a characteristic saying when he observes that the only philosophic utterance Morris ever made about the matter was that perhaps change and death were necessary, or there would be no good stories.

AN ANGLICAN BISHOP.

Even good Churchmen, with a genuine spiritual sympathy with ecclesiasticism, must sometimes find a little piquancy in the status and functions of an Anglican bishop in our twentieth century life. Among the people at large—nominal Churchmen, Dissenters, or indifferents—his gaitered person as he moves about the streets arouses an interest mainly archæological, but carrying some tinge of magical feeling, mixed with the reverence due to rank. Probably a bishop's net influence in the moral ordering of our national life, extensive and intensive, though still considerable, is weakening, less from any spread of rationalism or other definite rejection of his spiritual authority than from a not irreverent humor which plays upon the incongruity of his position and claims in the new social order. Can any people moving towards self-government in politics, industry, education, and other modes of self-control in which authority emanates from a number of individual wills, break off from the unity of this collective life a sphere of spiritual conduct, and hand it over to the governance of a little group of men claiming to wield divine powers, magically transmitted? We are not here concerned with the radical issue between self-government and traditional oligarchy as modes of maintaining social order and securing social progress. We are rather thinking of the bizarre character which acceptance of the first principle in other departments of conduct imposes on the position of spiritual authority claimed for a church and impersonated in her bishops. This contradiction by no means exhausts the sense of incongruity. There are other aspects. The survival of a caste of holy men, living out of "the world" an ascetic life, devoted entirely to the acquisition and use of spiritual powers, has always been accepted as a specialisation of tastes and gifts rather than as an incongruity. Even the Roman Church, with all its tampering with temporal power and its material magnificence, has maintained the forms and in a large degree the substance of the severance from the world for its priesthood. To liberal reflective minds an English bishop, with a wife and family, living in a house termed a "palace," and ranking as a peer of the realm, who at the same time claims to be the repository of spiritual powers handed on from the persons of Galilean fishermen, is hardly an intelligible being. Yet he exists, and can be made intelligible by a sufficiently skilful interpreter.

In a singularly clever little volume entitled "A Bishop's Letters" (Mowbray & Co.), the Rev. T. A. Lacey performs this feat for us. It is an admirable piece of self-portraiture in fiction, conveying through a sympathetic medium a convincing image of a good English bishop of to-day, without an apparent touch of conscious satire or exaggeration, and therefore filled with the humor of character and situation which inheres in the case. The blend of "humanities" and "barbarities" in our public schools and universities lays the foundation of such a personality; a not too subtle theological training in a vocation where tact, intelligence, vigor, and self-confidence are of supreme importance, provides the necessary professional superstructure, and the bracing atmosphere of episcopal elevation gives the requisite sharpness of authoritative tone. He is a stable, fully-developed being as he is shown to us by a number of little series of letters which prick him out in his relations to his church and world. Upon the whole one is disposed to say that episcopacy triumphs over Christianity, for it shows a hard, just man, a little proud of both properties, striving towards toleration, but failing to conceal the absoluteness of his judgment, meting out with a too visible economy the measure of his love for his fellow men, a little ashamed of enthusiasm, and quite incapable of "losing his life to save it." And yet withal an easy, genial man in his private non-professional relations, full of help and shrewd advice to those in trouble, stubborn, almost brutal towards opposition, but generous to broken enemies.

We see him to best advantage in his advice to a missionary of dubious vocation, to one of his clergy on canonical obedience, and in handling scandalous cases or the questions of conscientious objectors. In such matters the intellectual strength of absolutism appears in the sharp, short, conclusive reasoning from fixed first principles, which gives real force, and even "wit," to his literary style. Enough learning to furnish weapons for controversy, but not enough to make them unwieldy, sufficient subtlety to see the weaknesses of his opponent and to refuse to see his own, and a genuine pervasive belief in the infallibility of his representation of the Church, make him as formidable a controversialist as could be found. Here is part of his reply to a meddling statesman who, in a matter affecting the conduct of worship in a parish where he is not a parishioner, has written a letter of remonstrance:—

> "The rest of your letter, though it is couched mainly in the form of questions, can hardly claim any comment from me, unless in acknowledgment of the public spirit with which you find time, in spite of the heavy strain of your official duties, to deal so largely with matters not in your immediate concern. It is, of course, open to anyone to criticise a bishop's administration of his diocese, and you are entitled to do this as you please; but I think it better to profit in silence by such criticism, however ill-informed it may be, rather than to enter upon either admission or refutation of its content. To do this might seem to imply that one is answerable to his critic."

Most delicate and interesting is the description, by the process which may be called "insinuendo," of the Bishop's relations towards his Dean, his Archbishop, and his Archdeacon, and others whose independence is apt to chafe against his own spiritual self-sufficiency. In dealing with lay intrusions he is less delicate, but even there he wields vulgar weapons with some skill. "I regret the use of the word impertinence, as it seems to have pained you unnecessarily. I used the word in a narrow technical sense, but I ought to have seen that it might convey an offensive meaning, and I ask you to accept this apology for inconsiderate language."

If the little volume is written as an "apologia," it fulfils the purpose excellently. For it shows us just what sort of Christianity is compatible with the dogged, dogmatic, narrowly emotional, unimaginative temper which has been our ideal of British efficiency. A certain larger leaven of rationalism than is openly permissible in the Roman communion is available for doctrine. In the substance of his faith our bishop is moderately liberal, but stiff in the maintenance of the creeds and formularies which maintain the authority of the Church. A test case is the request of one of his clergy for permission to preach in a dissenting pulpit.

> "Privately, and in your own mind, you may think him as good a priest as yourself. He is probably as good a man, and I have no doubt he is a better theologian; I have read his books with interest and with profit. But that is not the point. You are invited to appear with him in a public capacity as sharing the same ministry. In your public capacity as a member of the Church, you cannot do this. The Church does not, in fact, recognise him. If you do so, you set yourself directly at variance with the Church of which you are a minister; and that state of things is quite intolerable. If, on the other hand, you go under some reserve, implied or expressed, you will be treating Mr. Winter with discourtesy; and that, I hope, is equally intolerable."

The logic of the situation is impregnable, and our bishop, being a fearless man in the defence of "principle," does not shrink from the firmest assertion of the spiritual dominion of the Church, not merely over the inner life of its adherents, but over their conduct in the closest relations of life. His discipline in the case of the remarriage of a divorced person affords an illuminating instance of an excess of authority which explains why the ordinary Englishman repudiates with contumely the duty of confession and the priestly rights of penance and of absolution, which are so explicitly asserted in the Book of Common Prayer.

These letters appeared originally in the "Church Times," and we are quite prepared to believe that the figure they exhibit appears to its readers that of a model modern Anglican bishop. To most of our readers they will serve to illustrate the subtle and perilous reactions of spiritual autocracy, embedded in the ferro-concrete of ecclesiastical tradition, upon a fine, able, honest, kindly English gentleman. His excellent qualities of intellect and heart would have made him an uncommonly good business organiser, statesman, schoolmaster, or public official. As bishop he fulfils all these functions with distinguished success. But there is a something, a presence or an absence, which dehumanises; perhaps it is the very quality which episcopates, transmuting the English gentleman into the quasi-Roman pontiff.

Present-Day Problems.

LORD MORLEY'S INDIA BILL.

Lord Morley has fulfilled his promise to introduce his India Bill immediately after the debate on the Address. The time has therefore come for the nation to make up its mind in what spirit and by what methods it will meet the existing situation in India. Everyone admits that important modifications in our system of administration are necessary to satisfy modern requirements, and Parliament will have to pass a decision on the scheme of reform now coming before it. The position is deeply interesting, and the issues are momentous as regards the future of India, and also as regards the future of the United Kingdom.

The general scope of the proposed reforms was indicated in the Message of the King-Emperor to the princes and peoples of India on the occasion of the Jubilee. In that gracious declaration, which confirmed and developed the principles laid down in Queen Victoria's Proclamation of 1858, he promised concessions to the wishes of the people, including the appointment of qualified Indians to high office, the extension of representative institutions, and the satisfaction of Indian aspirations as regards equality of citizenship and a greater sphere in legislation and government. In order to fulfil these promises Lord Morley has now prepared his Bill—the outcome of prolonged enquiry and deliberation—which will aid in giving effect to the scheme approved by the Government at home and by Lord Minto as Viceroy of India.

The high authorities are thus all agreed as to the course to be pursued. At the same time no one can suppose that the task is a light one, and it will be well at once to realise some of the principal obstacles to be overcome. The principal difficulties seem to be threefold: 1st, the inherent difficulty of devising a scheme suited to a vast population made up of elements differing in race and creed; 2nd, the natural reluctance of the official body to part with a portion of its authority; and 3rd, the want of familiarity with Indian matters on the part of our legislators.

Taking these points in their order, it may be said that the inherent difficulty of the case is illustrated by the deputation on behalf of the All India Moslem League which waited on Lord Morley. The object of the deputation was to protest against the method suggested in Lord Morley's despatch for the election of representatives to the Legislative Councils. That method was by what has been called joint or mixed electorates—i.e., the representatives would be chosen, directly or indirectly, by electors drawn from all classes of the population within a prescribed area. The deputation expressed a fear that this method would prove detrimental to Mussulman interests, the contention being that where the majority of the electors were Hindus, this arrangement would make the Mahomedan representatives dependent on the goodwill of a rival community, and place Mussulman interests in their hands. For Mussulman representatives they desired exclusively Mussulman electors. With reference to this complaint Lord Morley gave the deputation the assurance that the Mahomedan representation would be "adequate, real, and genuine." He further pointed out that the despatch only suggested, and did not prescribe, the joint or mixed electorates, and he indicated no less than four ways in which, within the terms of the despatch, their wishes as regards the elections might be met.*

This explanation appears to have satisfied the deputation on the particular point raised. But, underlying the specific complaint, this interview illustrates the fact that in a considerable section of the Mahomedans there exists a general apprehension that the added powers which representative institutions give to a majority may be exercised to the detriment of a minority. How can this apprehension be allayed? No doubt in part by careful consideration of concrete cases as they arise. But the chief remedy for possible friction is to be found in the reasonableness and good feeling of the Hindu and Mahomedan communities themselves. On this point Lord Morley takes a hopeful view: "From information that reaches me," he said, "I do not despair of meeting fair-minded critics of both communities." And this hopeful view seems to be confirmed by the conciliatory spirit manifested by the Indian National Congress, which for the last twenty-three years has voiced independent public opinion in India. The resolutions, passed unanimously at the recent session in Madras, are evidence of harmony among the various communities; for it must be borne in mind that the doors of the Congress are open to all, and that many distinguished Mahomedans have always been among the Congress leaders. It has, indeed, always been a prime object of the Congress to promote concord among all classes, and the Hon. G. K. Gokhale, in a remarkable speech, impressed upon his hearers that "the new powers should be exercised with moderation and restraint, and they should be zealously used for the promotion of the interests of the masses of the people."

Such utterances do not show any factious or partisan inclination; so we may hope that the details of the scheme will find a peaceful settlement. As regards the particular question of joint or mixed electorates, my own belief is that if the Hindu leaders prefer this method it is with no desire to dominate or oppress a minority. It is rather from a conviction that this is the best means of avoiding friction and promoting unity. And this view seems reasonable. For we know that any organisation formed to promote sectional interests tends to bring to the front men of extreme and militant views. A Navy League, a Tariff Association, a Society of Temperance Advocates will naturally take as their leaders those who feel most strongly regarding the cause they have at heart—enthusiasts, and sometimes even fanatics. And if the several religious communities in India specialise themselves in electioneering organisations there is reason to fear that their representatives in the Legislative Councils will not be men of that calm and conciliatory disposition best fitted to carry through practical measures for the public good.

The second difficulty in the way of the reform scheme, to which I referred above, is the natural reluctance of Anglo-Indian officials to relinquish any portion of their authority. This point does not need elaboration. India has hitherto been in a condition of tutelage; but since 1858 at least three generations of educated Indians have passed through our schools and colleges, and they now ask to have a reasonable voice in their own affairs. The Indian Civil Service has shown itself an upright, though austere, guardian, but should now, with becoming dignity, recognise the altered position. The ward is approaching his majority, and the guardian should welcome his co-operation in the labors of the administration.

As regards the third difficulty, the want in Parliament of familiarity with Indian questions, there is the danger that political partisanship may carry away those who do not realise the critical position of affairs in India. In the condition of unrest which still prevails in India, it seems almost incredible that any journal claiming patriotic feeling should act so as to stir up fresh trouble. Yet some organs in the London Press have already shown an inclination to play off one great Indian community against the other, suggesting unfairness on the part of Government as between the Hindus and Mahomedans. Such unworthy insinuations have called forth a sharp rebuke from Lord Morley, who declares that the suggestion that any member of the Government has any prejudice whatever against Mahomedans is "one of the idlest and most wicked misapprehensions that could possibly enter even into the political mind." So far as Parliament is concerned, no doubt the central principle will be to maintain inviolate that strict impartiality between castes and creeds which is the ancient and secure foundation of British rule. No departure from this well-established principle would be countenanced by a statesman of the character and the Indian experience of Lord Lansdowne. And we may hope, now that the Bill has come before the House of Lords, that support will be given from both sides to Lord Morley in his earnest effort "to improve Indian government, and to do full justice to all bodies of the Indian population."

The Drama.

MR. JAMES AND MR. JONES.

The Afternoon Theatre was doing its manifest duty in producing Mr. Henry James's comedy "The High Bid." One of its unquestionable uses is to give a hearing to meritorious plays which have not precisely the qualities (meritorious or otherwise) that attract the hundred-night public. That "The High Bid" is capable of giving pleasure to a certain order of audience was amply proved at its first performance. The audience then present was representative of a considerable class, but not of a large enough class to pay the expenses of a "big production" and keep the theatre full for five or six months on end. The chief problem of our theatrical life is to devise such a method of "minority representation" as shall enable the demand of a lesser, but far from negligible, public to become effective, and not leave the "great public" sole arbiter of the drama's destinies. Both the demand and the supply exist in quite sufficient quantities, if only they could be brought together; but, in a world of manifold clamors and distractions, that is no easy matter. The Afternoon Theatre is one of the most hopeful means yet devised for mitigating the rigors of the long-run system; and it is, I repeat, doing its duty in producing "The High Bid."

It is curious and significant that, on one and the same stage, while "The High Bid" is modestly put on as a side-show for half-a-dozen afternoon performances, all the resources of the theatre are devoted to making a great appeal to the great public with "The Dancing Girl." Some people will see in this conjuncture an ironic illustration of the essential inferiority of all dramatic art, inasmuch as it always tends to take its standards from the taste of the multitude. Not thus do I read the lesson. If "The Dancing Girl" appeals to the great public—it did once: I do not know whether it does now—it is in virtue of something that is lacking in "The High Bid," not to its advantage, but to its disadvantage. Mr. Jones makes an honest effort to touch our imagination, to present strong emotions, and to typify conflicting theories of life. His effort is not, perhaps, very happily inspired; but the will is there, sincere and unmistakable. Mr. James, on the other hand, tells us a dainty little fairy-tale, with an artificiality of accent which sometimes charms and sometimes exasperates, but never conceals the emptiness of the intellectual sport. In point of literary art there can be no comparison between the two plays; but it is no mere stupidity of the great public which prefers even an abortive tragedy to a fine-spun comedietta.

What is the matter of "The High Bid"? One would scarcely exaggerate in saying that it has no matter—only manner. A fine old English mansion comes, heavily mortgaged, into the hands of an heir who has never even visited it. The purse-proud mortgagee demands that the heir shall marry his daughter, on pain of foreclosure and ruin. But just at the right moment there drops from the skies a wealthy and overpoweringly amiable American widow, with a passion for old English houses, and no aversion from a young English husband. She promptly falls in love with the heir, who with equal promptitude reciprocates the sentiment; she buys out the mortgagee at an exorbitant figure (the legal aspect of this "high bid" is obscure to me); and the mortgagee's daughter is left free to marry a lover of her own rank in life, who is thoughtfully provided lest any note of disappointment should jar upon the pleasure which it is the business of a comedietta to give. In all this, of course, there is not a trace of invention. There is no older form of romance than that which tells of a sympathetic hero who has fallen into the power of a wicked enchanter, and is saved by the intervention of a good fairy. It is nothing to the purpose that her magic wand happens to take the form of a cheque-book. If this story had been presented by a commonplace writer, we should all have cried out upon its childish conventionality. Mr. James is anything but a commonplace writer, and his workmanship lends interest and charm to his theme. Yet it is only fair to point out (since chance has forced the comparison upon us) that Mr. Jones's fable has not only more matter in it, but actually more probability and common sense, than Mr. James's.

Nor can it be said that there is any serious character-drawing in "The High Bid." The hero, Captain Yule, is the sympathetic personage, undisguised and unashamed. The heroine, Mrs. Gracedew, is a truly delightful creation, and, in her attitude towards "taste" and the beauties of antiquity, she may possibly represent a real—though certainly a rare—American type. But whatever truth there may be in her portraiture is there, so to speak, by accident. The author did not set out in search of truth, but of delightfulness. Mrs. Gracedew is a good fairy with an American accent—that is the first and last word of her characterisation. Miss Gertrude Elliott, indeed, played the part without any accent; but that is not Mr. James's fault. The character he created is distinctly American: that is the one differentia which distinguishes her from the abstract, unqualified good fairy. The accent of the purse-proud mortgagee is not American, but Jamesian—otherwise he has nothing to mark him off from any other mortgagee of comedy. His daughter is a breathless, embarrassed nonentity, and the old servant is a figure of pure convention. The play, then, reduces itself to a highly improbable sentimental anecdote, set forth in dialogue which is sometimes humanly fanciful and charming, at other times artificial and incredible, but always marked with verbal distinction and felicity. This is essentially art for a small public. At a repertory theatre "The High Bid" might be put up some half-dozen times in a season, when a short play happened to be wanted as front-piece or after-piece to some other short play of a happily contrasted character. But the fact that such a play does not appeal to the great public is no proof that the great public is inaccessible to great art. For this is not great but essentially small art.

Nothing could have been more delicate and delightful than Miss Gertrude Elliott's performance of the good fairy from Missoura Top. Perhaps Mr. James originally "saw" in the part an actress of more forceful and compulsive personality; but no one could have played it more wittily or more winningly. Mr. Forbes Robertson was admirable as the mild idealist, Captain Yule, and Miss Esme Hubbard was really clever as the mortgagee's daughter.

It is my incorrigible sense of abstract justice that makes me try to hold an even balance between the afternoon and the evening entertainments at His Majesty's, not any personal preference for the banquet offered to the great evening public. Whoever wishes to realise the progress of the British Drama since 1890 ought to book places at once for "The Dancing Girl." He will be amused by the play; it is far from unentertaining; but, above all things, it is a historic document of extraordinary interest. It sent me straight to another historic document—my own notice of it in its novelty. I expected to read it with amusement: I read it with amazement. It might have been written in cuneiform, so remote did it seem and so incomprehensible. Good heavens! the things I admired! The "temptation of St. Christison" in the second act! And the "grim irony" of the Duke's remarks to his valet and others in anticipation of suicide! And, most astounding of all, the "scenic adroitness" of the third act, in which the grand staircase of Guisebury House is cleared of the ducal guests in order that the Quaker father from Cornwall may have a fair field for launching his curse at his "Pagan" daughter! At His Majesty's, the spectacle of his Grace of Guisebury shinning up those stairs and shooing his invités before him seemed to me one of the funniest things I had ever seen on the stage. But if you ask me whether I am ashamed of my raptures of 1891, I reply, "Not at all." They were inspired by the sense, which subsequent events amply prove to have been a just sense, that the drama was in progress, and stood in need of opportunist, not idealist, criticism. That my standards were, in fact, lower and more naïve than those of to-day is no doubt true; but it is also true that "The Dancing Girl" was as far ahead of the average work of fifteen years earlier as it is behind the average work of to-day, and that it was my business to realise and give the fullest value to this advance. Moreover, there is a certain actual quality in the play—a quality of imagination, of wit, and of dramatic energy—which it would have been foolish to ignore. Garish melodrama though it be, "The Dancing Girl" stands on a far higher level than such things as "The Christian," "The Sorrows of Satan," and the like pretentious vulgarities. Mr. Jones is always a born dramatist; he has the root of the matter in him. There were many passages in "The Dancing Girl" in which the audience quite genuinely felt the true dramatic throb, that pulsation to which the much-puffed pseudo-playwright never attains. I did not see the new last act; last acts which begin after 11.30 are not for me. It would seem that it does not essentially differ from the old last act, which alone was excluded from my eulogy of twenty years ago. The non-resuscitation of the polar voyagers is, however, a distinct improvement. To resuscitate Captain Leddra, as presented at His Majesty's, would be to fly in the face of Providence.

On the whole, the acting is all that can be desired. Mr. Tree, of course, revels in the Duke of Guisebury—it is one of his best parts. Miss Alice Crawford seemed to me extremely effective in the part of Drusilla—quite as much so as her predecessor, Miss Neilson. Mr. Louis Calvert's David Ives amply deserved the applause which greeted it. Miss Marie Löhr and Mr. Vane Tempest, in their very different ways, were both delightful.

It is curious, and not very encouraging, to find Mr. George Alexander, as well as Mr. Tree, falling back upon a revival of a late-Victorian drama. "The Prisoner of Zenda" is too well known to call for more than a passing mention. It is as good a play of its kind as need be; and as a vehicle for picturesque costumes and uniforms it has few rivals. Mr. Alexander plays his treble part with grace, distinction, and force, and he finds in Miss Stella Campbell a simple, sincere, beautiful, and quite sufficiently dramatic Princess Flavia. Mr. Frank Cooper makes a duly sinister Black Michael, and Mr. Alfred Brydone is excellent as the Bismarckian Colonel Sapte.

Some critics, I gather, were dissatisfied with Miss Ethel Irving's Miss Hardcastle in "She Stoops to Conquer," at the Haymarket. They are very hard to please. Allowing for a little nervousness, I saw nothing to complain of in Miss Irving's performance. She did not try to get out of the part more than there is in it, and that is a matter for sincere gratitude. Who can doubt that it would be very easy for Miss Irving to exaggerate the archness of the part, and emphasise all the by-play? That she refrained from doing so is, in my opinion, a sign of true artistic feeling. Miss Irving ought one day to give us Mirandolina in "La Locandiera"; but the play must be specially translated for her, with some crispness and vitality of style. Mr. Robert Loraine is a capital Young Marlow; but the passage where he whisks Miss Hardcastle up in his arms is unworthy both of him and of her. Mr. Holman Clark is a sound and sensible rather than a rich and delightful Mr. Hardcastle; and Mrs. A. B. Tapping would be excellent as Mrs. Hardcastle but for a crowing trick of the voice—a perpetual alternation between chest notes and falsetto—which, for my part, I found very trying. One could wish that Mr. George Giddens as Tony Lumpkin would borrow some of Miss Irving's moderation; his performance wants only a little toning down to be as praiseworthy as it is entertaining.

THE DOWNFALL OF THE GRAND VIZIER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—" . . . Seeing that, in my firm conviction, all the honorable deputies will consider my explanations as perfectly sufficient, I find myself obliged to put off answering the interpellation till next Wednesday."

Thus ended Kiamil Pasha's first letter to the Turkish Parliament on the eventful 13th of February, and when I heard it translated for me, I wondered if my fate was to be to see, for the third time, a Parliament closed by an autocracy. "If these good people wait till Wednesday," I said to myself, "they will never meet again—save in a fragmentary manner, somewhere outside the Turkish frontier, in order to draw up an Ottoman version of the Viborg manifesto."

My experiences in the Russian Duma had taught me what waiting till Wednesday would mean. It would mean that on Wednesday Constantinople would be full of troops, that the Parliament House would be surrounded by the Sultan's Albanian Guards, and that Kiamil Pasha would have blossomed into a Stolypin, very liberal at first, very effusive in explaining to foreign journalists all the sweeping reforms he meant to introduce, how he intended, despite the Committee and their misguided dupes, to make Turkey one of the most democratic countries in the world, but afterwards, beneath the spur of the Court camarilla, degenerating swiftly from statesman into hangman.

"But the Sultan invited us to dinner, and greeted us with sincere affection," said Ismaïl Kemal, one of the eight that supported the Grand Vizier to the end. "Besides, he swore to observe the Constitution."

"Put not your trust in Princes, effendi," I replied. "In the Winter Palace I heard the Tsar salute the deputies of the first Duma as 'Russia's best.' I afterwards met those deputies trooping out of jail. Didn't the Shah swear to observe the Persian Constitution?"

The most suspicious element in the situation was the Grand Vizier's tale of a conspiracy against the Sacred Person of the Padishah. Hilmi Pasha, the Minister of the Interior, poured contempt on that story, and asked why the Grand Vizier kept it fifteen days to himself without doing anything, while the Committee has obviously no need to plot against a man whom it holds in the hollow of its hand. What made me look askance at the device was that it had been tried before. Exactly the same trick was played on the second Russian Duma, whose last day of existence was marked by the excited appearance of M. Stolypin, full of a dreadful conspiracy among the Social Democrat members to blow up the Tsar. You will remember that while people were shuddering over this frightful disclosure, Stolypin himself blew up the Constitution, by altering the Law of Election, and that we heard no more of that atrocious plot.

In some ways the Turkish Parliament reminded me of that fateful day in the Duma. Like the Catherine Hall of the Taurus Palace, the one little corridor of the Parliament in St. Sophia Square is crowded during recess with groups of excited deputies, engaged in eager discussion. Of course there is a difference in the costumes. In the Duma, rubashkas and high boots; in the Turkish Parliament, fezes and, here and there, a dark, silent, and dignified Arab deputy, whose strikingly picturesque robes recall the lonely desert horseman. There are other differences as well. You will see here, for example, none of the sadness and despair which clouded the faces of the Muscovite legislators on that memorable day. The Turks look and speak like men who have a few trusty bayonets on their side too, and who have, perhaps, as good a chance of dissolving the Sultan as he has of dissolving them. Listen to the letters that are read from the military chiefs of the Osmanli scattered all over the Empire, from the Adriatic to the Persian Gulf, from the frontiers of Austria to the frontiers of Egypt! They are short-sighted people who regard as military dictation this gallant rally of the troops around the Constitution. Those who write and wire such things forget that the Committee is forcing the Parliament to do this, when, as a matter of fact, the House, with the exception of some dozen members, is the Committee. Listen to the letters that are read from the officers and commanders of every cruiser, gunboat, and torpedo-boat in the Turkish Navy, from those in Smyrna, the Marmora, and the Golden Horn to the one that lies in the Bosphorus, with its 9·10 inch gun trained on Yildiz Kiosk. "Gentlemen," say all these letters, "we are with you!" The curt, respectful messages of the sailormen amount to nothing more than this; yet we are asked to believe that the fleet is coercing the legislature.

Speaking English with a Greek accent, swarthy Levantine gentlemen in Turkish fezes and with Spanish passports in their pockets, introduce themselves to me as representatives of great European and American papers, and insist vehemently that the Grand Vizier is right and the Parliament utterly wrong. I am drowned in their torrent of words, hypnotised by their incessant gestures. I am solemnly assured by them that if Kiamil Pasha falls England's sympathy is lost.

In the Duma they had once a Don Cossack deputy who raised a terrible storm on the part of the extreme right by declaring that the day may come when the Cossack will refuse to lift his whip against women and children. To-day in the Turkish Parliament there was no storm at all, only a murmur of placid assent, when a young military deputy, Major Habi Effendi, cried out from the tribune: "Thanks to our soldiers, the nation has got a Constitution. The Army will keep that Constitution intact, and if anyone dares to touch it he will see whether or not the blades of our scimitars are sharp and the points of our bayonets keen."

Outside the Parliament House there was little excitement, for a continuous downpour of ice-cold rain did more towards keeping crowds from collecting than a thousand policemen could have done. The only place where a panic broke out during this eventful day was in the Grand Bazaar, that wonderful half-subterranean market, whose miles of busy streets, piled with all the characteristic goods of the Orient, constitutes one of the tourist's favorite haunts. Towards dusk a man ran swiftly through this bazaar crying out at intervals, "Why tarry ye here? They are coming," and, in the excited state of the public mind, these simple words were enough to cause a veritable panic. Shops were closed, goods were stolen, children were trampled underfoot in the rush, but nobody thought of stopping and questioning the mysterious stranger, for whom, by the way, the police are now anxiously but vainly searching.

If this was a device of Kiamil to cause a panic among the people, it failed. Kiamil had reckoned on the Parliament being a many-headed, many-brained monster, which would take weeks to make up its mind, while he, Kiamil, having control of the military and naval forces of the Empire, would act with the alertness and secrecy which have twice proved so helpful to the Tsar. But it was the Parliament that acted with incredible swiftness and decision. It was Kiamil who was slow and irresolute. "Parliaments are notoriously unwarlike," thought the Grand Vizier; but he forgot that this is a Mohammedan Parliament. So far as Constantinople is concerned, the Committee is, it is true, only sure of its four battalions of Macedonians—those watchdogs of the Constitution whom Kiamil Pasha was so anxious to banish to distant Janina, and whose officers are circulating so busily to-day among the deputies in the lobbies—but it has the Fleet on its side—and it has Youth. True, Youth is on the other side as well; but the helm is in the palsied hand of extreme old age.

The aged Sultan and his octogenarian Grand Vizier both hesitated to adopt the bold plan that Youth suggests—hesitated until too late. That plan was for the Padishah to proceed in person to the old Seraglio in Stamboul, in order to unfurl there with his own hands the Sacred Standard of the Prophet, or, as the Osmanli call it in their high-flown Oriental phraseology, "the majestic cypress of the garden of victory." This precious relic of Mohamet is kept in a shrine of the innermost harem, called "the Chamber of Noble Vestments," and is solemnly uncovered once a year by the Sultan. The mere fact of the Padishah unfurling this ancient green flag places all Mohammedans under so strict a religious obligation of ranging themselves under its folds in defence of the Khalif that only the dying are dispensed from obedience. Its last unfurling meant the extermination of the rebellious janissaries. On that occasion Mahmoud II. gave the standard to the Grand Vizier and the chief Mufti, who reverently handed it in their turn to the Moslim officers. Amid wild cries of "Allah! Allah!" the latter rushed out of the gate towards the mosque of Achmet and planted it in the delicately-carved stone pulpit of that mosque—a counterpart of the pulpit at Mecca. Then, after the ulema had read the decree abolishing the janissaries, Mahmoud himself, scimitar in hand, mounted his charger, and before nightfall 10,000 human heads were piled in a bloody heap before him—the janissaries had been wiped out of existence.

The Young Turks learned from a eunuch that an exactly similar scheme had been proposed to the Sultan Abdul Hamid two years ago, and that it might have been adopted had not Kiamil Pasha been reluctant, and had the Padishah not been strongly opposed to leaving his palace, even for an hour. They believed the story, whether true or not, and they acted on it.

The vote of want of confidence was carried by 198 to 8, and Kiamil resigned. The supremacy of the Young Turks was ensured. The great principle of ministerial responsibility to Parliament was established. A new Vizier was appointed, and the Sultan accepted the inevitable. The Parliament had beaten the Autocrat.—Yours, &c.,

A MUNICIPAL CIVIL SERVICE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The important proposal which has been put forward by Mr. Graham Wallas in THE NATION is one which will arouse the keenest interest of all who would be affected by the introduction of the system he describes. The opinion of one who is in the municipal service and who has long had somewhat similar ideas on the subject, may not be altogether without value. The restriction of the term "Civil Service" to appointments under the central government in this country has often given rise to discussion as to the proper designation of municipal officers; many object to being described merely as "clerks," but "municipal civil servant" is cumbrous, and "local government officer" is strange.

With Mr. Graham Wallas's main theme, there must, I think, be very general agreement. The importance of the local official is becoming very much greater than is realised, and it would be easy to mention a dozen principal officers of municipalities whose salary is equal to that of the President of the Local Government Board, and much higher than that of the Permanent Secretary of the Board. In these cases, it may be safely assumed that the men who hold these posts have proved themselves capable administrators and efficient advisers, but at the same time there are throughout the country very many highly-paid appointments for which men of proved capacity should be selected, but to which men are appointed by reason of having influential friends. It is true that in practically every case appointments are advertised, but it would be interesting to notice in how many cases personal canvassing is held to be a disqualification. Naturally, if an impression gets abroad in any locality that the plums of the municipal service are to be the reward for political partisanship, the ideal of impartial devotion to duty is lost Thus the particular posts will be filled by men who may be good, but are nevertheless not the best that could have been obtained, while the other officers lose something in zeal and fidelity, as well as that independence which would enable an officer firmly to resist any insidious beginning of corruption; and "scandals" are the result. A system of competition by which men are attracted into the municipal service as a career will obviate this difficulty, but it must be understood that if favorable personal influence is no longer to be able to get a man a post, adverse influence must no longer be allowed to ruin a man's official life without just cause. In other words, the official who enters the service by competition is entitled to security of tenure of his post so long as he is efficient. Some particularly flagrant instances of the unjust influence used by persons who have procured their own election to the local authority for the purpose of avenging some injury done in the course of official duty have recently pressed this question to the front, and municipal officers have formed an association to press, among other things, for security of tenure.

A further point to be noticed is that while civil servants are entitled on retirement to good pensions, the officers of local bodies are not. In comparatively few cases bodies have established superannuation funds, to which their officers are compelled to contribute, but even in the best of these the superannuation allowances are of the most niggardly character. The civil servant has a proverbially happy time, while the municipal man has, generally speaking, to work harder, for longer hours, with less holidays, often uncertainty of tenure, and no pension. Is it not clear that the civil service may be expected to attract a much better class of individual, for all that he need have no influence whatever at his back? Mr. Graham Wallas thinks that the expectation is, in fact, realised. It may, however, be said that such an authority as the President of the Local Government Board has borne witness to the fact that in one case at any rate, the officers of a certain body are certainly not inferior to civil servants.

I think that most people who have the direction of municipal affairs will, then, agree with the proposition that municipal servants should be more carefully selected, and the obvious mode of selection is competitive examination. Certainly the evil of the "temporary assistant," who has been filling the vacancy, and who is recommended for permanent appointment, is the cause of a very great deal of heart-burning among officers themselves, for often enough the individual who is so introduced is appointed to fill a by no means lowly position. This temporary assistant is as often as not a relative either of a member or a higher officer, and those who know could tell of many instances where, the temporary assistant having once put his foot inside the office, it has been impossible to secure his removal.

Even as I write, the Poor Law Commissioners have recommended that with a view to establishing and maintaining a high standard of efficiency, it is necessary to vary the present practice as to qualifications, appointment, terms of service, and superannuation of public assistance officers. They suggest that there should be qualifying examinations for the higher posts, that proper scales of salary should be introduced, and a central superannuation fund set up. My point is that similar alterations are necessary in all branches of the municipal service.

It does seem, however, that something might be done on the lines advocated, without troubling Parliament. Everybody knows how immensely difficult it is to get a Bill on such a subject through, but if only an enlightened public opinion could induce local bodies voluntarily to adopt the plan I suggest, the end would be largely attained. In London, for instance, the London County Council has two grades of clerks, the former of which perform minor clerical duties, and the latter perform the higher duties, except the technical professional appointments—e.g., in the architectural and engineering departments of the Council. Why should not the various bodies in London—the Water Board, the Asylums' Board, the Borough Councils—when they require a clerk of a grade comparable with one of the grades of L.C.C. clerks, obtain him as the result of competitive examination, not, indeed, held by themselves, but by giving notice to the County Council that when they are holding their next examination the Borough Council or Board appointment, as the case may be, may be included in the list? I see two difficulties: first, that the conditions of service, pay, and prospects with the various bodies are not identical; and, secondly, that the Borough Councils with characteristic truculence, would decline to allow the County Council to have any say in regard to their staff. The first of these could, I think, be removed without much trouble, the slight increase in salary which would be involved in the case of most boroughs would be amply repaid by the better class of officer obained as the result of the wider competition; and the second difficulty is one which could be smoothed away by a little tact and sweet reasonableness.

With regard to the other authorities throughout the country, or even for London as well, if my previous suggestion should prove impossible, it occurs to me that the examinations of the Civil Service Commissioners might be utilised by agreement between them and the local bodies concerned, on the basis of a small payment by the local body in respect of examination of each candidate who is taken into their service. The Civil Service Commissioners hold a large variety of examinations at numerous centres throughout the country, and candidates might be given the option of taking the service of some local body near their home rather than entering the national service and having to leave home. There does not seem to be any insuperable obstacle in the way of this scheme; in fact, there is, I believe, already in existence an arrangement by which one large business house is supplied by the Civil Service Commissioners with the names of candidates for one of their examinations who, while not being within the number to whom appointments are offered as the result of the examination, have yet reached a certain standard of attainment, and this business house, whenever it has a vacancy, selects a youth from this list.

It would, as I have already pointed out, be necessary before any proposals of the kind suggested by Mr. Wallas could be effected, to render uniform the pay and prospects in the various bodies who would join the schemes, but the advantages are obvious. I cannot but think that the attraction of a better class of men and the increased zeal which would result from the application of the principle of security of tenure and a reasonable system of superannuation, would inevitably render the municipal service more self-respecting and more efficient than it is. Local authorities in this country are entrusted with many and important duties, and for the performance of these under their direction they will have increasingly to rely upon their officials. Now is the time when a reform of procedure in connection with municipal appointments may have a great effect in unifying and purifying the local administration throughout England.—Yours, &c., I. L. J. H.

Letters to the Editor.

CONSCRIPTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your correspondent, Charles Cecil, is evidently a subscriber to the National Service League. His long letter, which is neither an answer to, nor a refutation of, what I said, is therefore natural. What I am in politics or anything else is beside the mark. It is what I said that matters.

Mr. Cecil's "League" issues a programme entitled "The Briton's First Duty: The Case for Universal Training." It was first published with the title—"The Briton's First Duty: The Case for Conscription." The earlier edition spoke with scorn of the idea of conscription being "repugnant to the feelings of the nation," but in the later edition the word "conscript" has been substituted by "national." Yet Mr. Cecil expresses wonder at my doubts as to the bona fides of the advocates of the League!

The following conversation before the Norfolk Commission is instructive:—

> Do you think that the requirement of a possible military situation can be satisfied short of general service—that is to say, the liability of everyone for service?
> Sir J. French: No, I do not think it can.
> Do you mean by general service liability, service for a couple of years on the part of everybody?
> Sir J. French: Yes, conscription, in fact (2492-2493).
> You do not advocate conscription for foreign garrisons?
> Sir J. French: No, I do not. . . . I would always make that reservation, that for war they (the conscripts) must go abroad.

General Sir J. Kelly Kenny said in answer to the question:—

> If the nation were engaged in a war of importance, the conscripted man should be liable for service abroad?
> Sir J. Kelly Kenny: Yes, for service abroad (829).

Further, before this same Commission Sir Coleridge Grove asked Lord Roberts:—

> You do not consider that an attempt at invasion of this country is likely if we have three Army Corps at home?
> Lord Roberts: I do not think so (1016-1017).

In this connection it may be mentioned that Mr. Haldane's Territorial Force is organised for fourteen divisions, equal to between four and five Army Corps. It already much exceeds the three Lord Roberts thought were more than sufficient, and no account is taken of the Regular Forces which would still be in the country!

Although seventy-three admirals have joined the League—one wonders how many command stone frigates—the Admiralty have no belief in invasion. The War Office memorandum of March 11th, 1903, quotes:—

> It is held by some that the Navy can guarantee complete protection of the United Kingdom against the danger of invasion by any larger force than 5,000 to 10,000 men (Mem. 4).
> Query: What does the word "some" mean? Does it mean the Admiralty?
> "Yes," replied Sir W. Nicholson, "their Director-General of Military Intelligence and Mobilisation."
> We may take it (the questioner goes on) that that is the view of the Admiralty?
> That is the view of the Admiralty.
> Is it also the view of the War Office?
> No, it is not the view of the War Office.
> Has this paper which has been before us been submitted to the Committee of Imperial Defence?
> No, it has not been before them.
> Then whose view does it represent? . . .
> It may be held to represent the view of the Commander-in-Chief and the Secretary of State.
> We may take it as an authoritative expression of the present views of the Commander-in-Chief and the Secretary of State?
> Yes (44-51).

The great interest in this lies in the fact that Lord Roberts was the Commander-in-Chief.

The Militia Act of 1662, the foundation of all subsequent Acts, was based entirely on inequality of service—on the principle that made a man's military contribution to the State vary according to his property. The more a man possessed the more service he owed, whilst the man who owned nothing, owed nothing—persons who had less than £50 a year from land, or less than £500 from personal property, incurred no liability of any kind. I wonder how a re-enactment of this would suit Mr. Cecil and his League?

M. Dumont says of Conscription in France—compulsory service, far from being a school of morals, is a "school of drunkenness, of idleness, and of debauchery." A famous French preacher says—"The family in France gives to the Army a young man clean in mind and body; the Army returns that same young man steeped to the very lips in debauchery, suffering from disease and degrading vices." I would remind the advocates of Conscription of Lieutenant Bilse's book, and of the Dreyfus episode.

Finally, as regards physical development. The Swiss were robust before the Constitution of 1874 made military service compulsory. In the "Morning Post" of September 21st, 1907, Mr. Battersby, an Englishman, told us that a few years ago the Swiss authorities were alarmed by the evidence "forthcoming of a general deterioration in physique." He further pointed out that forty-two per cent. of the youths of that athletic country were rejected for bad eyesight or disease, at the age of twenty. Forty-six per cent. of the Germans are rejected as physically unfit, and one of the reasons is for failure to attain a certain standard of height—this is less than 5 feet 1 inch! (Norfolk Commission, 6864.)

I am indebted to Mr. J. A. Farrer (whose little book, "Invasion and Conscription," is worthy of study) for much of the matter I have used.—Yours, &c.,

A. Grimshaw Haywood.

February 20th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—There are two fallacies in Mr. Cecil's letter which seem always to haunt the advocates of Conscription.

The first is that it is mere "indolence" and neglect of the sense of "duty" which prompts the opposition to Conscription; the second is that some higher patriotism and some form of self-discipline would be brought in by Conscription. Now I venture to think that the bulk of lawyers, clergymen, schoolmasters, and doctors are no more fairly to be charged with the neglect of duty or indolence than the average soldier. Nor is the charge any juster because they refuse the work of the soldier, than it would be to tax the soldier with injustice because he does not undertake the duties of the professions to which I have referred. Nay, I can even find outside the ranks of those regular professions a number of people who are trying to do their duty to their country though they may dispute the right of Mr. Cecil and the National Service League to settle for them what that duty is.

Secondly, as to the higher motives and feelings to be introduced by Conscription. Here I venture to think that Mr. Cecil and his friends confuse the question of their own feelings produced by a certain peculiar attitude towards life and country, and the feelings to be produced in the unwilling recruits by legal and physical coercion. I am willing to credit Mr. Cecil with much better motives than he allows to me; but a man who is merely forced into service can be only actuated by fear, which is not an heroic or ennobling motive. Mr. Cecil and his friends can perform all the military service which they desire without any change in the law; but assuredly the introduction of Conscription will not cause, and never has caused, that zeal for military service which Mr. Cecil desires. The Germans who come over here to escape Conscription, the French who are developing even extreme forms of anti-militarism, are proofs of the ultimate effect of Conscription; and the Mutiny of the Nore showed what effect the press-gang produced in the Navy. But while the rank and file when they have waked to the sense of their condition feel this revolt, it cannot be deemed that those who are at the top of the tree, those who introduce these schemes, feel the delight in war of a Napoleon or a Bismarck or a Peter the Great. And while the machine is content to be a mere machine, it is useful at first for purposes of aggression. At any rate those who control the machine desire to use it.

As to the Swiss Militia, if Mr. Cecil is prepared to disband our present Army, to give up all schemes of foreign policy, and to trust the defence of Britain to such a Militia as the Swiss, then we can discuss that question; but to propose Conscription as an adjunct to our present Army, and then compare our case with that of Switzerland, is simply to play with words.—Yours, &c.,

C. E. Maurice.

Eirene Cottage, Gainsborough Gardens
Hampstead,
February 20th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—A glance at the map of Western Europe will show that the great bulk of British Sea-borne Commerce does not go near the German Coasts, and that in order to attack it, a German cruiser must expend a large fraction of her coal supply, both in reaching the trade-routes to the west and south of these islands, and in getting back to her nearest port afterwards; for the chance of being able to replenish her bunkers without returning, may well be set off against the risk of a fight being forced upon her.

British Sea-borne Commerce then would be fairly safe in a war with Germany.

On the other hand, the great bulk of German Sea-borne Commerce must pass our shores, either to the south or to the north, and could easily be attacked by cruisers from our numerous harbors.

Here, then, is the rub: over seven-tenths of Germany's total foreign trade is sea-borne, and, therefore, some slightly smaller fraction of it would be exceedingly vulnerable and would, in fact, be utterly destroyed in a war with us.

And what can be done but to strain every nerve to protect herself, by a nation growing in wealth and disinclined to accept a preventable risk?

Would it be satisfactory to her, if Great Britain abandoned the right of capturing merchant-vessels while still retaining the power of doing so; in view of the fact that a struggle between the two countries if it ever took place, would surely be a life-and-death one?

No; in order to come to an understanding, and, perhaps, eventually to a reduction of armaments, Great Britain must find some other way of defending herself than that of keeping an overwhelmingly strong Navy in Home waters, to be a potential menace to the sea-borne trade of every nation in her vicinity; otherwise the game of beggar-my-neighbor must continue.

Now Germany's estimate of the length of her purse is just as likely to be right as our own estimate of the length of ours; or even more likely, if the fable of the hare that was running for his life, and of the dog that was running for his dinner, is remembered.

And how many millions will be spent by each nation before it is agreed that we are the dog?

Further, what must be Germany's game if opposed to an enemy with an overwhelmingly strong Navy, but with weak land forces?

Clearly it must be to endeavor to evade or disperse that Navy by every means in her power, including, if necessary, the bombardment of undefended ports, and to get in a blow at the heart, before the Territorial Army is fit to meet an invader's troops.

It may be well to note here, that even 200,000 men would be but one-twentieth of the four million soldiers at her disposal—so that the total loss of an invading force of the former strength would not be at all a crushing blow to her.

As to our Fleet intercepting the transports; that is no doubt a great risk; but there are fogs for days together, and there are German pilots quite familiar with our coasts; there is also steam at command in a fog, whereas in the old wars, sail-power was not available in that condition of the atmosphere, which is always accompanied by calms or light airs; further, there are much better methods of finding a ship's position by sounding, especially in shallow waters, and even when going at considerable speed, than ever there were formerly; and it is quite possible to "claw out" of any harbor in a fog, if the risk be worth it.

And the risk would be well worth it; for, supposing the venture successful throughout, as it well might be if the fog continued; what a prize would reward the venture! Whilst, if unsuccessful, then a small fraction only of the total military strength would be lost; and as for individuals, there would be a fair prospect that half of them would be picked up by our own boats and by other means, in these humanitarian days.

Invasion of these islands, then, offers at least a sporting chance of repaying the attempt.

And in order to meet this danger, and until several years have elapsed after we have decided to resume our fundamental duty to the State, we must not only put up with a Territorial Army that cannot be ready till some time after war has broken out, and that may be insufficient in numbers even then, but we must also (pay to) bolster up this unsatisfactory defence as best we can with another, which may or may not be able to protect us from invasion, but which—judging from the analogy of the Spanish-American War of 1898—will in no case be able to save us from a succession of panics, nor from a nearly certain breakdown of the credit of the country and a general return to the stocking of our ancestors.

Now to conclude this too-lengthy trespass on your valuable space, sir: should not all friends of peace on a sure basis, all lovers of justice and fair-play, unite to dispel the mists through which we still see "citizenship" distorted into "militarism," and "selection" disfigured as "conscription"? Should we spare any efforts to bring about such a beneficent, necessary and economical reform as would be universal military training: for this would provide the only unaggressive and the only adequate defence—a "Nation in Arms"?—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have received your issue of the 13th inst. to-day. It contains a letter signed "S.R. & R.W.W.," on "What Workmen Think of Conscription." Doubtless this letter does voice the thoughts of some workmen and their leaders, but, sir, what does it prove? Simply that in spite of, or, perhaps, because of our modern education simple English history has either never been learnt or else has been forgotten.

It proves also that these particular workmen and those who guide their thoughts are the lineal descendants, or would-be emulators, of those Britons—English—call them what you will—... were conquered in turn by Roman, Dane, and Norman, and who would have again been defeated by 100,000 Boers, but for the help of Colonists of all races from South Africa, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand.

In this same issue there is another letter on the subject written by Mr. A. Grimshaw Haywood. In this occurs the following paragraph: "In time of threatened or actual war the problem is simpler, for there is then but little difficulty in recruiting." It should be remembered that during the Boer War, feeble and incompetent, patriotism was worth just five shillings a day!

The old Chinook exclamation, "Hélo shame," is comment enough, and will, I think, be understood by your readers.—Yours, &c.,

A. H. Craven.

M. ANATOLE FRANCE'S "JEANNE D'ARC."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have read in your columns of February 13th, M. Anatole France's "brief and very characteristic reply" to my criticisms. M. France announces that my "laudable scruples" have led him to correct some of his references. When I obtain a copy of his revised edition, perhaps you will allow me, if space permits, to give you the results of my examination of the "Vie de Jeanne d'Arc" in its amended form.—Yours, &c.,

THE NEW TURKISH GOVERNMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I beg your kindness to declare the gratitude of my countrymen for your sympathetic comments on the circumstances resulting in the fall of Kiamil Pasha. It was in no way a change of programme of the Committee of Union and Progress—who simply defend the Constitution—which has resulted in the change of Viziers. We still value and are anxious to retain the goodwill and support of the British nation. Hilmi Pasha, you will find, will prove quite as warm a friend to England as his predecessor. We have never dissented from the foreign policy of Kiamil Pasha or doubted his ability, probity, courage, or patriotism. It was his own fault that he came into conflict with the Chamber by dismissing Ali Riza Pasha, on grounds his Excellency must now see were wholly insufficient, without consulting the Cabinet. I hope Englishmen will not condemn the Chamber for selecting Ministers from the permanent Civil Service. We have no other choice at present, as the young Army officers and civilians who have saved Turkey and guided her destinies for seven months, lack administrative experience and depend upon the best of the existing corps of officials for putting their reform policy into practice. If mistakes are made we ask your indulgence.—Yours, &c.,

THE CRISIS IN LIBERAL POLICY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Many readers of The Nation must, I think, be realising just now that not only the fortunes of the Liberal Party, but a far more important stake—the principles and practice of Liberalism itself lie in grave jeopardy. A constitutional crisis of the first moment has been postponed, many of us hold unwisely, in order that certain social legislation may be carried upon conditions to be dictated by the House of Lords. Few thoughtful reformers who understand the scope and magnitude of the legislative changes essential to provide effectual remedies for such social maladies as are disclosed by the Report of the Poor Law Commission can seriously believe that the House of Lords will pass these laws. Even greater urgency attaches to the issues of naval expenditure and of the indirect conscription for the Army, which are known to be dividing Liberals and progressives in the Government, Parliament, and the country. At such a time some organisation of men and women willing to take an active part in safeguarding what they hold to be essentials of Liberalism—peace, economy, and social reconstruction—will seem desirable. The local habitation of such a body is afforded by the New Reform Club, and I write to urge those who realise the influence which even a small number of well-organised persons, watching closely public affairs, can exercise by considered co-operative action at opportune moments, to apply for membership of that Club. Formed by a fusion of a group of Liberal Forwards with the League against Aggression and Militarism which came into existence during the late war, the New Reform Club has taken an active part in a number of movements relating to financial reform, industrial and humanitarian legislation, the protection of native races, and the improvement of democratic machinery. The Club, containing some four hundred members, with a low annual subscription, has just been reinstituted, and its new Committee contains a number of the most active Radicals in the House of Commons (among them Messrs. Alden, Lough, Mackarness, Ponsonby, H. J. Wilson), and other men and women well-known in politics and literature. With convenient premises for meetings and for social intercourse, the New Reform Club exists primarily to do just such work of defence and propaganda as the present emergency calls for.—Yours, &c.,

J. A. Hobson.

THE NEW SUFFRAGE BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The Reform Bill, introduced last week by Liberal and Labor M.P.'s, marks a new stage and an important advance in the women's suffrage movement.

The Bill, with its three months' residential qualification for man or woman, married or single, its prevention of plural voting, and its simplification of electoral law, is one to which no consistent democrat could refuse assent. May we not therefore expect that you, sir, will call on all Liberals to have the courage of their convictions, and will urge the Government to make a definite promise of support on the second reading on March 19th, now that the form of suffrage proposed is the one prescribed by the Prime Minister?

The old "limited" Bill has been recognised as conservative in its effect, and that Liberal and Labor M.P.'s should have now come forward with a Bill acceptable to the Liberal and Labor Parties shows the advance that the agitation has made.

Suffrage societies have, so far, persisted in asking only for the "limited" Bill, because they believed that adult suffrage was a red herring. But if all Suffragists were to unite in its support, and throw the same energy into their work for the larger, as for the smaller, measure, adult suffrage could no more be shelved than a limited suffrage Bill.

As to the country not being ripe for adult suffrage, that remains to be seen. At least, we know that Labor Party and Trade Unionist Congresses have steadily refused to pass anything but adult suffrage resolutions, and the present Bill is backed by the present secretary of the Labor Party. The strength of the democratic appeal is very great, and has never had its fair chance. But Mr. Dickinson's Bill No. 2 has had remarkable effect in impressing on people the claims of married women, and has prepared the way usefully for the present Bill. Further, the power of a Party lead to Party politicians has not been taken into account. The "first step" argument in favor of the "limited" Bill does not meet the facts of the political situation, and there is everything to gain by a courageous and resolute demand for womanhood suffrage. It is the logical outcome of nearly every argument used by suffrage speakers, even of the old argument that taxation should go with representation, for every woman, rich or poor, married or single, pays taxes over the counter. It is the only form of enfranchisement which meets satisfactorily and justly the facts of women's economic position. And it places, as in equity it should, the married and single woman on a footing of equality as regards their citizenship.—Yours, &c.,

Margaret Llewelyn Davies.

SUFFRAGETTE TACTICS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read with much interest the letter over the signature of "Senex," and, as a member of the Women's National Anti-Suffrage League, I should like to take the opportunity your correspondent has given me to remove what appears to be a rather general impression.

"Senex" says that "the ridiculous proceedings of the Suffragettes" have given the Women's A.S.L. an "opportunity for existence." This league, however, came into existence not as a protest against the tactics of any one society or league of Suffragists, but as a protest against the granting of the Parliamentary franchise to any women. Whatever view may be taken of our arguments, we are now sufficiently numerous and influential to refute the statement made by the Suffragists that the women of Great Britain demand the Parliamentary vote.

The point at issue is whether or not the sovereign power in this state should be placed in the hands of women. In the words of our petition we believe "that the danger which might arise from woman suffrage in the case of a state burdened with such complex and far-reaching responsibilities as England, would be out of all proportion to the risk run by those smaller communities which have adopted it." Whilst we are opposed to the placing of the sovereign power in the hands of women, we resent very strongly the assertion that women are living under a "tyranny," that they are "outlaws," "downtrodden," "slaves," &c., &c. We point to the long and honorable list of women, who, without the Parliamentary vote, have accomplished so much for our country's welfare. We are also aware that women possess full civil rights, and that their position is safeguarded by the law.

Apart from general principles, we find that all the suffrage societies habitually hold out the promise that woman's franchise will "increase women's wages," "lower infant mortality," "help so immensely in domestic problems," in the "question of the employment of married women," will "give to women some interests outside their home, making them better comrades to their husbands, better mothers to their children." At the same time they are asking for the franchise on the same terms as men, a basis which would not give the vote to any but the comparatively small number of wives who have separate property qualifications.

We contend that the only basis on which women can be enfranchised is adult suffrage, which is the rule in Australia and New Zealand. But how many supporters of women's suffrage are prepared to follow their proposal to its logical conclusion and hand over the government of this empire to a vast unwieldy electorate, in which the enormous majority would consist of absolutely inexperienced voters?—Yours, &c.,

ANATOLE FRANCE ON EQUALITY OF SACRIFICE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your valuable article, "What 'Equality of Sacrifice' Means" has reminded me of a passage in Anatole France's "L'Ile des Pingouins," where a similar question is discussed The Penguins, after their transformation, held an assembly in which it is proposed that each of them should contribute a tenth part of his wealth for public purposes. This suggestion is opposed by Morio, one of the richest of the Penguins, in the following unanswerable arguments:—

> "Oh Father Maël, I think it right that each should contribute to the public expenses and to the support of the Church. For my part I am ready to give up all that I possess—if necessary I would even cheerfully part with my shirt—in the interest of my brother Penguins. All the elders of the people are ready, like me, to sacrifice their goods, and no one can doubt their absolute devotion to their country and their creed. We have, then, only to consider the public interest and to do what it requires. Now, Father, what it requires, what it demands, is not to ask much from those who possess much, for then the rich would be less rich and the poor still poorer. The poor live on the wealth of the rich, and it is for that reason that all wealth is sacred. Do not touch it, to do so would be an uncalled for evil. You will get no profit by taking from the rich, for they are very poor in number; on the contrary, you will strip yourself of all your resources and plunge the country into misery."

It seems that Morio anticipated a view of public finance which still finds many supporters. For illustrations of this doctrine, see "Spectator" passim.—Yours, &c.,

THE LYKE-WAKE DIRGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—"Flet" as a place name had no notice in last week's letters. An estuary is implied—Fleet Street, Fleet (a river in Sutherland and elsewhere), Fleetwood, Saltfleet, Northfleet, Wainfleet, Haring Vliet, Honfleur, Harfleur, and Barfleur (old spelling "fluet").

It is interesting that the French examples occur near Le Hâvre (Icel: höfn haven).—Yours, &c., S. C.

Poetry.

A GOD IN VENICE.

THE town whose quiet veins are dark green sea,
The town whose flowers and forests are bright stone;—
There it was the God came to you and me
In the boundless depth of summer. All alone
We lay, and half in dream,
Gazed at the thin salt stream,
And heard the ripples talking lazily.

No verdurous growth, no sudden sharp decline
Of buds or leaves is there: the marble towers,
Come rain, come cold, come snow or gay sunshine,
Blossom eternally with graven flowers.
Yet there the wild God came
In silence, shod with flame,
Girdled with mystery, and crowned with vine.

We lay in the sun and listened, and we heard
Soft-treading feet and whispers in the air
And thunder far away, like a God's word
Of dire import, and saw the noonday flare
And tall white palaces
Sway all with dizziness:
The bells pealed faintly and the waters stirred.

And Life stood still a moment, mists came swinging
Blindly before us; suddenly we passed
The boundaries of joy: our hearts were ringing
True to the trembling world: we stood at last
Beyond the golden gate,
Masters of Time and Fate,
And knew the tune that Sun and Stars were singing.

For like two travellers on a hill, who stay
Viewing the smoke that dims the busy plains,
So, far away (sweet words are "far away!")
We saw our life; and all its crooked lanes,
Dim cities and dark walls
Fell, as a world that falls,
And left us radiant in the wind of Day.

An end, an end! Again the leaden noon
Glowed, and hot Fever opened her red eyes,
And misery came creeping out, and soon
We felt once more the sorrow of the wise.
Come friend! We travel on,
That one brief vision gone,
Bravely, like men who see beyond the skies.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

M. ALFRED LOISY is at present engaged on a work dealing with the "Acts of the Apostles," which will be the complement of his great works on the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel. If, as is now almost certain, he is appointed to the chair of the history of religions at the Collège de France, it may be presumed that his first course of lectures will deal with the "Acts." But it is his intention, when his study of the "Acts" is completed, to transfer his attention from the New Testament and the history of Christianity to some other subject, probably to some aspect of the history of one of the religions which had most influence on Christianity. The Académie des Sciences Morales has yet to send its recommendation for the vacant chair to the Minister of Education, but it is highly improbable that the Minister will pass over the candidate of the Collège de France even should the Académie refuse to recommend M. Loisy. In any case the definite appointment can hardly be made before the end of the present month.

A VOLUME called "Mansfield College Essays" has been written by old pupils and colleagues of Dr. Fairbairn as a memorial of his able Principalship of Mansfield College, which may truly be called an event both in theology and in Nonconformity. The book has no special unity other than an attempt on the part of each of the writers to make some contribution to theological scholarship on subjects that have engaged their special attention, and to make the work "some not altogether inadequate memorial of the range of theological scholarship represented in Mansfield College life during Dr. Fairbairn's tenure of the Principalship." There are eighteen contributors, among them being the Rev. C. S. Horne, the Rev. W. B. Selbie, Professor J. V. Bartlet, Professor A. S. Peake, Principal Garvie, Dr. A. Souter, Professor G. B. Gray, the Rev. D. MacFadyen, and the Rev. H. T. Andrews. The pleasing habit of presenting a scholar with a volume of essays written by his admirers is more common in Germany and in America than in England, though it has been done once or twice of late in this country. The book will be published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton.

EXCEPT Horace, there is probably no poet who has attracted so many translators as Heine. It is no disparagement to the vast mass of renderings that have been made of both these poets to say that they are failures, for the task attempted is an impossible one. The latest author to try and do what seemingly cannot be done is Father Tyrrell, whose "Transcripts from Heine" is announced for early publication by Mr. Elkin Mathews. The best attempt on Heine hitherto is Dr. Todhunter's poetical version of the "Buch der Lieder." Father Tyrrell has great qualifications of style and temperament. It will be most interesting to see the result.

MR. JAMES HUNEKER, the American critic, has a fancy for single-worded titles. "Iconoclasts," "Overtones," "Melomaniacs," are a few of the names under which he has chosen to issue his volumes of essays. His new book, to be published by Messrs. Scribners, continues the sequence. It is called "Egoists," and deals with Anatole France, Huysmans, Max Stirner, Stendhal, and other writers in whom Mr. Huneker sees an abnormal development of egoism and self-assertion. Judging from the same author's former books, we may expect the volume to be a series of very clever, though rather superficial, essays, written in a strange mixture of the French and American languages which, though not quite incomprehensible to the English reader, is extremely irritating.

EARLY next month Messrs. Heinemann will publish "A Short History of German Literature" in their series of "Literatures of the World." The volume covers a period of more than a thousand years, starting with a discussion of "The Religious Poetry of the Ninth Century," and coming down to the literature of the present day. Dr. Thomas, who is Professor of German Literature at Colombia College, has aimed at treating his subject in a purely literary, rather then in a scientific, manner. Mr. Heinemann's series has previously given us such noteworthy books as Professor Gilbert Murray's "Ancient Greek Literature," and Professor Dowden's "French Literature."

THE same publishers have in preparation a series of small volumes which will contain the best letters of the best letter-writers. The title is "Laurel Crowned Letters," and among the authors to be represented are Horace Walpole, Lord Chesterfield, Lamb, Cowper, Shelley, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, and Madame de Sévigné. The letters have been chosen partly for the light they throw upon the social, artistic, and political life of the various periods, and partly for their distinctive literary appeal.

MESSRS. BELL are about to issue a number of volumes containing representative passages from the works of great writers in prose and verse, together with biographical and critical introductions. Arrangements have already been made for "Scott," by Professor Grant, "Fielding," by Professor Saintsbury, "Defoe," by Mr. John Masefield, "Carlyle," by the Rev. A. W. Evans, "Dickens," by Mr. Thomas Seccombe, "Thackeray," by Mr. G. K. Chesterton, and "Hazlitt," by Mr. E. V. Lucas, with other volumes to follow. The aim of the series is to give selections generally representative of the author rather than a mere string of purple passages. The corresponding French series of "Pages Choisies" is of the greatest value, and we hope Messrs. Bell's "Masters of Literature" will be equally successful.

AMONG Mr. John Lane's autumn announcements is an English translation of Mr. H. S. Chamberlain's "The Foundations of the Nineteenth Century," a book which in its German original ran through eight large editions in ten years. Mr. Chamberlain's object has been to present the historical forces which have moulded the life and thought of our own era. In the first part of his book he shows the debt which modern Europe owes to Greek philosophy and art, to Roman law and administration, and to Christianity. The second part is devoted to the period 1200 to 1800, and is divided into seven sections—Discovery, Science, Economics, Politics and Church, Philosophy and Religion, and Art. The book is one of great importance and value, which many readers will be glad to have in English.

THE "Essay on Shelley," by the late Francis Thompson, which appeared in the "Dublin Review" for July, 1908, and attracted a great deal of attention, is about to be published in book form by Messrs. Burns & Oates. Some further notes on Shelley, also by Francis Thompson, will be printed as a supplement. Mr. George Wyndham, who contributes an introduction to the volume, describes the essay as "the most important contribution to pure letters written in English during the last twenty years."

From early days "the wisdom of this world" has had an indifferent, not to say a bad, reputation. Socrates denounced it in the Sophists, the writers of the New Testament in the Gnostics; and the greatest of religious allegories holds up Mr. Worldly Wiseman as an example of all that we should avoid. Abstracted, however, from its opposition—which, after all, is not essential—to qualities of a higher order, this wisdom, if earthly, is not necessarily either sensual or devilish; its exponents, from the Gnomic poets of Greece to Montaigne, are of the lineage of the Hebrew "Preacher" who, criticise him as we will, has left so deep a mark on the later world. It would be easy to parallel the most cynical prescriptions of the former from the sacred books ascribed to the latter. "Be not righteous over much," were it not scripture, would scandalise the pietist; the sceptical pessimism of much of the Sapiential literature falls short of the standard of average Pagan thought. If it be objected that this literature, sacred or secular, moves on the surface of life, passing lightly over the mysteries which underlie it, the answer is that it is not, and does not claim to be, an exhaustive rendering of experience. Its function is to provide us with a practical philosophy of human intercourse, based on observation of men and things, which, if conventional rather than comprehensive, has stood the test of many generations, and is reliable as far as it goes. As to how far this is, we may differ; most of us, however, will agree that it is a considerable way. The "Characters" of Theophrastus is an example. And, if we gather from the writer's undeniable testimony that "there were bores, ill-bred persons, and detractors even in Athens, of species remarkably corresponding to the English, and not yet made endurable by being classic," the lesson is that in small things, as in great, human nature changes slowly; "there is no new thing under the sun."

Scholarly as Sir Richard Jebb's rendering is, the book is one which loses in translation: the terseness of the Greek cannot be reproduced. It is in the critical appendix that the characteristic features of the great Cambridge scholar's work are to be found. The text is corrupt, the emendations are conjectural. Jebb's judgment was seldom at fault in discrimination and selection; and, while he has adhered more closely than previous editors to the MSS. as reported by Foss & Petersen (1858-9), his own conjectures, if anything, too sparing, are marked by singular penetration and restraint. The expurgations might have been spared; or the text, at least, have been given in its integrity; except for school editions, the principle of bowdlerising is out of date.

The defects described by Theophrastus seldom amount to grave moral faults. But they are such as to make a man "unclubbable." We should not send either the "Late-learner" or the "Newsmaker" to New Caledonia; but we should blackball them, we should go out of our way to avoid them, and be "not at home" when they called. The Agora was very like the Park. Who does not know the "Unseasonable Man"?

> "He will go up to a busy person, and open his heart to him. He will serenade his mistress when she has a fever. He will address himself to a man who has been cast in a surety-suit, and request him to become his security. He will come to give evidence when the trial is over. When he is asked to a wedding he will inveigh against womankind. He will propose a walk to those who have just come off a long journey. He has a knack, also, of bringing a higher bidder to him who has already found his market. He loves to rise and go through a long story to those who have heard it, and know it by heart."

The "surly man," too, is familiar to us, who, "when he stumbles in the street, swears at the stone." His bark is worse than his bite. "If a friend asks him for a subscription, he will say that he cannot give one, but will come with it by and by, and remark that he is losing this money also." He is infrequent at church and sermon; "he is apt also not to pray to the gods."

Loquacity would seem to be "an incontinence of talk"; the habit of evil speaking is "a bent of the mind towards putting things in the worst light." Superstition "would seem to be cowardice in regard of the supernatural." The superstitious man observes "dreams and omens and such like fooleries"; his religion has a certain fatuousness from which piety, in the best sense, is free. Garrulity is "the discoursing of much and ill-considered talk."

> "The garrulous man is one who will sit down beside a person whom he does not know, and first pronounce a panegyric on his own wife; then relate his dream of last night; then go through in detail what he has had for dinner. Then, warming to his work, he will remark that the men of the present day are greatly inferior to the ancients; and how cheap wheat has become in the market; and what a number of foreigners are in town; and that, if Zeus would send more rain, the crops would be better; and that he will work his land next year; and how hard it is to live; and that yesterday he was unwell."

Unhappy listeners!

> "He who would not have a fever must shake off such persons, and thrust them aside, and make his escape."

Were time, as it is not, a denominator of human nature, we should say—how modern a touch! For we know the garrulous man only too well. He buttonholes us after dinner; he bears down upon us at the cover side; he besets us in the drawing-room and at the club. His differentia is that of his place and time. To-day we have the man of the German Invasion, and the Tariff Reformer; or we may classify the tribe by the paper which at once moulds and reflects their prejudices: there is the mentality of the "Times," and that of the "Telegraph"—the "Rowdy Philistine" of "Friendship's Garland"—and, a later product (by "Tit Bits" out of the "Telegraph"), that of the "Daily Mail." But in substance the types are unchanged. Like Theophrastus, we have the "Boor" and the "Braggart," the "Oligarch" and the "Patron of Rascals": they came into the world early, and they came to stay.

Moralising of this surface-sort has been criticised as at best an enlightened worldliness, which concentrates on the non-essential and neglects the weightier matters of the law. These things ye ought to have done, it may be answered, and not to have left the others undone. Good manners are not inconsistent with intelligence and virtue; dirty hands are no evidence of a clean heart. And the instructor will insist on the outward, not because it is outward, but because, as such, it can be imposed by precept and acquired by practice. The inward, on the other hand, is not taught of men. It is spirit, and comes not with observation; it grows while men sleep. The greatest Oxford teacher of the past generation was charged with worshipping success, and training his pupils to make it their first object. Nothing could be more unreasonable and unjust. None knew better than he how to distinguish the real from the merely apparent; none was less disposed to take names for things. But one, at least, of the teacher's aims is to make men useful in their generation; and, ceteris paribus, the successful man is more useful than the failure. Education cannot, indeed, guarantee success, but it can remove certain obstacles to it; and Jowett set himself, as did Theophrastus, to remove them. In each case this was but one side of the teacher's activity; and that there are higher aims and other sides does not hinder it from being useful and good.
